Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, in reference to that article which has been read by the Clerk that there is not one word of truth in it from beginning to end.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota makes the point of order that this is not a privileged question.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I wish to say that it is all a lie, and then I am done with it.

The SPEAKER. It is not a question of personal privilge to the gentleman from Missouri, whatever it may be to the House.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The Chair will permit me to ask him a question.

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I introduced this bill, and that article which was read from this morning's Post states there was a bargain connected with it.

The SPEAKER. With the Democrats, and not with the gentleman. [Laughter.]

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. If these gentlemen are willing to do that injustice to these poor freedmen in that sort of way let them take the responsibility. I say it is all a lie from beginning to end.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of appropriation bills.

Mr. OWEN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Missouri whether, in characterizing the article which was read from this morning's Post, he means to cast any personal reflection upon me in reference to that matter?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I repeat that the statement that there is any bargain in the introduction or pressing of that bill, no matter by whom made, is a lie—absolute, plain, unqualified, unvarnished lie. [Laughter.]

Mr. OWEN. That is not an answer to my question.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. If the gentleman from Indiana says that I am a party to any bargain in connection with that bill—if he states that, then I say he states what is a lie. That is plain. I say that any gentleman on the other side of the House, I do not care by whom made, who makes any such statement, I say it is a lie. Does the gentleman understand me? [Laughter.]

Mr. OWEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that whether I understood the distinguished gentleman from Missouri, or not, in his remark, he is not capable of offering me a personal affront. [Laughter.]

I desire to add that when the gentleman came to my seat yesterday, after I had objected to the passage of the bill, he told me that he had introduced the bill himself, and that so far as he was concerned there was no trade whatever in it. I told him personally that I believed the statement was true, and that I had no reflection whatever to make on him; that the objection I made to the bill had no connection with him, and that I did not until that moment know that he had any connection with it.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Then, my dear friend, why did you not withdraw your objection? [Laughter.]

Mr. OWEN. It appears to me, therefore, that the gentleman from Missouri is merely seeking an opportunity to create a little scene here——

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri (interrupting). Oh, no; not at all. I have no feeling in the matter.

Mr. OWEN (continuing). By the extract he has caused to be read, and by the comments he has seen proper to make upon it this morning.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I had no intention of making a scene.

Mr. OWEN. And I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that I objected to that bill for reasons that grew out of a conversation I myself heard, and language which I heard John Milton Turner himself use, which at the time uttered I wrote down on a pad, and subsequently took the member of Congress aside to whom John Milton Turner had addressed his remarks, and said, "A difficulty may arise in the House or in the campaign over what Turner has said to you. If so, I shall most solemnly assert that this is what he said." I then read the conversation to this gentleman, who stated to me that it was correct, and that John Milton Turner used the language I had quoted. That caused me upon this floor to object to the passage of that bill; and the reason why I objected was that I did not believe it was my duty as an Indianian to sit on this floor and let my silence go as a vote to help the Democratic party pay John Milton Turner what he at least considered as his fair and equitable compensation for services rendered at the Indianapolis colored convention. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I introduced that bill, in the interest of humanity, for the benefit of these poor freedmen, and independent of any consideration personal to myself or anybody else, because it was an act of humanity to the former slaves of these Indians and in order that they should have what was simply their due. It had been recommended by President after President, by Secretary after Secretary, and the present Senate has passed the same bill. It has been pending in Congress ever since I have been here, and I do not think that the gentleman from Indiana should have objected on account of any individual or political feeling against an act doing justice to these people. I desire to disclaim any personal feeling towards the gentleman from Indiana for his action in the matter. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider general appropriation bills.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 75, noes 9.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That is not a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. TOWNSHEND and Mr. SAYERS were appointed tellers.

Pending the count by tellers,

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to state that I have no objection whatever to going into Committee of the Whole to take up the general deficiency bill, but the question of fortifications is in conference between the two Houses, and I do not think that that bill ought to be pressed here to embarrass the conferees on that question. If the gentleman will take up the general deficiency bill I have no objection, and am perfectly willing to withdraw the point of order, but I feel that it is unfair to the conferees on the Army bill to press this measure which is already in conference.

Mr. SAYERS. I do not know that it is necessary to say anything in reply to the gentleman from Illinois. That conference has been ordered upon the consideration of a bill, the amendments to which are entirely foreign to the fortifications bill, and it is not a question that can properly be considered by them. What action will be taken in reference to the consideration of bills is for the Committee of the Whole, and I have no promises to make to the gentleman.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, evidently there is no quorum voting or likely to vote. I submit, therefore, that the vote may as well be announced. I presume the gentleman will not insist upon the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already announced the vote, and the point of no quorum was made. The gentleman from Illinois insists upon the point and tellers were appointed. The tellers have not yet reported.

Mr. BURNES. I apprehend that there is a clear majority in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Texas, and I ask that the vote be announced.

The tellers announced the result of the division as ayes 92, noes 6.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. There is not quite a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The tellers will resume their places and continue the count.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on this question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 159, nays 9, not voting 157; as follows:

Mr. WHITTHORNE. My colleague, Mr. ENLOE, is detained at his room on account of sickness, and I desire that he be excused.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I am paired with the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. TILLMAN, but have voted to make a quorum.

Mr. CRISP. I am paired with the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. ROWELL, but understanding if he were present that he would vote yea, and I have voted.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I am paired with the gentleman from Maine, Mr. REED, but have voted to make a quorum. If there be a quorum present I desire to withdraw my vote. I desire also to say that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT], who is now absent on a conference committee, is also paired and has voted for the same reason.

Mr. WARNER. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. MANSUR, but being informed that he would vote ay if present, I have voted.

On motion of Mr. WEAVER, by unanimous consent the recapitulation of the names was dispensed with.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. I am informed that Mr. RYAN, with whom I was paired, has voted, and the pair should be withdrawn.

There was no objection, and the pair was withdrawn.

Mr. BREWER. I desire to state that I was paired with Mr. BLOUNT, which was to continue up to the 17th, but that gentleman returned yesterday. Though I have not seen him in the Hall, I have left the pair standing.

Mr. BLAND. I notice that I am paired with the gentleman from Vermont, Mr. STEWART. I voted for the purpose of making a quorum, and understand that the pair is concluded.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills. The Clerk will report the bill pending at the adjournment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The first bill upon the Calendar is the general deficiency bill. I ask now what bill the Clerk is directed to read?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk was directed to read the pending bill at the last sitting of the committee.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The bill that was last pending until yesterday and unfinished was the general deficiency bill, and in that bill the French spoliation claims were under consideration. Now, yesterday by unanimous consent, the fortifications bill was taken up, and the question I want to ask the Chair is, whether or not the general deficiency bill, having been considered and being undisposed of, does not have priority over the fortifications bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion, and this opinion is sustained by the Speaker of the House, that the business in which the committee was engaged at the last sitting of the committee is first in order under the rule of the House, clause 8, Rule XXIII, on page 254, which is that—

> The rules of proceeding in the House shall be observed in Committee of the Whole House so far as they may be applicable.

The next rule, XXIV, clause 6, provides:

> After the hour under the preceding clause shall have been occupied, it shall be in order to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business in which the House may have been engaged at an adjournment, and at the same time each day thereafter, other than the first and third Mondays, until disposed of; and it shall be in order to proceed to the consideration of all other unfinished business whenever the class of business to which it belongs shall be in order.

The class of business now under consideration is that known as general appropriation bills, and the unfinished business of that class is now in order under the rule——

Mr. HOOKER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOOKER. Is there not another rule of the House which requires that when the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of considering any particular Calendar, either appropriation bills or anything else, that Calendar shall be called in the order in which the cases or bills appear on the Calendar?

The CHAIRMAN. The rule is that consideration shall be in the order on the Calendar. But the rules also provide that when the committee has a bill under consideration and it is being considered, that bill is in order until it is disposed of or so long as that class of business is before the committee. This rule was observed in a very notable case when the oleomargarine bill was before the House. The committee resumed from day to day consideration of that bill as the unfinished business of the Committee of the Whole; and that unfinished business continued at one time for as much as ten days in succession as the regular order.

Mr. WEAVER and others. Regular order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to another parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Did the Chair take into consideration that the bill last under consideration before calling up this fortification bill was the general deficiency bill and that that was discussed and the fortification bill came up by unanimous consent? Now, the question I desire to ask the Chair is, whether or not the deficiency bill should have priority, it being also an unfinished pending bill?

The CHAIRMAN. That bill came up by unanimous consent that the deficiency bill be passed over, and that has given this bill priority.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. It is too late to make objection now.

The CHAIRMAN. And that having been done, this bill continues until finally disposed of.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But unanimous consent was given for yesterday only.

Mr. FORNEY. Until it was finished.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Not until it was finished. They both took their places on the Calendar, and that would be the first bill reached on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. That bill was passed over under the rule, and the other bill is the unfinished business until disposed of.

Mr. SAYERS. I call for the regular order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I have to rise to another parliamentary inquiry. I desire to know how the friends of the general deficiency bill may raise the question of consideration on the fortification bill and bring the deficiency bill up for consideration instead of the fortification bill. I desire an answer to that inquiry.

Mr. SAYERS. I suggest that it is not the duty of the Chair to inform the gentleman upon parliamentary law in advance.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will entertain any parliamentary motion.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But I am asking a parliamentary question such as I have never known the Chair to decline to answer, and the Chair is well able to answer it. My inquiry is this: How can the question of consideration be raised as between the general deficiency bill and the fortifications bill? The friends of the deficiency bill, or some of them at least, want to have that bill considered.

Mr. SAYERS. Let the gentleman ask unanimous consent.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let the Chair speak for himself.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not customary for the Chair to give instructions to the committee as to what its duties may be. The Chair will entertain any parliamentary motion.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not ask the Chair for any instructions. I have put a parliamentary question which I ask to have answered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state in answer to the gentleman that it is the duty of the Chair to decide questions of order only when they are raised.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I see the Chair does not desire to answer the question, and I will not press it further. Now I raise the question of consideration, and I move to lay aside the fortifications bill in order that we may proceed with the consideration of the general deficiency bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the bill known as the fortifications bill may be passed over. Is there objection?

Mr. SAYERS. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard. Under the rule the committee will rise and report the objection to the House.

Mr. SAYERS. I objected to the consideration of the deficiency bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. And I objected to the consideration of the fortifications bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That question is not before the committee at this time. The fortifications bill is before the committee. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] asked unanimous consent to pass over this bill, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] objected, and it is the duty of the Chairman of the committee to report that fact to the House.

Mr. SAYERS. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is it not the first duty of the Chair, after the fortifications bill is under consideration, to decide the question of order that was raised yesterday? Can the motion made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] be entertained until that question of order is decided by the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the question of order is of the nature of any other business in the committee relating to the bill, and has no greater priority of consideration than an ordinary motion to strike out a section.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask for a decision of the Chair upon the point of order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to another parliamentary inquiry. I desire to know what it is that the Chair will report to the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman. The Clerk will read clause 4 of Rule XXIII.

The Clerk read as follows:

4. In Committees of the Whole House, business on their Calendars shall be taken up in regular order, except bills for raising revenue, general appropriation bills, and bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors, which shall have precedence, and when objection is made to the consideration of any bill or proposition, the committee shall thereupon rise and report such objection to the House, which shall decide, without debate, whether such bill or proposition shall be considered or laid aside for the present: whereupon the committee shall resume its sitting without further order of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will rise for the purpose of reporting the objection to the House. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] will please take the chair.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. DOCKERY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration a bill (H. R. 10998) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, and that objection having been made to passing over the bill, the committee had risen and had instructed their Chairman to report the objection to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is, Will the House instruct the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the bill?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Fortification bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I submit that is not the question. The motion was to consider the general deficiency bill, and the gentleman from Texas objected, and the Chairman reported that objection back to the House, and the House is now called upon to decide whether the committee shall take up the deficiency bill or the fortification bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The objection affected the fortification bill, which was the first bill, and the Chairman of the committee advised the Speaker the objection of the gentleman from Texas was to the consideration of the fortification bill, and the question now is whether the House will instruct the committee to consider that bill or not.

Mr. TOWNSHEND rose.

[Cries of "Regular Order!" and "Vote!"]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let me state it to the Chair. [Cries of "Order!"] I made the motion in the Committee of the Whole that the general deficiency bill be taken up for consideration The Chairman of the committee submitted that question to the committee under objection made by the gentleman from Texas. Now the motion to lay aside the deficiency bill is the motion which the Chairman has reported back to the House as to whether we will take up the fortification bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair to report to the House nothing but what has been reported by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. He reported the motion was made to lay aside the fortification bill, to which the gentleman from Texas objected, and that is the question now before the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to raise the question of consideration on the fortification bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That question is raised by the proposition, which the Chair will submit, whether the House will instruct the committee to consider the bill (H. R. 10998) commonly known as the fortification bill. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a further parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If the fortification bill be laid aside when the House again resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills, will not the deficiency bill then be the first bill in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is a question for the Chairman when the House resolves itself into the committee.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That is the whole question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, Will the House direct the committee to consider the fortification bill. Those in favor of laying the fortification bill aside will vote in the affirmative.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask for a division.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 17, noes 77.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. SAYERS. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DIBBLE. Will the Chair state the question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, Will the House direct the committee to lay aside House bill 10998, known as the fortification bill, objection to the consideration of which was made by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If the fortification bill be laid aside, will not the deficiency bill be the first bill in order for the consideration of the committee?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is a hypothetical question.

Mr. HOOKER. The House should be informed by the Chair.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. My object is to raise the question of consideration between the two bills. Of course if we vote down the fortification bill, that will enable us to reach for consideration the deficiency appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question before the House at this time is whether the House will direct the committee to consider the fortification bill.

Mr. SAYERS. Is not the motion to lay aside the fortification bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes, that is the question.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 17, nays 131, not voting 177; as follows:

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:
To Mr. NORWOOD, for the remainder of the week, on account of pressing and important business.
To Mr. HEMPHILL, for ten days, on account of important business.
To Mr. COTHRAN, for two weeks, on account of important business.
To Mr. DE LANO, indefinitely, on account of important business.
To Mr. HATCH, for two weeks.
To Mr. CLARDY, for fifteen days, on account of important business.
Mr. WEAVER. I want to make this remark, and I will not make objection to the granting of these leaves. Some of us have to stay here until Congress adjourns and it is as much the duty of one as of another when important business is to be done, and if we grant leaves of absence here we are confronted with the situation that there is no quorum present.

CALL OF ROLL.

Mr. SAYERS. I demand the regular order.
The SPEAKER. One hundred and seventy-five members have responded to their names.
Mr. SAYERS. I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call of the House.
The motion was agreed to.
The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the Committee of the Whole be instructed to pass over the fortification appropriation bill, and upon this question the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Clerk will call the roll.
Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the order for the yeas and nays.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] asks unanimous consent to reconsider the order for the yeas and nays.
Mr. TOWNSHEND. I object.
Mr. PAYSON. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. PAYSON. Would a motion to reconsider be in order?
The SPEAKER. It would.
Mr. PAYSON. Then I move to reconsider the vote ordering the yeas and nays.
The question was put, and the Speaker announced that the "ayes" seemed to have it.
Mr. TOWNSHEND. I call for a division.
Mr. PAYSON. I withdraw the motion to reconsider.
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll, and as many as are in favor of passing over the fortification bill will say "ay" when their names are called.
The question was taken; and there were—yeas 16, nays 138, not voting 171.

During the roll-call,

Mr. McCOMAS. Can I vote to make a quorum?

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen who are here and desire to make a quorum should vote when their names are called, and could afterwards withdraw their names if their votes be not necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. McCOMAS. I ask unanimous consent to vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McCOMAS] asks unanimous consent to vote. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WEAVER. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. TRACEY. I object.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. HATCH with Mr. STEWART, of Vermont, on all political questions until further notice.

Mr. BARRY with Mr. RUSSELL, of Connecticut, for the remainder of the day.

Mr. STAHLNECKER with Mr. McCORMICK, for the remainder of the day.

Mr. LYNCH with Mr. PUGSLEY, for the remainder of the day.

The SPEAKER. Upon this question the yeas are 16 and the nays are 138. No quorum has voted.

Mr. SAYERS. I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The doors will now be closed——

Mr. KEAN. Mr. Speaker, is it in order to move that the House do now adjourn?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. KEAN. I make that motion.

Mr. SAYERS. I hope the gentleman will not press that motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first announce the result. On this call 163 gentlemen have answered to their names.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Does my friend [Mr. SAYERS] wish to postpone this matter?

Mr. SAYERS. No, sir.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Is it intended to call a caucus to consider it? [Laughter.]

Mr. SAYERS. No, sir. I want the action of the House now.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. KEAN that the House do now adjourn; and there were—ayes 50, noes 51.

Mr. SOWDEN and Mr. TOWNSHEND called for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken and the yeas and nays were ordered—ayes 25, noes 61.

Mr. SAYERS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. KEAN. Pending that, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That is the pending motion. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 11, noes 50.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. This question does not require a quorum. In the first place it is a proceeding in connection with a call of the House; and in the second place it is a proceeding in relation to a motion to adjourn, neither of which propositions requires a quorum. The noes have it. The House refuses to lay on the table the motion to reconsider. The question now is on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question having been put——

The SPEAKER. The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I call for a division.

The question being again taken, there were—ayes 69, noes 9.

So the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The question recurring on ordering the yeas and nays, the yeas and nays were not ordered, no member voting in favor thereof.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. A call of the House having been ordered, the regular order, if the House desires to compel the attendance of absent members, is the introduction of a resolution requiring the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring in absentees.

Mr. SAYERS. I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I object.

The SPEAKER (having put the question) said: The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Division.

The question having been again taken,

The SPEAKER said: On this question the ayes are 77, the noes 2.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire a ruling upon the question whether a quorum is demanded on this vote.

The SPEAKER. Of course a quorum is not demanded where the House is proceeding under a call. No quorum is required to order a call nor is a quorum necessary to dispense with proceedings under the call. The ayes have it; and further proceedings under the call are dispensed with. The question recurs, Will the House direct the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to pass over the fortification appropriation bill. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. NELSON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. NELSON, there were—ayes 5, noes 47.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I raise the question of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The question of "no quorum" can not be raised. The very object frequently of calling the yeas and nays is to ascertain whether a quorum is present——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Does the Chair hold that upon a motion to reconsider a quorum is not required?

The SPEAKER. Upon a motion to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered, a quorum is not necessary. No quorum is required to order the yeas and nays. The Constitution provides simply that the yeas and nays shall be taken upon the demand of one-fifth of those present. On this question the noes have it; and the House refuses to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. KILGORE. I move that the House adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 49, noes 54.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let us have tellers.

Tellers were not ordered, only 9 voting in favor thereof.

So tellers were refused; and the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is now, Shall the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be directed to pass over the fortification appropriation bill? On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered. The question will now be taken.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 19, nays 136, not voting 169; as follows:

By Mr. WALKER: Petition of Elizabeth R. Eddington, late administratrix and widow of J. J. Maples, for reference of his claim to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, August 15, 1888.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

Mr. REAGAN. If it be the proper time to do so, I desire to give notice that to-morrow morning, or at the earliest period practicable, I shall call up the motion to refer the President's message to the Committee on Finance for the purpose of submitting some remarks.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 18th instant, reports of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in regard to certificates of incorporation filed in the Department of the Interior by such railroad companies as have been granted the right of way through Indian reservations by acts passed in the Forty-ninth or Fiftieth Congress, etc.; which, on motion of Mr. DAWES, was, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a petition of members of the bar of Washington Territory, praying for the passage of a bill creating two new judicial districts in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PADDOCK presented a petition of the Woman's National Christian Temperance Union, of Chicago, Ill., praying that an appropriation of $75,000 be made to the Industrial Home for Mormon women in Salt Lake City, Utah; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. STEWART presented a petition of citizens of Winnemucca, Nev., praying for the passage of a bill for the better protection of the Yellowstone National Park; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. VEST presented the petition of John T. Gladwill and other citizens of Boone County, Missouri, and the petition of T. J. Welch and other citizens of Dent County, Missouri, praying for certain amendments of the interstate-commerce law; which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 3358) for the relief of M. S. Hellman, of Canyon City, Oregon, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. TURPIE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3342) granting a pension to David Myers, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. VEST introduced a bill (S. 3447) amendatory of "An act relating to postal crimes and amendatory of the statutes therein mentioned," approved June 18, 1888, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. SAWYER introduced a bill (S. 3448) granting a pension to Charles H. Green; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and it hereby is, instructed to inquire into the matter of deposits in the late Freedman's Savings and Trust Company of Washington, and report how many white depositors of said company there are who were in no way connected with the alleged mismanagement and failure of said company, and the amount of deposits due to them respectively.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am moved to the introduction of this resolution by the circumstance that since the passage of the bill by the Senate two or three weeks ago, which drew the color line on the depositors in that institution in favor of those of African descent and against all others, there have come to my knowledge several instances of poor white persons, small depositors, one an old Irish woman who brought me her book last night covering thirty or forty dollars, a poor old widow. The only reason why, according to the Senate's decision the other day, she can not be treated to her share of what can be got out of it or whatever Congress chooses to give is the fact that she is not of African descent.

I stated when the bill passed (although I did not take a division because it was thought from the pairs that there would be no quorum) that it appeared to me that that sort of discrimination was not only wrong in principle but unjust in practice. The answer was that the white persons who were depositors in that bank were the people who got in there and got possession of it to break it. That was a matter for consideration, of course, but there ought to have been some way of discriminating between that class of depositors who defrauded the bank and those who were innocent, even if they were white.

I have introduced this resolution in the hope that again calling attention to it, and it appearing that there are many instances of poor white people in this District who were innocent depositors there of small sums of money, and who, if anybody is to be provided for, ought to share with the others of whatever color, the Committee on Finance will find some means of correcting what, it appears to me as the matter now stands, is a great wrong.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the resolution read again.

Mr. BECK. Has the resolution been agreed to?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not.

Mr. BECK. Then I shall ask that it go over until to-morrow morning. I think we can give good reasons why the white depositors should not be paid by the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair had called for objection to the consideration of the resolution, and there was none; but he will recognize the objection of the Senator from Kentucky, and the resolution will lie over until to-morrow, and be printed.

Mr. BECK. Then I propose to show why this should not be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over on objection.

FOREIGN PATENTS.

Mr. HOAR. I offer the following resolution, for which I ask present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Patents be requested to examine into the matter of the rights of citizens of the United States in patents issued by foreign countries for inventions made by them, and whether further action is necessary to secure and protect such rights; and whether it is desirable that provision should be made that the United States be represented at any future international conference on that subject by persons especially learned in the patent law and the interests of American inventors.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CHACE. I should like to have the resolution again read.

Mr. HOAR. It is a mere resolution of inquiry.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

PUYALLUP AND OTHER INDIANS IN WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. MITCHELL. I offer a resolution and ask that it be read, ordered printed, and lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas it is provided in the treaty with the Puyallup and other tribes of Indians, ratified by the Senate on the 3d day of March, 1855, that the whole or any portion of certain specified lands reserved to such tribe of Indians by said treaty may, under the direction of the President of the United States, be surveyed into lots and assigned to such individuals or families as are willing to avail themselves of the privilege and will locate on the same as a permanent home on the same terms and subject to the same regulations as are provided in the sixth article of the treaty with the Omahas, so far as the same may be applicable; and

Whereas said sixth article of the treaty with the Omahas provides that if any such person or family shall at any time neglect or refuse to occupy and till a portion of the lands assigned and on which they have located, or shall rove from place to place, the President may, if the patent shall have been issued, cancel the assignment, and may also withhold from such person or family their proportion of the annuities or other moneys due them, until they shall have returned to such permanent home and resumed the pursuits of industry; and in default of their return the tract may be declared abandoned and thereafter assigned to some other person or family of such tribe, or disposed of as is provided for the disposition of the excess of said land; and

Whereas it has been alleged that there has been neglect on the part of a large number of persons and families to whom lands have been assigned under such treaty stipulations, to occupy and till any portion of the lands so assigned, and otherwise have failed to comply with the terms of said treaty stipulations: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to inquire and report to the Senate at his earliest practicable convenience whether any persons or families belonging to the Puyallup tribe of Indians in Washington Territory have at any time, and when and for what time, neglected or refused to occupy and till a portion of the lands assigned to them, or any of them, and, if so, what persons or families and what lands, and whether such persons or families, or any of them, have or have not been roving from place to place, and whether in any other respect whatever any of such Indians or families have failed to comply with the treaty stipulations and laws of Congress applicable to the allotment and patenting of lands to such Indians, and, if so, in what respect and to what extent.

Resolved further, That the Secretary of the Interior shall report to the Senate what portion, if any, of the lands of the Puyallup reservation in Washington Territory have never yet been assigned or patented to any of the families or individuals of such tribe, with a description of the location of such lands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will lie over until to-morrow and be printed.

NATIONAL-BANK DEPOSITS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution offered yesterday by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], coming over under objection.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. SHERMAN was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to furnish the Senate a statement of the amount deposited with each national banking association holding public money on the 1st day of August, 1888, and the amount and description of United States bonds and other securities pledged for the repayment of such deposits.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio if he would have any objection, or would it in any way interfere with the object he has in view in this resolution, to put in an amendment asking for similar information in regard to the condition of the Treasury, say on September 30, 1878?

I hold in my hand House Executive Document No. 12, Forty-fifth Congress, third session, being "A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in reply to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 4th instant, asking information whether any money belonging to the Treasury of the United States," etc., and I have the response of Hon. John Sherman, then Secretary of the Treasury, showing the balance of loan account on the 30th day of September, 1878. The list is headed "List of balances standing to the credit of the Treasury of the United States, etc." September 30, 1878, there was a balance of $64,608,433.49 on deposit in the various national banks and designated depositories, and in addition to that vast sum there were also balances of general account which was the currency account, of $6,535,829.11, which, added to the other amount, would aggregate considerably over $71,000,000 at that time.

I also find in Executive Document No. 13, Forty-fifth Congress, third session, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in response to a resolution of the House, dated December 19, 1878, also signed by Secretary Sherman. It gives the amount on deposit at various times, beginning with February 1, 1878, and running up to December 1, 1878, and also shows that on October 1, 1878, there was $64,207,814.63; and then in a supplemental report to it, House Executive Document No. 25, Forty-fifth Congress, third session, a letter likewise from Hon. John Sherman, Secretary of the Treasury, dated January 15, 1879, an additional list is given. In these lists given by the Secretary of the Treasury at that time and in the reports or in the resolutions I do not find any reference to the subject-matter included or embraced at the end of the Senator's present resolution, and that is—and the amount and the description of United States bonds and other securities pledged for the repayment of such deposits.

I think that is a very important question; and in order that we may understand how the Treasury Department has been managed at different times, we should know what amount and description of United States bonds and other securities were pledged for the repayment of the $71,000,000 held by national banks and designated depositories from the Treasury at that time.

The distinguished Senator from Ohio is recognized as one of the greatest financiers of the age. He was Secretary of the Treasury and certainly conducted the business of the Treasury Department at that time upon sound and correct financial principles. I have no doubt it would be very interesting and instructive to the country to see what kind of securities he called for at the time when there were $71,000,000 of the money of the Treasury deposited in national banks and designated depositories, as compared with the kind of securities that may now be held for the amounts deposited. I merely make the suggestion to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. The law of the United States then, as now, required security for all deposits, either in the form of United States bonds or other securities. If the Senator from Missouri will look into the documents furnished freely by me at that time, he will see not only the details of the deposits but why they were made. As a matter of course, the securities were only Government securities, because during all that time and until recently no other form of security has been allowed, and I do not know that any other is now taken.

The reason why the amount was so large, as the Senator ought to know, was because at that time we were selling bonds under the refunding act, and they reached at one time a much larger sum than he has stated. The law required that those deposits should be made with national banks designated as Government depositories. When bonds were called notice of ninety days had to be given, and that notice contained a description of the bonds called. As a matter of course bonds had to be sold bearing a lower rate of interest in order to meet these calls. They were usually sold three months in advance of the call, or as required to meet the call. In the mean time the money received for the new bonds was deposited with national-bank depositories by the express provisions of the law, and to prevent an undue hoarding in the Treasury of the United States.

While I was Secretary of the Treasury, since the Senator alludes to it, I will say that in every case security was taken in the form of United States bonds for an amount greater than the amount deposited. There was always a margin. Besides that, in no case was any money deposited with national banks unless it was received through the loan department, for bonds sold, or for internal revenue collected. The law did not allow in any case—nor does it now—customs dues to be deposited with national banks; they must be deposited in the Treasury of the United States. Whether that law has been violated, is one of the things I want to inquire about.

Now, I have no idea that the Secretary of the Treasury objects to giving this information.

Mr. COCKRELL. Nor I; not at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well. Nor have I any idea that he would violate the law; but it is necessary to have these documents furnished whenever called for, and it is better to have them called for at a particular date, say the 1st of August, because at that time the account will have been made up, and the statement can be sent in without any difficulty.

It will appear, I have no doubt, that a very large sum, probably $60,000,000, or $70,000,000, or $80,000,000, was on deposit during refunding operations in banks, for that is stated by me as Secretary of the Treasury in my report. That is a very different transaction from that which is carried on now. The money then was deposited in the banks by private persons who bought our bonds. We never delivered the bonds until the money was paid into the Treasury of the United States, but the deposits were made to the credit of the United States in any national-bank depositories who qualified themselves by giving the requisite security under the law.

It was the conceded right of the depositor to select his own depository. If the Senator from Missouri had the good fortune to have $10,000 of money and deposited it for the purchase of bonds he selected his own depository, took a certificate from that depository, and sent it to the Treasury Department, and the deposit remained during the ninety days required by the law. In the mean time the depositor would get his new bond. It would bear interest when issued, and at the expiration of the call the called bond would be paid off with this money. The money would lie to the credit of the United States during that period of time unless the Government saw fit to withdraw the money from the bank, which it did not commonly do, as care was taken not to withdraw money from circulation during the period of the call.

Mr. COCKRELL. Do I understand the Senator from Ohio to say that the bidder for that United States bond deposited his bond and then waited three months before he got it, losing the interest on it during that time?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, no; he did not deposit his bond at all; he paid his money.

Mr. COCKRELL. I mean did he deposit his money and leave it in the United States Treasury for three months without any interest?

Mr. SHERMAN. He deposited his money, and he did not get his bond until some time afterwards, sometimes in thirty, sixty, or ninety days, but the new bond bore interest from the date of the payment of the money.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is the point. I wanted to know whether the purchasers of United States bonds deposited their money and left it in these designated depositories for ninety days before they got their bonds, and in the mean time lost their interest upon their money?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, no; they got their bonds according to the convenience of the Treasury Department, and sometimes they could not get them for thirty, sixty, or ninety days.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let me ask this question: Was it not the fact, as shown by the official reports of Secretary Sherman, while Secretary of the Treasury, that an absolute sale of the new bond was made and the money received, that is by being deposited, before the old bond was called in?

Mr. SHERMAN. As the records show, in order to save that double interest I frequently called in advance, and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] knows it as well as any one. Having confidence in the credit of the Government, I frequently called thirty and sixty days in advance of the sale in order to save the double interest; but under the operation of the law the effect was that the United States paid double interest, to avoid which I often issued the call thirty days in advance, because I had to give notice to the holders of these bonds for ninety days, three months. I had to give the notice specifying the numbers of the bonds before I could stop the interest on those bonds and call them in; and in the mean time I proceeded to sell bonds. Sometimes I would anticipate $5,000,000 or $10,000,000; and when Congress met at the very year that is suggested, when the Democratic party came into power and threatened to repeal the resumption act, the sale of bonds was immediately stopped, and I was caught with a $10,000,000 outstanding call, which I had to pay out of the surplus revenue.

That is the way the business was conducted then, with the utmost care, to save this double interest, because the law required the notice to be given, and frequently the commencement of the sale of bonds to cover the call did not come until ten, fifteen, twenty, or even thirty days after the call was outstanding.

Mr. COCKRELL. As I understand from the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, which I have read carefully, the Senator from Ohio, then Secretary of the Treasury, reported the fact that here was a law requiring him to give ninety days' notice in calling in the redeemable bonds before he could compel the holders of them either to cease drawing interest or to present them, and that he could not as Secretary of the Treasury afford to make, or be justified in making, a call for its bonds until he had the money to pay them.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not say that.

Mr. COCKRELL. And the effect of that was that the bonds were called after the money had been received, and the purchaser got three months' interest practically before the old bonds were delivered. He got three months' interest upon the new bond, while the old bond was also drawing three months' interest—ninety days.

Mr. SHERMAN. That was not true as stated by the Senator, but I will give it exactly: Under the provisions of the law ninety days' notice had to be given when bonds were called. A prudent and an exact Secretary of the Treasury would probably sell bonds in advance of the call, and I expect the Senator from Missouri would be one of those, because he would not confide in anything. He would not call a bond until he had the money for it; but I did while I was there.

Mr. COCKRELL. Not to any great amount of them, as shown by your reports. I think you will find precious few of them.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was generally about $10,000,000 ahead, so that I was caught when Congress met, as I have already stated.

Mr. COCKRELL. That was a very small amount when you were refunding $600,000,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Missouri ought to know that the sales at that time amounted to an enormous sum.

Mr. COCKRELL. In about eighteen months you were negotiating some $600,000,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator would think that would be probably $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 a month, but it sometimes rose to over $100,000,000 a month. As a matter of course, during that time there was double interest, and it was the very effect of the law; and I may say that has been the law since the foundation of the Government. It is the law to-day, although the time has been shortened, I think, somewhat.

Mr. COCKRELL. Thirty days.

Mr. SHERMAN. Thirty days.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Ohio when Secretary of the Treasury recommended a change in the law.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly I did, and I sought to avoid this double interest.

Mr. President, this is mere by-play, because there is no necessity of reprinting those old documents, for we have them already on the public files. You will find there full reports, the names of the banks and the amount deposited with each, and the fluctuations in those deposits, which are all shown by the public documents. What I want is the ordinary statement showing how much money has been deposited with the national banks and with each national bank, where it is concentrated. What use I may make of it is not a matter for me to state, probably nothing. If it is all right, I shall say nothing more about it, except to give credit to the Secretary of the Treasury for anything he has done in the right direction. If there has been an undue and unnatural accumulation of this money in the hands of banks, and particular banks, perhaps it will be made a subject of comment. At any rate, it is a public fact that ought to be stated at all times promptly and readily, and I have no doubt whatever that the Secretary of the Treasury can prepare this statement in a day and send it in.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I hope the resolution will be adopted. The matter has been discussed before the Finance Committee for several months in one form and another. I think the development will be that no money collected from customs has been so deposited. That is the impression I have from the slight investigation I have made, but still the Senate ought to have the facts, whatever they may develop.

Mr. COCKRELL. As I understood the Senator from Ohio, he stated that these deposits were left there in order to prevent the accumulation of a large surplus in the Treasury at the time.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; because the law authorized them.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand that.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state another fact to the Senator. Perhaps the persons depositing money might make an arrangement for accommodation with the banks to advance the money for them. I do not know whether such was the case, but that was a matter between them and the banks.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have here the finance report of 1878, in which the Secretary of the Treasury said:

> The three months' public notice required by the fourth section of the refunding act to be given to the holders of the 5-20 bonds to be redeemed, necessarily involves a loss to the Government by the payment of double interest during that time. The notice should not be given until subscriptions are made or are reasonably certain to be made. When they are made and the money is paid into the Treasury, whether it is kept there idle during the three months or deposited with national banks under existing law, the Government not only pays interest on both classes of bonds during the ninety days, but, if the sales are large, the hoarding of large sums may disturb the market. Under existing law this is unavoidable; and to mitigate it, the Secretary deemed it expedient during the last summer to make calls in anticipation of subscriptions, but this, though legal, might, in case of failure of subscriptions, embarrass the Government in paying called bonds. The long notice required by law is not necessary in the interest of the holder of the bonds, for, as the calls are made by public notice and the bonds are indicated and specified by class, date, and number, in the order of their numbers and issue, he by ordinary diligence can know beforehand when his bonds in due course will probably be called, and will not be taken by surprise.

The Secretary recommended that the time should be reduced.

Mr. SHERMAN. What was the date of that report?

Mr. COCKRELL. This is the finance report of 1878, made December 2, 1878.

I simply desired to call attention to the fact that this is not the first time there have been large sums of money in the national depositories under different administrations. It seems to be unavoidable under the system which exists. As a matter of course, I am in favor of the resolution, but I should have been gratified very much if the Senator from Ohio would have consented to put in an amendment asking for the same information in regard to the securities held in 1878 and 1879 that is called for in regard to the securities now held.

Mr. SHERMAN. That has been published already.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 94) for the relief of Perez Dickinson, surviving partner of the late firm of Cowan & Dickinson.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 288) for the erection of a public building at Sioux City, Iowa;

A bill (S. 509) authorizing an increase of pension in cases of deafness;

A bill (S. 2106) granting a pension to William Kelsey;

A bill (S. 2116) to provide aid to State homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States;

A bill (S. 1162) for the relief of Susan E. Alger;

A bill (S. 2118) granting a pension to Richard H. Van Dorin;

A bill (S. 2500) granting a pension to Gertrude K. Lyford;

A bill (S. 2724) for the relief of H. H. Helper;

A bill (S. 2833) granting a pension to Caspar Blanke, of Portland, Oregon;

A bill (S. 3219) to increase the pension of Keyes P. Cool; and Joint resolution (S. R. 62) in recognition of the services of Joseph Francis.

FORT HALL RESERVATION.

Mr. DAWES submitted the following report:

> The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8662) to accept and ratify an agreement made with the Shoshone and Bannack Indians, for the surrender and relinquishment to the United States of a portion of the Fort Hall reservation, in the Territory of Idaho, for the purposes of a town-site, and for the grant of a right of way through said reservation to the Utah and Northern Railway Company, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:
> That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same.
> That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Add to said amendment the following:
> "Provided, That all lands acquired by said railway company near its station at Pocatello, for its use for station grounds, depot buildings, shops, tracks, sidetracks, turn-outs, yards, and for water purposes, as hereinbefore provided, shall, whenever used by said railway company, or its assigns, for other purposes, be forfeited and revert to the United States and be subject to the other provisions of this act."
> Also insert after the word "provided," in line 8, page 9, of the bill, the word "further."
> And the Senate agreed to the same.
> H. L. DAWES,
> O. H. PLATT,
> JAMES K. JONES,
> Managers on the part of the Senate.
> S. W. PEEL,
> JOHN M. ALLEN,
> B. W. PERKINS,
> Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the Calendar under Rule VIII is in order, and the Secretary will report the first order of business by title.

The first bill in order on the Calendar was announced to be the bill (S. 1917) for the relief of John R. Reynolds.

Mr. DOLPH. I move to take up for consideration Calendar No. 2076, being Senate bill 3420.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator will let us go on with the Calendar.

Mr. DOLPH. This is a bill reported unanimously from the Committee on Military Affairs, and simply directs the Secretary of War to make a report on certain claims of Oregon and other States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill whose title has been read by the Chief Clerk being in order, the Senator from Oregon moves——

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator will not insist on his motion, but will let us go on with the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill the title of which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 3420) authorizing the Secretary of War to ascertain what amount of money has been expended by the States of California, Oregon, and Nevada for military purposes in aid of the Government of the United States during the war of the rebellion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon. [Putting the question.] By the sound the noes have it.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask for a division.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us have the yeas and nays and be done with it. If you want to consume all the morning and fritter it away, let us know it.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] is necessarily detained from the Senate and will be until 12 o'clock. At 12 o'clock I shall move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the fisheries treaty.

Mr. BECK. Say when you are ready and we shall all help you.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Alabama has the floor.

Mr. BECK. I beg pardon. I thought it better for you to name your time, and then we shall make no objection at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks that upon this question the yeas and nays may be entered upon the Journal.

Mr. DOLPH. As there seems to be a thin Senate this morning, I will not insist on a call of the roll, but this is a bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs simply proposing an inquiry and report on matters already pending before the Secretary of War.

Mr. COCKRELL. We shall get to it by going on with the Calendar.

Mr. DOLPH. We have not been proceeding in that way.

JOHN R. AND JAMES M. REYNOLDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first order of business, whose title has been recited by the Chief Clerk, has heretofore been read at length.

Mr. CULLOM. Let the title be again read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be again stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. Order of Business No. 1906, being the bill (S. 1917) for the relief of John R. Reynolds.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to John R. Reynolds the sum of $35,996, and to the personal representative of James M. Reynolds, deceased, the sum of $35,996, the same to be accepted in full payment, satisfaction, and discharge of all claim of the said John R. Reynolds and James M. Reynolds upon and against the United States for property sold to or taken and used by the United States Army during the war by or from said parties, or either of them, in the State of Mississippi.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill went over when previously called, under objection of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], who intimated that he desired to debate it. He is not now present.

Mr. DOLPH. I call for the reading of the report.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over under objection, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. PAYNE. The bill just read by the Secretary it is understood will go over, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] not being here; but I desire that it may not lose its place on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. That has already been ordered.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

The next business on the Calendar was Order of Business 1915, being the resolution submitted by Mr. MORGAN relating to the treaty between the United States and Great Britain.

Mr. HARRIS. Let that go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be passed over without prejudice.

PURCHASERS OF LANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2715) for the relief of certain parties who have paid $2.50 per acre for United States Government lands reduced in price to $1.25 per acre by the act of Congress approved June 15, 1880.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments, in section 1, line 5, after the word "have," to insert "since the 15th day of June, 1880;" in line 8, after the word "by," to strike out "the act of June 15, 1880, entitled" and insert "an act entitled;" and in line 10, after "United States," to insert "approved June 15, 1880;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That in all cases where it shall, upon due proof being made, appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that parties have, since the 15th day of June, 1880, paid $2.50 per acre for lands which were reduced in price to $1.25 per acre by an act entitled "An act relating to the public lands of the United States," approved June 15, 1880, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to repay, out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to such parties, their legal representatives or assigns, the excess price of $1.25 paid for such lands; and that the Secretary of the Interior shall draw his warrant on the Treasury for such amounts as may be found due the claimants under this act.

SEC. 2. That the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall make all necessary rules and issue all necessary instructions to carry the provisions of this act into effect.

Mr. BECK. There is no report accompanying this bill, and I should like the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] to explain the scope of it. Wherever lands were within certain railroad limits, for example, 10 miles on either side of the railroad, the alternate sections were given to the railroad, and the price was $2.50 an acre for the reserved sections. Very many persons obtained these lands, paid the money, and settled upon them or speculated upon them. Now, at the end of the time if an act is passed reducing the remnant of those lands, if the United States failed to sell at $2.50, to $1.25, do you propose to go back and pay former purchasers? How far does it go back?

Mr. BERRY. By the act of June 15, 1880, it was provided that the lands referred to by the Senator not heretofore settled should thereafter be sold at $1.25 an acre, but before the information was obtained various parties bought the land and paid $2.50 an acre. It was a mistake in the Land Office.

Mr. BECK. I see that the limitation inserted by way of amendment relieves the difficulty I had.

Mr. BERRY. It only applies to that character of lands, and it is recommended by the Secretary of the Interior that the bill shall pass.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. PLATT. Can the Senator from Arkansas refer me to the act? I do not wish to delay the passage of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. June 15, 1880.

Mr. PLATT. I can not find it by the index.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

CIRCUIT COURT POWERS.

The bill (S. 3234) to provide for writs of error to the district court of the United States for the western district of Arkansas in certain cases was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That there shall be, and is hereby, established a circuit court of the United States in and for the western district of Arkansas, for the northern district of Mississippi, and for the western district of South Carolina, respectively, as the said districts are now constituted by law. And said circuit courts, respectively, shall be held at the times and places now provided by law for the holding of the district courts in said districts respectively.

SEC. 2. That said circuit courts, respectively, shall have and exercise, within their respective districts, the same original and appellate jurisdiction as are or may be conferred by law upon the other circuit courts of the United States. And all suits, causes, and proceedings now pending in the said several respective district courts, and in the district court of the district of West Virginia, in and concerning which the said district courts exercise circuit court powers, shall be transferred to and belong to the jurisdiction of said circuit courts, respectively, and shall be proceeded with accordingly.

SEC. 3. That there shall be appointed for each of said circuit courts in this act mentioned, by the circuit court judge of the circuit, a clerk, who shall take the oath and give the bond required by law for clerks of circuit courts, who shall discharge all the duties and be entitled to all the fees and emoluments prescribed by general law. And the United States marshals of said respective districts shall act as marshals of said circuit courts, and the United States district attorneys for said respective districts shall discharge the duties of said district attorneys in said circuit courts.

SEC. 4. That said circuit courts, respectively, shall have power to make such orders and directions as shall be proper for the transfer from said district courts of all causes, proceedings, matters, records, files, and papers as by force of this act should belong to the said circuit courts.

SEC. 5. That the provisions of the act entitled "An act to amend sections 533, 556, 571, and 572 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to courts in Arkansas and other States," approved January 31, 1877, conferring upon the district court for the eastern district of Arkansas, held at Helena, circuit court powers, and section 571 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and all causes, suits, proceedings, records, files, and papers in matters now pending in such district court at Helena, and in the district court of the district of West Virginia, in or under the exercise of circuit court powers or jurisdiction, shall be removed and transferred to the circuit court for the eastern district of Arkansas and for the district of West Virginia, respectively, in the same manner and with the same effect as is hereinbefore in this act provided in respect of said other districts.

SEC. 6. That whenever grand or petit jurors are summoned for service in said courts in said respective districts in this act named they shall be the grand and petit jurors for both said circuit and district courts so held at the same time and place.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. HOAR. A question has occurred to me in reference to this bill, and I would like to have the Senate consent to lay it aside for a moment until I can consult with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over informally, and recurred to when desired by the Senator from Massachusetts.

JACKSON (MISS.) MUNICIPAL ELECTION.

The resolution reported by Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, from the Committee on the Judiciary, July 23, 1888, expressing condemnation of certain United States officials who assisted in suppressing the vote of colored citizens of Jackson, Miss., etc., was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] gave notice of his intention to call this resolution up on Thursday next. The Chief Clerk will report the next succeeding order of business.

FEES OF EXAMINING SURGEONS.

The bill (S. 1733) establishing the fees and expenses of examining surgeons was announced as next in order.

Mr. CULLOM. If there is any member of the committee reporting that bill who is here, I should like to know what changes from the present law are proposed in the measure; I do not know myself. I would not like to vote for it without understanding as to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was reported by the chairman of the Committee on Pensions [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. CULLOM. I ask that the bill be passed over informally.

Mr. PADDOCK. The chairman of the committee is at present absent. I ask that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered.

CIRCUIT COURT POWERS.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senate now to go back to the bill passed over on my request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes the consideration of Order of Business 1922, being the bill (S. 3234) to provide for writs of error to the district court of the United States for the western district of Arkansas in certain cases.

Mr. HOAR. The doubt occurred to me after the bill was read whether the phraseology would not amount to a creation of new circuits in addition to the nine we now have; but on consulting the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] he is satisfied the bill can bear no such construction.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I should like to have the bill laid aside for a short time in order that I may examine another point that suggests itself to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

SOPHIA B. MOORE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3902) for the relief of Sophia B. Moore.

Mr. DOLPH. I object to that. I reported it adversely last session, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be passed over without prejudice.

ABRAHAM J. BUCKLES.

The bill (H. R. 9263) granting an increase of pension to Abraham J. Buckles was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to increase the pension of Abraham J. Buckles, late second lieutenant Company E, Twentieth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, to $45 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LACHLAN H. M'INTOSH.

The bill (H. R. 9830) for the relief of Lachlan H. McIntosh was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to restore to the pension-rolls the name of Lachlan H. McIntosh, late captain's clerk United States steamer Scourge, war with Mexico.

Mr. CULLOM. I think the name read by the Chief Clerk is different from the way it appears on the Calendar, where it is "Sachen H. McIntosh."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The name in the bill would control.

Mr. CULLOM. I know that, but I did not know but that there might be a mistake about the name.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is an error in the Calendar.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JANE SMALLRIDGE.

The bill (H. R. 2190) granting a pension to Jane Smallridge was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Jane Smallridge, of Fairfield, Iowa, widow of John Smallridge, late a private of Company F, Third Regiment Iowa Cavalry, at $12 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDWIN J. GODFREY.

The bill (H. R. 9363) granting a pension to Edwin J. Godfrey was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Edwin J. Godfrey, late of Company B, Second New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN S. BRYANT.

The bill (H. R. 5155) granting a pension to John S. Bryant was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of John S. Bryant, late a private in Company G, Twenty-ninth Maine Regiment Infantry Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the fisheries treaty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate do now proceed in open executive session to the consideration of the fisheries treaty.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] made a suggestion in regard to the circuit court bill which is just ready for its passage by the Senate, and it will take but a moment to write the amendment which he desires. Perhaps the Senator from Alabama, when he proceeds, will give way when that amendment is ready, and will allow us to interrupt him for a moment.

Mr. MORGAN. I shall have no objection to being interrupted, but we shall have to go into legislative session.

Mr. HOAR. That will take but a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The executive session has not yet been announced.

Mr. FRYE. I withdraw my motion for the present.

CIRCUIT COURT POWERS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I would like to call up Order of Business 1922, being the bill (S. 3234) to provide for writs of error to the district court of the United States for the western district of Arkansas in certain cases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the first section, at the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], by adding at the end these words—striking out the period after the word "respectively" and inserting a comma—and also at Helena, in the eastern district of Arkansas, at the same time that the district court is now held.

The effect of that is simply to turn the circuit court powers of the district judge over to the circuit court, and the circuit court to have a session at that place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read from the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is, at the end of section 1, line 10, after the word "respectively," to strike out the period and insert a comma, and add:

and also at Helena, in the eastern district of Arkansas, at the same time that the district court is now held.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been reported to the Senate, this amendment will be taken as an amendment to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendments as amended were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read:

"A bill to abolish circuit court powers of certain district courts of the United States, and for other purposes."

THOMAS H. SAULSBURY.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, reported the following resolution submitted by Mr. GRAY on the 10th instant; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, to Miss Mary E. Saulsbury, sister of Thomas H. Saulsbury, deceased, late clerk to the Committee on Engrossed Bills, the sum of $1,095, being an amount equal to six months' salary at the rate per diem allowed by law to the clerk aforesaid; said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

SOPHIA B. MOORE.

Mr. FRYE. I renew my motion.

Mr. DOLPH. I call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina. I withdraw my objection to the consideration of Order of Business 1937, being the bill (H. R. 3902) for the relief of Sophia B. Moore. I find that the bill in regard to this claim is already referred to the Court of Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] is pending.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the fisheries treaty in open executive session.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is now in open executive session. If there be no objection, the reading of the Journal of the last open executive session will be dispensed with. The Executive Clerk will report the treaty by title.

The EXECUTIVE CLERK. Treaty between the United States and Great Britain concerning the interpretation of the convention of October 20, 1818, signed at Washington February 15, 1888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to postpone the further consideration of this treaty until the Wednesday after the first Monday in December next.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, yesterday when the executive session was changed to legislative or adjourned, I was discussing the question of the three protocols agreed upon between the United States and Great Britain, or rather the two that had been adopted and one rejected by Great Britain, with a view to show that the consideration of this treaty ought to be postponed at this time in order to enable the last protocol to have its operation on the fisheries of the northeastern waters, so that we should be able to demonstrate what was the actual value of the privileges conceded to us by the treaty of 1888, the one now proposed for ratification. I have demonstrated that the situation we are in at this time in respect of the importation of fresh fish into the United States was prescribed to this country by the action of the Republican party in 1871, and was also reaffirmed in the tariff law of 1883, and it was stated yesterday by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], on authority, after close investigation, that in the passage of the recent tariff bill which has come over to the Senate from the House of Representatives no effort was made on the part of any person to place a duty on fresh fish.

The duty on salt fish is a very inconsiderable sum, as we know, amounting in the year 1886 to $297,028.05, and it is alleged that all of the troubles we have had with Canada and with Great Britain in regard to the treaty of 1818 have grown out of the desire on the part of the British and Canadian Governments of having that little annual tax removed. It has always seemed to me that that was reducing the argument in this case to a minimum that is simply an absurdity. I can scarcely conceive that a country that has fishing interests that amount to from eighteen to twenty-five million dollars a year, according to the fluctuations of the run of the fish, and that has a market abroad for every pound of fish it chooses to send abroad, and that has no desire for a market in the United States except for the convenience of interchange or exchange of commodities, and in order to avoid the necessity of handling money when they can handle their own products in barter and exchange with us for our products and manufactures—that a country thus situated would scarcely put itself to the trouble of continual irritation and controversy with the Government of the United States for the purpose of saving to itself $297,028.05 annually in the tariff on fish, even if its people had that tax to pay, which is by no means true.

Now, I submit to the Senate, and I also submit it to the American people as being altogether an insufficient inducement for the purpose of keeping up this continual strife which has hung over the country, at intervals at least, interrupted by reciprocity treaties for twenty-three or twenty-four years, since 1818. No man in his senses can believe that the saving of that amount of money to the Canadian provinces annually is the cause of these troubles between us and Canada. There is no reason in the world why Canada might not dispose of all the salt fish that she has in any of the markets of the earth if she should choose to go abroad to sell them, and I repeat the only interest Canada has at all in the sale of salt fish to the people of the United States in preference to selling them to other countries that want them, is the mere fact that we are convenient to her borders and that we have articles which her people desire to purchase from us, which it is easier for them to purchase with the barter of fish than it would be for them to pay the money for which they would sell their fish in other markets abroad, to realize the sum of $297,028.05 annually.

It can not be that a people descended from British loins, with British blood in their veins and British brains in their heads and British courage in their hearts, could carry on this strife and this contention with us on such a subject as this for so paltry a consideration as that for so many years. Then the British Government and the Canadian Dominion and Newfoundland have been compelled at intervals to keep up considerable fleets, and they always maintain a more or less expensive police of the seas through their revenue marine and through other agencies of a naval character, and the expense they are put to annually by this controversy must exceed three or four times, as an average, the sum of $297,028.05.

Mr. FRYE. Where does the Senator get those figures?

Mr. MORGAN. I got them out of the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. FRYE. That is an entire mistake.

Mr. MORGAN. No. The Senator from Maine is wrong about it. It is exactly right. That is the amount of revenue we got from salt fish imported from Canadian waters in 1886.

Mr. FRYE. If the Senator will pardon me, the remission of duty alone when only salt fish was dutiable, seven years ago, was $695,000 in one year.

Mr. MORGAN. The remission of duties on salt fish?

Mr. FRYE. There was no duty on fresh fish.

Mr. SHERMAN. The great body of the fish now brought in is fresh fish, owing to the processes in use for freezing them.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no doubt the Senator from Massachusetts has worked out this sum with absolute particularity and care, and I have been willing to take his figures because of his known accuracy in such matters, and more than that, it corresponds precisely, within a few dollars, with the estimates which I have made and which have been submitted to me by others as being the sum in controversy between us as to the annual duty on salt fish.

There is some other motive for this on the Canadian side, and more than that, the suggestion which has been made by the Senator from Ohio is exactly correct, that the modern processes, not later than 1880, in their discovery and practice of freezing fish and bringing them in upon ice, enable us to pickle and to pack salted and dried fish on the coast of New England, or any other coast of the United States within convenient reach of Canada, and we are putting up now such vast quantities of fresh fish thus brought in upon the ice as that the importation of salt fish is continually declining. The Canadians, in my opinion, have nothing to do, if they choose to do so, but to wait until this problem works out its own solution, and nearly all the fish that will be brought into this country from the provincial waters, except a few of a particular character that are dried in the open air upon the coasts of Newfoundland for a particular market, a palatable fish that luxurious people indulge in, will come in fresh, frozen upon ice, and they will be pickled and packed and salted upon the coast of New England.

I do not see that there is any danger to American industries, or to American sailors, or to American commerce, or to American revenues from that source. I can understand, I think, though I do not know so very much about fish or fishing, that the importation of frozen fish to the coast of New England would give employment to a very large number of men, women, and children, who are there now constantly engaged in cleaning these fish and packing them for market and sending them off in various more or less attractive forms, and thereby the stimulus that we all desire to give to American industries would be very greatly increased. This problem, I repeat, is working its own solution in that direction. The Canadians are just as wise in the understanding of the progress of affairs in that direction as we are. More than that, I suppose Canadians have very much the same instincts that we have, very much the same affections, the same spirit of pride, national and personal; the same spirit of adhesion to what they conceive to be their rights, whether there is much money involved in their assertion or not.

We are in controversy with men as nearly like ourselves as blood and bone and muscle can make them, and we have but to determine how they would feel upon a question of this kind by ascertaining from our own sensibilities and our own natures how we should feel about it. My observation, though not an extensive one, has been that the people of Canada are almost literally homogeneous with the people of the United States. You can not draw the line between them except by ascertaining a man's nationality or his place of birth. The Canadian is adopted in all the societies of the United States with the same freedom that an American-born citizen is, and we welcome him here and we are welcomed there also by those people in the way that welcome is extended to people of your own kith and kindred. So in determining what is the real motive of this controversy between the United States and Canada I think it is a wise view of the subject, and a just one, to say that we shall measure Canadian motives and Canadian instincts and Canadian resolves about questions of this kind by precisely the same influences that we recognize as operating upon our own conduct.

Now, let us take the obverse view of this question, which has been presented here frequently, and yesterday I took occasion to refer to it at some length. What is the American motive that is now disclosed in the history of these transactions for the larger part of the controversy that we are conducting with Canada to-day? Mr. President, I can not conceal it from my own convictions, nor can it be concealed from the convictions and judgment of the people of the United States, that the motive which operates to induce us to take so much pains, to have so much controversy about questions of this kind, after we get past those jealousies and rivalries that belong to men who are engaged in industries of the kind we are now considering—the motive, after we have passed these considerations, I believe to be, and it is shown to be by the evidence in this case, to be to secure a prohibition on the part of the United States to the importation of Canadian fish, whether salt or fresh.

Do we want a prohibition upon the importation of Canadian fish? Who wants it? Why, sir, a very few men who can make money out of such a situation desire it. There are not perhaps more than two hundred or three hundred men even on the New England coast who desire to have the importation of fish from Canada absolutely prohibited. They want it because that would give them the absolute control and monopoly of the American market for fish and would bring a great many millions of dollars into their purses. But when you come to the consumers of this class of food, who are they? You may go through this land and examine the tables of the rich and you scarcely ever find salt fish upon them, unless it may be for a relish, or unless it may be of the most exquisite character of the products of the sea; but if you will go down amongst the poor people who have to spend their money for food a penny at a time, you will find fresh herring and salt herring and you will find salt mackerel and salt codfish and all the inferior grades of those kinds of fish upon their tables as a matter of absolute necessity. If you took from the laboring population to-day of the cities of Boston and New York and Philadelphia and the large manufacturing towns in the United States, the supply of cheap fish for food, you would put a great many families almost upon starvation. I, for one, do not believe in a system of tariff taxation that resorts to necessary human food for raising revenues to support any government as long as there are other objects of taxation to which I can resort for that purpose. I believe that heat and air and food and water and raiment are all the gifts of Almighty God and are intended for the benefaction of all humanity, whether rich or whether poor, and my mind instinctively rebels at any tax levied by any government, State or Federal, upon articles of necessity for food, for raiment, for heating, or upon facilities for supplying air or water to the people or the country.

That government is in a poor way, and it must of necessity be a bad and an impoverished government, that is compelled to resort to a tax upon food, and especially upon the food of the common, poor people in order to raise money for its support. We have no occasion in this country for a tax like that. It is true that we have a tariff tax now upon Irish potatoes and upon beef and pork and mutton and other common supplies of food and grain and flour, when they are to be brought into this country. That taxation upon the statute-book is an unexecuted law, because in all these things we raise a great excess, and we have these articles for exportation in vast abundance to foreign countries. But suppose a visitation of famine should come upon the United States, upon the great granaries of the West, the food-producing areas that now give to us pork, bacon, mutton, beef, poultry, butter, milk, cheese and the like, and flour and corn, and in what condition would our tariff laws be found in such a calamity in respect of the impoverished and starving people?

The greater the scarcity of course the higher the price, and as the ability of the people to purchase food for subsistence decreased the tariff would come in and load its burdens upon these articles; and that tariff which is held out to the people of the United States in the act of 1883 and other preceding acts by Republican administrations as something tending to encourage the agriculturists of this country would be a tariff that would produce starvation in tens of thousands of homes in this land.

This tariff would starve the farmer when the time of want comes, while it flatters him in times of prosperity with an empty promise of increased prices for his productions.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, but referring to a remark made by the Senator from Alabama as to the quantity of revenue derived from salt fish, I fell into the same error that he did, and I wish to correct it now. I have been referring to the official records, and I find we are all mistaken, including the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], in the figures we gave for salted fish in barrels and half-barrels. The total aggregate of the revenue derived from salt fish last year was $604,928.69.

Mr. MORGAN. That is from all countries.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, from all countries.

Mr. MORGAN. I spoke about the Canadian fish.

Mr. FRYE. But certainly the fish and the fish-oil and the cured fish from Canada alone are over $600,000; I can not be mistaken about that.

Mr. SHERMAN. Duties?

Mr. FRYE. Yes. I think myself the amount of duties is greater than that.

Mr. MORGAN. I did not think it was necessary to bring the data into the Senate that I have collected upon the subject, but a little later in this debate I will do so. I think I can demonstrate that we do not pay $600,000 duty on fish imported from Canadian waters into the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. We receive that much.

Mr. MORGAN. That does not state the amount of fish imported from Canada.

Mr. SHERMAN. I beg pardon. That is the amount of duties on all fish imported.

Mr. MORGAN. You will find that there are a great many fish imported into the United States in different states of preparation from foreign countries that Canada does not prepare for the markets.

Mr. FRYE. Very few.

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir; a great many. However, we can settle that hereafter. I will bring the proper data into the Senate at the proper time with the view of correcting any mistake about that. The argument, however, upon that branch of the subject is just as strong at $600,000 a year as it is at $297,000 a year. It is a bagatelle; it does not amount to anything. It is not a source of revenue that we care about at all, not a source of revenue even if it was paid by the Canadians that would affect their financial condition to any sensible degree, but they do not pay it—we pay it; the consumers in the United States pay it. However much the statement may be argued against and denounced and denied, and all that, the human mind has not yet attained the state of subtlety in logic where it can get rid of the conviction that the man who consumes a taxed article is the man who pays the duty on it. Common people can not believe anything else, no matter how statesmen and publicists and political economists believe it. The common, ordinary, sensible man can not believe anything else than that if you tax an article and sell it to him, he, being the consumer, has got to pay the tax.

But I was speaking about the tariff tax upon human food, and I was speaking of the calamitous condition that this country would be in under our existing tariff laws if a visitation of famine should come upon this country and we should have to pay these very onerous duties that are imposed upon the importation of potatoes and wheat and flour and all manner of provisions derived from animal life. And, Mr. President, I can not conceive of any policy that is more fatal to the welfare of any country than to tax the importation of provisions, except of those classes that are not produced in the country and are used for the purposes of luxurious indulgence, and not for the purpose of sustentation of the life of the ordinary families of men.

It is a horrible reflection that a government like that of the United States, if it sought to get any revenue at all, as it really does not, out of the tariff upon human food, should place her people in such condition that whenever a terrible visitation of famine should overtake us there should be thousands and hundreds of thousands, yes, millions of people who would be obliged to starve because they could not pay increased prices imposed by the taxes on imported food.

Is there a man in the United States of America to-day who fails, whatever prejudice he may have against Great Britain, to recognize the fact that in the repeal of the corn laws, under the leadership of John Bright, Great Britain gave her people the broadest and sweetest benefaction that was ever conferred upon any nation on this earth? And look how the prosperity of that people has grown; look how their numbers have increased; look how they have traveled out through all their different possessions in the continents and islands and have planted the power of Christian civilization and British law where forty and fifty years ago savages occupied the whole land. Why so? Because when their peasantry, as they are called, the common working classes in Great Britain, got food enough to live upon, food enough to enrich that blood that runs in their veins and gives them the courage of a true British manhood, when they were fed sufficiently well, they commenced to summon up courage and to move out upon lines of adventure for the purpose of civilizing and of reducing to cultivation and to happy homes many, yes, thousands and thousands and millions of acres far distant from the shores of that wonderful little island.

A people stinted in necessary food could never have achieved the progress that has made the British name a positive and powerful influence in every nation on earth.

Now, sir, when the time shall come, as one day it will come, that we need that provisions should be cheap; when the time comes that we need that every man should be able to help his neighbor with the charity of bread and to supply the wants of humanity, so far as to keep the mouths of the children in the land fed, this tariff law enacted by the Republican party of this country will come in with full force upon the people, and what would be the result then? They would have to pay upon—

Animals, live, 20 per cent. ad valorem.
Beef and pork, 1 cent per pound.
Hams and bacon, 2 cents per pound.
Meat, extract of, 20 per cent. ad valorem.
Cheese, 4 cents per pound.
Butter, and substitutes therefor, 4 cents per pound.
Lard, 2 cents per pound.
Wheat, 20 cents per bushel.
Rye and barley, 10 cents per bushel.
Barley, pearled, patent, or hulled, one-half cent per pound.
Barley malt, per bushel of 34 pounds, 20 cents.
Indian corn or maize, 10 cents per bushel.
Oats, 10 cents per bushel.
Corn-meal, 10 cents per bushel of 48 pounds.
Oat-meal, one-half cent per pound.
Rye-flour, one-half cent per pound.
Wheat-flour, 20 per cent. ad valorem.

And yet famine in this country would probably put the price of a bushel of wheat up to $2 or $3, and in order to satisfy the demands of this voracious tariff of 1883 you would calculate 20 per cent. ad valorem upon wheat, and it would only have the effect of enabling those who have money to monopolize the wheat in the land and hold it at starvation rates before the hungry and longing eyes of the poor and destitute of this land.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to ask the Senator if he has referred in the course of his speech to the manner in which through trusts and combinations the price of jute and hemp bagging to the poor people of the South has been largely increased.

Mr. MORGAN. No; but I remember the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] the other day introduced some resolutions and made some very pertinent and very forcible remarks on that question, and I notice that the papers in the whole South are full of statements on that subject; so that we in the South will be compelled to abandon the use of jute and hemp bagging entirely, and shall have to resort to some expedient in order to get rid of this trust combination which has raised the price of bagging.

Mr. GEORGE. At a loss of about three or four millions to the cotton farmers and laborers of the South.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; and wherever there comes a scarcity of provisions in the United States of the sort I have been reading about now, the common staple articles of food, then you will find trusts abounding in this land, and the wealthy men of this country will hold possession of all the food supplies. If there is any yoke upon this earth that can bring the bondage of slavery to the Anglo-Saxon, if there is any one thing above another that can drive him out of his manhood and reduce him to circumstances where he is willing to become a slave, it will be hunger and starvation imposed upon him by statutes like this, giving the power to men who own accumulated wealth to lock the jaws of the poor with starvation until they submit themselves to their demands. I continue to read from the present tariff law:

Rice, cleaned, 2½ cents per pound; uncleaned, 1½ cents per pound.

Mr. GEORGE. Before the Senator from Alabama goes away from that cotton bagging affair, I should be glad if he would inform the Senate upon what class of people in the South that tax would rest.

Mr. MORGAN. Well, the class of people in the South upon whom it will rest will be the laborers and their employers, both of them poor, both classes of men who have to work hard and live hard, very hard, and I take occasion here now to say that the honorable Senators on the other side, amongst whom millionaires are common, that you can not find a planter in the South that is a millionaire. You can not find one out of every 100,000 that is worth $200,000 in money or property. Our industries down there do not yield millions. A great majority of the planting interests of the South are in the hands of men who have to go day by day to their work in their fields, and often carry their wives and their children with them out there. It is no uncommon thing, even in the splendid State which I have the honor in part to represent here, to see a man leading the front row in the cotton field and his wife and his daughters and sons chopping along through the fields and earning their daily bread in that way.

Mr. GEORGE. And no eight-hour law.

Mr. MORGAN. No; it is a sixteen-hour law. They work every minute that there is light enough to see to distinguish between the cotton plant and the weeds and grass by which it is surrounded, and then it is work throughout the entire year almost without cessation. I must be excused, Mr. President, if I have a sympathy, which is entitled to be classed amongst the ordinary traits of humanity, in behalf of people who have to work this way for the earning of their daily bread. I must be further excused if I oppose, in every form and fashion they may be presented, all laws that encourage and provide for monopolies, subsidies, and trusts and combinations whereby a few men by accumulated and aggregated capital can control the industrial classes, and especially the industrial agricultural classes. I feel always that I am doing my duty when I am trying to provide the instrumentalities of legislation by which these men shall have a chance to enjoy the earnings of the sweat of their own brows, expended so faithfully and so diligently through every coming year. This tariff of the Republican party taxes rice, flour. It proceeds as follows, with its levies upon human food, much of which is necessary to the support of life:

Potato or corn starch, 2 cents per pound; rice starch, 2½ cents per pound; other starch, 2½ cents per pound.
Rice, cleaned, 2½ cents per pound; uncleaned, 1½ cents per pound.
Paddy, 1½ cents per pound.
Rice-flour and rice-meal, 20 per cent. ad valorem.
Hay, $2 per ton.
Honey, 20 cents per gallon.
Hops, 8 cents per pound.
Milk, preserved or condensed, 20 per cent. ad valorem.
Fish:
Mackerel, 1 cent per pound.
Herrings, pickled or salted, one-half of 1 cent per pound.
Salmon, pickled, 1 cent per pound; other fish, pickled, in barrels, 1 cent per pound.
Foreign-caught fish, imported otherwise than in barrels or half barrels, whether fresh, smoked, dried, salted, or pickled, not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 50 cents per 100 pounds.
Anchovies and sardines, packed in oil or otherwise, in tin boxes measuring not more than 5 inches long, 4 inches wide, and 3½ inches deep, 10 cents per whole box; in half boxes, measuring not more than 5 inches long, 4 inches wide, and 1⅞ deep, 5 cents each; in quarter boxes, measuring not more than four inches and three-quarters long, 3½ inches wide, and 1½ deep, 2½ cents each; when imported in any other form, 40 per cent. ad valorem.
Fish preserved in oil, except anchovies and sardines, 30 per cent. ad valorem.
Salmon, and all other fish, prepared or preserved, and prepared meats of all kinds, not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 25 per cent. ad valorem.
Pickles and sauces, of all kinds, not otherwise specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 35 per cent. ad valorem.
Potatoes, 15 cents per bushel of 60 pounds.
Vegetables, in their natural state, or in salt or brine, not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 10 per cent. ad valorem.
Vegetables, prepared or preserved, of all kinds, not otherwise provided for, 30 per cent. ad valorem.
Chicory root, ground or unground, burnt or prepared, 2 cents per pound.
Vinegar, 7½ cents per gallon. The standard for vinegar shall be taken to be that strength which requires thirty-five grains of bicarbonate of potash to neutralize 1 ounce Troy of vinegar; and all import duties that may by law be imposed on vinegar imported from foreign countries shall be collected according to this standard.
Acorns, and dandelion root, raw or prepared, and all other articles used or intended to be used as coffee, or as substitutes therefor, not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 2 cents per pound.
Chocolate, 2 cents per pound.
Cocoa, prepared or manufactured, 2 cents per pound.
Fruits:
Currants, Zante or other, 1 cent per pound.
Dates, plums, and prunes, 1 cent per pound.
Figs, 2 cents per pound.
Oranges, in boxes of capacity not exceeding 2½ cubic feet, 25 cents per box; in one-half boxes, capacity not exceeding 1½ cubic feet, 13 cents per half box; in bulk, $1.60 per thousand; in barrels, capacity not exceeding that of the 196-pounds flour barrel, 55 cents per barrel.
Lemons, in boxes of capacity not exceeding 2½ cubic feet, 30 cents per box; in one-half boxes, capacity not exceeding 1½ cubic feet, 16 cents per half box; in bulk, $2 per thousand.
Lemons and oranges, in packages, not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 20 per cent. ad valorem.
Limes and grapes, 20 per cent. ad valorem.
Raisins, 2 cents per pound.
Fruits, preserved in their own juices, and fruit-juice, 20 per cent. ad valorem.
Comfits, sweetmeats, or fruits preserved in sugar, spirits, sirup, or molasses, not otherwise specified or provided for in this act, and jellies of all kinds, 35 per cent. ad valorem.
Nuts:
Almonds, 5 cents per pound; shelled, 7½ cents per pound; filberts, and walnuts, of all kinds, 3 cents per pound.
Peanuts or ground beans, 1 cent per pound; shelled, 1½ cents per pound.
Nuts of all kinds, shelled or unshelled, not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 2 cents per pound.
Mustard, ground or preserved, in bottles or otherwise, 10 cents per pound.

I have read through that list of taxed articles of human food for the purpose of bringing to the attention of the Senate and of the country the impolicy of extending these laws to other articles of human food, and the great and serious wrong of taking from the free-list, "fish, fresh, for immediate consumption," and putting them on the dutiable list, and making them pay taxes.

Mr. President, I demonstrated yesterday from the action of the Republican party in the Congress of the United States, both in the Senate, in its treaty-making capacity, and in the Congress in its legislative capacity, that the very purpose of all of this trouble and turmoil that we are encountering here in respect of our Canadian fisheries is, by an indirection, by a plan that does not disclose upon its face what is meant by it, to restore the duty as it once was upon fresh fish, so as to make a prohibitory rule against their introduction into this country. There you strike at human food not as a necessary means of raising revenue, but, sir, you strike at human food that is necessary for the subsistence of the common laboring population merely to increase its cost; and all of this debate, all of this contention about this treaty means that, and nothing more than that. It is intended to force the President of the United States by a proclamation to prohibit the coming of fish free into the United States.

That is the object, sir. It is to enrich the owners of vessels, the middle-men, the combines and trusts, the halibut rings, and not to increase the wages of fishermen, that the President is required to issue his proclamation to prohibit Canadian fish from entering our ports.

Here, then, is the Canadian contention on one side, who, I admit, would like to get rid of the duty, whatever it is, whether it is $300,000 or $600,000 a year, but the far more influential and controlling motive comes from our side, that is to say, comes from the men who control the trusts and the combinations and the management of the fish market along the coasts of Maine and Massachusetts, who intend, if they can do it, even at the expense of a war with Great Britain, to compel the President of the United States to prohibit the introduction of fresh fish into the United States caught in Canadian waters by British or Canadian fishermen. There is the purpose. I charge it home upon them; and when the hour of trial and trouble shall come in this country, then we shall see whether or not these people that they are trying to humbug about this thing, these people who have to resort to cheap pickled fish and dried fish as a means of subsistence will toss their caps in the air and hurrah, in this campaign, for the men who want to prohibit the introduction of fish that they consume and are obliged to consume in their daily living, so as to enrich a few men.

Mr. President, these things can not be hid from sight. They are just as I have stated them, and the records show it. The Republican party in 1871, before this method of freezing fish and bringing them in fresh had been employed to any considerable extent, and before it was supposed that it would become a favorite means of the introduction of fresh fish into this country, concluded that they would abolish the duty on fresh fish. They did so. What was the motive for that? Was that because Great Britain or Canada demanded it? No; it was because they believed the interests of their own people would be promoted by such legislative action on their part. So, as I have frequently asserted here, when they had the absolute control of both branches of Congressional legislation they abolished the duty on fish brought in fresh for immediate consumption. Their idea was this: that it made no difference what the people in Arkansas might have to pay for fish, or the people in Missouri or in Illinois might have to pay for fish. Their vessels were running to and fro from the Banks and the fishing waters to the shore, and they wanted that their people should have fish free of duty; but just as soon as this process of freezing them was resorted to and was perfected, it was found that it was not necessary to pickle fish at the fishing grounds in order to bring them safe and sound to market, and all they had to do was to supply themselves with ice and freeze the fish, and as long as it staid frozen, if it was forty years, it was as fresh as when first frozen. So in that way they would bring cargoes of fish into the ports of Gloucester and other places in New England. There the packers would get hold of them and put them up in oil, in brine, in dry salt; they would smoke them, they would fix them up in a great many very inviting ways, and they were able to easily reach a magnificent market in the West, where the people on the Missouri and Mississippi Rivers could sit down to their breakfast-tables and have fresh mackerel upon them. A most seductive commerce that was. But it spread so rapidly, it was such a boon to the people of the United States, that the trust men found they could not handle it at all. What was the result? They commenced then to reinstate the tariff that they themselves had repealed. They repealed it believing they would get every penny of the advantage that would come from it. Then they were for reinstating it. The Republican administration was afraid to make the attempt. Three fishery tariffs have been considered and enacted since that time, and yet they have not got fresh fish with the duty reinstated; they have not now got the political power to do it; and in the passage of this Mills bill through the House of Representatives there was not even a motion made to reinstate the tariff on fresh fish, not a motion made, and such a motion will not be made in this Senate, or, if it is, it will be made in a way that they know it will be beaten.

Now they want to have this duty back. They must have fresh fish prohibited. Why? Because they have failed to be able to control in a monopolistic way the fresh-fish markets. How do they attempt to do this? They want to get up a trouble between this country and Canada and Great Britain. They passed a law here urging the President of the United States, if not commanding him, upon certain conditions, to make a proclamation by which the goods, wares, and merchandise of the people of Canada should be shut out from our ports, an embargo against their importation here, which brings the country next in condition to a state of war.

What is the object of that? It was indicated in the papers that I read here yesterday, the address of Mr. Steele, president of the American Fishery Association, where he demanded of the President of the United States that in making his proclamation he should limit its effect to the article of fish. Why did he want it limited to the article of fish? Because, Mr. President, they thought that by that means they would avoid a resort to other parliamentary and Congressional expedients and pass by the treaty-making power of the United States, get the country into such heat and agitation in the revival of the old quarrel between the British and the Americans as that the President of the United States would be constrained in his proclamation to say to the Canadians, "You must not bring any fresh or salt fish into the United States." That is the proposition; that is the whole of it as I believe it to exist.

When I put the question to the Senator from Maine if the repeal of this little modicum of duty now remaining upon salt fish, whether it is $300,000 of revenue a year or $600,000—when I put to him the question whether the repeal of that remaining part of the duty upon salt fish would not settle this whole question, he said, Yes, it would; no doubt about it; it would settle the whole question. Why so? Because then our fishermen on the New England coast would lose their interest in the subject, and the Canadian fishermen would have a release from the duties which are imposed now and which raise the price of fish in our market so as to check the market demand.

I know I am addressing my appeal to ears that are deaf; but if I knew what to say and how to accomplish it, I would stand on this floor until I should fall from my feet, imploring these men that they will not insist that this article of cheap food, salt fish, shall continue under taxation and shall not be made the subject of prohibitory proclamation. I would implore them to allow the poor, wretched families of this country who have to seek the markets and spend perhaps three or four pennies for a meal of herring or of low-grade codfish, or mackerel, or something of the kind, to have the means of subsistence without allowing their greed to reach down and grovel amongst the very poverty of the poor in order to gain lucre to enrich themselves, to increase their capital and power.

But, sir, I speak to ears that are deaf. When money, the power that it brings, the aggrandizement that it brings, the influence and character that it gives to men, is thrown into the scale against the interests of the hard and over worked and starved poor of my country, they have to go up and the money scale of the balance goes down. It always outweighs them, and is doing so in this Senate to-day. For, I repeat, the Senator from Maine said to me in this debate that if you would repeal this $600,000 or $300,000 a year of duty on salt fish, all of this great and terrible controversy would disappear in one instant of time. It was for that reason that I said to them that the duty they were holding on to now would be in a dangerous attitude when the question came before the American people, between the maintenance of that duty and a resort to arms and to war with Great Britain.

The argument is too plainly in favor of humanity and justice and right to be neglected even by the most obdurate and self-sufficient of those gentlemen who so long have held power in this country that they begin to fancy that they have gotten a patent upon it and that they can hold on contrary even to the will of the people. They are mistaken. They will see their mistake when it is too late, and I am very much afraid that, while they are discovering their mistake, the people of the United States will be put into a category that will bring great trouble to this land.

I will repeat my remark, that whether it is in commenting upon tariff laws or treaties or anything of the kind, every time I get a chance to reduce the tariff upon these articles of food that are necessary for the sustentation of the humbler classes of people in the United States my vote will always be on that side, though I may be feeble and though I may be, in the language of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], "silly," though I may be considered presumptuous, though I may make speeches at great length on this subject, yet my duty is being performed exactly in correspondence with my own conscience, and I am working for a class of men who can not help themselves, and who, as matters are progressing in the United States now, have very few friends.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to ask him if he understood me to apply that term to him?

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, yes.

Mr. HOAR. I thought the Senator understood that I had disclaimed any such application.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I will not repeat it.

Mr. HOAR. What I said was that if it were not for my profound respect for the Senator from Alabama I should say that the suggestion that war was likely to grow out of our insisting that the same rules should be applied to us in the British ports as we apply to them in ours was supremely silly.

Mr. MORGAN. That is all right.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator has himself poured out right and left his adjectives of contempt and denunciation upon me and upon other Senators who differ from him, but I have made no such application to him.

Mr. MORGAN. I have not said one word in this debate of an unpleasant character to any gentleman who has not first assailed me. Perhaps it would be just as well to understand that I stand on the defensive, and that I stand very firm on that.

Now, I read from Mr. Fitz John Babson part of an address that he made to the American Fisheries Union at one of their annual meetings upon "the impending crisis," as it is called. This address was made early in 1885, or the latter part of 1884, I forget the precise date of it. He says, on page 21 of this address to the whole body of the American Fisheries Union, who were assembled there in convention:

> The termination of the reciprocity treaty in 1866 again brought into operation the treaty of 1818, and the manner of dealing with the question became a matter of much political interest in Canada. It was evident that whatever party policy would secure reciprocity with the United States would be indorsed by the people. The system of licenses which, by increasing stringency defeated itself, you are all familiar with, and upon its termination it was announced by the public men of Canada that not only all that could be claimed under their construction of the treaty of 1818 would be enforced, but that a provincial cutter system should be inaugurated, commanded by men who were in sympathy with the coercive principles of the Government, and who could be depended on to cause the American fishermen all the trouble and annoyance possible, for the ostensible purpose of forcing the United States again to renew the reciprocity treaty.
> The leniency of the officers of the regular British naval service toward the fishermen was not satisfactory; in fact the wood, water, and shelter clause was not to be considered in the spirit in which it was made (simply restrictive), it was to be made aggressive; and construing the language of the imperial act 59 of George III, in which a vessel preparing to fish in British waters is deemed criminal, they seized vessels that were buying bait to use on the Grand Banks, restricted them from buying ice or supplies, claiming that such acts were preparing to fish. I cite these things simply to show how Canada exaggerates what was intended to be a simple restrictive regulation into a criminal law, and also to show the supine indifference of the United States in submitting to such wholesale piracy.

That speech was made before Mr. Cleveland came into office.

Mr. Babson proceeds to say:

> True, the President did issue a proclamation after Congress had passed unanimously the memorial resolutions sent from this city asking for a declaration of non-intercourse if these acts were continued, and doubtless some retaliatory measure would have been adopted had not the proposals for the Washington treaty involving the fishery question at this time appeared. The result of that treaty gave to the fishermen of the United States simply the right to take fish of every kind in the waters of Canada, namely, inside of 3 miles. We acquired no commercial rights whatever. The wood, water, and shelter clause of the treaty of 1818 still remains, and is in force to-day, modified simply by the permission contained in the treaty of Washington to take fish inside of 3 miles. If there was virtue in Canada's enforcing that clause from 1856 to 1873 it is so now. If it was, as has been claimed, an injury to her people to buy supplies, bait, and ice of them then, it is so now. And the day that sees the fishing provisions of the treaty of Washington terminate will see her enforcing that clause to the letter.
> The treaty of Washington was fondly expected to be the panacea for all the difficulties that afflicted the two nations. The primal feature was the settlement of the Alabama claims, and to succeed in that was the ambition of our commissioners. The fisheries again played the part of make-weight; and Great Britain accepted and paid the Geneva award, holding the almost assured fishery award of the Halifax Commission as an offset. Fifteen and a half millions were paid under the award of Geneva, and $14,500,000 were claimed for allowing our fishermen the privilege to take fish from the ocean within 3 miles of their shores. How far we availed ourselves of this privilege I will show before I get through. Suffice it to say that we take neither halibut nor codfish, speaking in a generic sense (and which comprises three-fourths of the Atlantic fisheries), in British waters. We buy our herring, capelin, and squid entirely from the local fishermen, paying them in cash or its equivalent, and the only fishery of theirs that is available is the mackerel fishery, and what few of them we take (I show by the sworn statements of the captains of the vessels) cost us nearly $2 for every dollar received.

He then proceeds to discuss the composition and the results of the Halifax Commission. I read that statement of Mr. Babson because he is one of the most enlightened and one of the most influential of all the men engaged in the fishing interests in the Northeast, and for years he has been such. It shows a perfect confirmation of what I stated yesterday in regard to this same subject-matter about which he was speaking. It also shows that at the time the treaty of 1871 was negotiated and proclaimed all of the troubles and difficulties existing between Canada and the United States were of precisely the same sort and condition that they are to-day, or rather that they were in 1885–'86, the first year of Mr. Cleveland's administration. It shows that the Republican party, having been in power here for many years, had done nothing with a view to remove these difficulties, but all that had been done, as he states himself, was to give away free fish and fish-oil to the Canadians by the treaty of 1871, and in addition to that five and a half million dollars assessed against us in the Halifax award for the privilege of inshore fishing, where he says that every fish costs twice its value to catch it; and in addition to that a right which had not heretofore existed, the right to come upon our shores and fish in the bay of Chesapeake, or the bay of Delaware, or in Long Island Sound, or along any of the coasts of the United States down to the thirty-ninth degree of north latitude.

That is what the Republican party gave up, and that is what the Republicans in the Senate to-day are trying to reclaim by compelling an administration that is Democratic to make a proclamation to exclude or prohibit the importation of fish into the United States caught in Canadian waters.

I mentioned yesterday the proposition made by Mr. Seward to the British Government for a modus vivendi, which was rejected upon a point of not much importance, which was suggested in the protocol. I showed that the arrangement which existed, as set forth in the correspondence between Mr. Bayard and Mr. West, followed right along in the groove of the Seward protocol, and that it was made absolutely necessary either by the blunder or the willful intent of the Republican party when they put an end to the treaty of 1871, fixing the time for its termination on the 1st day of July, 1885. I was trying to do something which no man can do, to account sensibly and upon proper reasoning for the fatuous act of terminating that treaty just in the middle of a fishing season.

I showed yesterday, before getting to that branch of the subject, how Mr. Steele, the president of the American Fishery Union, and numbers of other men had importuned the President of the United States to make some arrangement by which they could pass from the influence of one treaty to the other without breaking up their business and bring them into collision with the men with whom they were engaged in a joint fishery right upon the coasts of Canada.

It is not necessary for me to delay now for a further consideration of anything in connection with that subject further than to read two letters from Mr. Webster which I have here. I read a letter which was presented to the Senate by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], but which through my misadventure did not find its way into the RECORD. It is copied from volume 2 of the Private Correspondence of Daniel Webster. I read it for the purpose of showing that Mr. Bayard, in his solicitude about the establishment of some method of getting through with the difficulties which would attend the termination of the treaty of 1871, was precisely in the condition that Mr. Webster was in when he was trying to get rid of the difficulties arising out of the controversies between the British and the Canadian people and our people in 1852 before the reciprocity treaty of 1854 was negotiated. It is a little singular to notice not only the identity of the position but of the language used by both of these gentlemen in their importunity and solicitation, addressed to influential British subjects, that they would go to Canada and that they would try to prevent hostile collision between the people until the diplomatic authorities of the respective Governments could have some opportunity of providing the means for the smoothing out of these troubles. Mr. Webster wrote to President Fillmore as follows:

Mr. Webster to Mr. Fillmore.

FRANKLIN, July 17, 1852.

MY DEAR SIR: The interruption of the usual occupation of our fishermen in the British provinces is a very serious business. I fear much difficulty may arise from it.

Following your suggestion to Mr. Hunter, I have prepared a paper which will appear in the newspapers in this part of the country immediately, and have directed its publication in Washington. I hope you will approve of it. If I felt well enough and strong enough I would proceed immediately to Washington, but I do not. I wrote to-day a letter to Mr. Crampton, a copy of which I now inclose to you. We shall be obliged, I am persuaded, to look up this business of the fisheries as well as the whole subject of the Canadian trade as matter of negotiation. Congress will never do anything. I will thank you, at your earliest convenience, to signify to me your wishes and your opinions.

I leave these mountains and valleys with great reluctance, but it seems to be necessary.

Yours, always truly,

DAN'L WEBSTER.

Mr. Webster thought, as Mr. Bayard and Mr. Cleveland afterwards thought, that he was obliged to look up the business of the fisheries as well as the whole subject of the Canadian trade as a matter of negotiation. There is Daniel Webster committed to negotiation in regard to the whole subject of Canadian trade, including the fisheries. Now let us see the letter Mr. Webster wrote on the same day to Mr. Crampton, the British minister:

Mr. Webster to Mr. Crampton, British minister at Washington.

FRANKLIN, July 17, 1852.

MY DEAR MR. CRAMPTON: The threatened interruption by force of that enjoyment of the fisheries which the fishing vessels of the United States have so long practiced and possessed without interruption or molestation is a serious affair and I fear full of danger. I wish to see you as soon as you can possibly come North.

If I am not in Boston, at the Revere House, please proceed immediately to Marshfield, bringing with you as many of your adjuncts as you please.

I have recommended to the President that we take up the whole subject of the fisheries and the Canada trade at once, as matters of negotiation.

You will see in the Boston papers of Monday an official publication by me. Is it not possible for you to prevail with the provincial authorities to institute no hostile proceedings against American fishing vessels till longer notice be given, and until you and I may have conferred together on the subject?

I am anxious to see you at once. On receipt of this inform me by telegraph when you can be in Boston.

I am, with great regard, yours, always truly,

DAN'L WEBSTER.

There it seems that Mr. Webster importuned Mr. Crampton, the British minister in this country at that time, to intervene in Canada and to prevent any hostile collision until he and Mr. Crampton, as the representatives of both Governments, could take up the fisheries question and all the questions concerning the trade between the United States and Canada and proceed to settle them by diplomatic arrangement, because, he said, "Congress will never do anything." What did he mean by that? He meant that Congress would not reduce, perhaps, the duties on fish, or Congress would not decree a reciprocal arrangement between Canada and the United States, and that he and Mr. Crampton, representing the two Governments in their diplomatic functions, would proceed to arrange the matter between the two Governments.

Mr. Bayard has been a good deal berated because he sought the assistance of some Canadian official of high authority—I forget his name—and asked him to see the Canadian people and to attempt to produce a state of mind among them which would be favorable to a peaceful and quiet settlement of this matter, rather than that they or we should resort to any harsh means for the composing of these very serious questions.

I have here a copy of a letter from Mr. James Macdonald, master of a ship, dated at Gloucester, July 21, 1885. The arrangement with Mr. West was made not long before that date. The treaty of Washington was terminated July 1, 1885, and the following letter was written July 21:

GLOUCESTER, July 21, 1885.

DEAR SIR: It is a custom among our fishing owners to name their vessels after distinguished men of our country, and believing from your first act as Secretary of State on the fishery question that this industry has found a friend that will sacrifice none of its interests, I have named my vessel the Thomas F. Bayard.

She is a fine schooner of 95 tons register, will cost $12,000, and will be employed exclusively in the fishing business, and, in my opinion, will be worthy of the honored name which she bears.

Yours, very respectfully,

Hon. THOMAS F. BAYARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

There is the master of a fishing schooner, within twenty days after Mr. Bayard had succeeded in extending the arrangement of 1871 to the close of the fishing season, understanding perhaps as well as either of the Senators from Massachusetts understand what was for the benefit of the fishermen in that section of the country, writing a note of thanks to Mr. Bayard, in which he says that his first act on the subject of the fisheries meets entire approbation and was of great benefit to the fishermen.

Mr. DAWES. What became of the ship?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know how the ship fared.

Mr. DAWES. It got into difficulty.

Mr. MORGAN. I suppose so; very likely the ship got into difficulty. There is no trouble about getting up a difficulty with a ship in that country, but there is sometimes a good deal of trouble in determining who is in the wrong about it after all. I have no doubt, sir, that your men in New England and your party have already arranged to put ships in reach of those people in Newfoundland the very moment that this treaty shall fall in order that controversy shall spring up between Canada and the United States. Let us wait and see whether that is verified by the fact. I have no doubt of it. I have stated that several times on this floor and I believe it firmly.

I believe that this treaty will not have gone under, as it will go under, ten days until a demand will be made upon the President of the United States, if he should not have already anticipated it, to send men-of-war to those waters for the purpose of preventing breaches of the rights of Americans in that quarter. Whose fault it is to be is a matter that will be settled in the dim future. I do not know how far away, but perhaps by the time you reach the settlement of the question as to whose fault it is it will be as troublesome a question as was the question, who was responsible for the firing on Fort Sumter?

We had better try to learn something by the experience of the past, and when there is a door of invitation opened to a fair arrangement which can be so easily closed, when all the tendencies of this Administration and all the apparent tendencies of the British administration at the present time are in the direction of peace and tranquillity and good order in our associations, commercially and otherwise, we had better not bar the way in order to advance our political ends, but we had better give free course to the spirit of justice and equity and let it run. How long has it been since there was a contest between the Dominion authorities and an American ship over the fisheries question? How long has it been since anybody had a right to complain of any ill treatment there? Sir, it has been the length at least of the duration of this negotiation and quite a while before that. There was not a single seizure, as I remember, made in the year 1887. Not one has been made in the year 1888.

Mr. DAWES. Yes, they took a dory the other day.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not remember about a dory. The circumstances have not been reported, I think, to the Government. We have had no official account of it that I know of.

Mr. DAWES. But it is a fact. I do not know the merits.

Mr. MORGAN. No; the Senator does not know the merits. As a matter of course, if a dory was taken the dory was taken improperly or illegally.

Mr. FRYE. Probably it was taken for fishing illegally within the 3-mile limit.

Mr. MORGAN. It might be so; I do not know anything about it; but the broad statement is a true one, that during the year 1887 and the year 1888 we have had perfect quiet between our fishermen and those of the northeastern coast.

Mr. FRYE. Is it not apparent to the Senator why?

Mr. MORGAN. Well, let us see why.

Mr. FRYE. Because the Canadians are hoping to get this treaty ratified by the United States Senate, and they are behaving remarkably well.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, it is easy enough for any man to impeach the motives of another. It is easy enough for an American Senator to impeach the motives of the Canadian people. There is no difficulty about that; but a world sitting in judgment upon such voluntary and gratuitous accusations is not apt to come to a judgment without some evidence upon the subject.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. MORGAN. If you wish to correct me or if you wish to make some inquiry about this matter.

Mr. DAWES. Yes, I would like to do so.

Mr. MORGAN. Very well.

Mr. DAWES. How long ago is it since the Senator said that he believed the North American fishermen of New England had vessels ready to be put in to violate the laws?

Mr. MORGAN. I said so about fifteen minutes ago.

Mr. DAWES. Who is it who imputes motives?

Mr. MORGAN. I impute motives from facts which have occurred heretofore. It was announced by way of prophecy on the floor of the Senate two years ago that collisions would occur, and they did occur.

Mr. DAWES. Now, will the Senator allow me one word more?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. DAWES. Is it any easier for one Senator to impute motives than it is for another?

Mr. MORGAN. It depends a good deal upon who the Senator is, I think.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to ask the Senator one question.

Mr. MORGAN. All right.

Mr. FRYE. Does the Senator remember that in a speech made the other day, or perhaps in this same speech, he charged upon the Yankees as a rule that they went about the whole country getting up mischief and creating trouble wherever they went, etc., etc.?

Mr. MORGAN. In a sort of semi-humorous way, and in reply to some strictures by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], I took occasion to congratulate my country that the Almighty had put into the hearts of the Yankees an aversion to us, and that therefore they had not moved down among us. I spoke of New England Yankees especially, and said that they had not moved down among us. The Western men and the Middle States people have come and have found cordial welcome. And I said that in consequence of the absence of the down-east Yankees from our communities we had escaped a great deal of that harrowing and harassment which they had visited upon every country, I thought, throughout the United States.

Mr. HAWLEY. I should like to say one word.

Mr. DAWES. Nobody has complained of the Senator from Alabama as to his freedom in imputing motives. The only suggestion was that a man who is so free to do so should not complain of anybody else.

Mr. MORGAN. The same world stands in judgment upon my imputations that stands in judgment upon yours, and if you or I either bring forward an impeachment of a whole people without any justifiable ground the world will pronounce its judgment upon us. I am willing to stand upon history in respect to what I said jocularly about the Yankees, by way of retort upon the Senator from New Hampshire, who seemed to think that a man who came from the South, especially from Alabama, must be a very ignorant and a very low sort of person, a man who would whip the hide off a negro to get a little labor out of him, a man who would starve a negro for the purpose of getting money out of him, and the like of that.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator permit me a single observation?

Mr. MORGAN. I will.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do it partly in justice to himself. I can not think he means what he says when he speaks with such contempt of the enterprising men who have gone in to bless Alabama. Among the most prominent of those men are citizens of my own State, men of high ability, of great skill in business, who have carried large sums of money there and made some spots in that State blossom. The Shelby Iron Works, and the great works at Anniston and elsewhere, derive their capital and their skill from Connecticut citizens of the very highest character in every respect, and I know that the Senator thanks God every time a new one comes with half a million dollars to spend in Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. There are exceptions to all rules, and some very distinguished ones in the State of Alabama. I know the gentlemen to whom the Senator refers. They are prominent and strong Democrats in my State, and have as great a contempt as I have for the pragmatical idea that is visited through the politicians of this country upon the balance of the world to compel them "to stand and deliver" and to work for the support of the men who, like the daughters of the horseleech, are forever crying, "Give, give." They have just as much contempt for that class of people as anybody ought to have.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator is mistaken, if he will pardon me, as to the politics of some of those gentlemen. They are regular contributors to the Republican campaign fund to my own personal knowledge, and besides, I would wager anything reasonable, if I were in the betting world, that the Senator could not get a single one of them to sneer at a Yankee.

Mr. MORGAN. May be not.

Mr. HAWLEY. I know not.

Mr. MORGAN. I sneer at those men who sneer at me. I have not escaped your sneers in this Chamber.

Mr. HAWLEY. You have not had mine personally.

Mr. MORGAN. Whenever you have had a chance to make an impression in favor of a political party the claims of which you wanted to advance, you have not hesitated to say that we on this side are rebel traitors, that we are men not to be trusted, that we are men who violated our oaths to attack the flag of the American Union, that we are men whose consciences are burdened with political sin, that we deserve to be hanged, and that we live in this world by your mercy and your grace. These things are on the recent records of the Senate; they are entirely fresh; the ink is not dry upon the type that printed them. I have in reply to say that you did not dare to hang any of us. You had Jeff Davis down there, and Horace Greeley went his bail, and the United States Government did not dare to bring that man to trial, because it would have turned out in the judicial opinion of the great jurists of the United States that he had not committed treason.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. MORGAN. Of course, if we are to argue everything else over this fishery treaty. That has been the case all the time. Whenever the Senators on that side can get a chance to put something across the road so as to divert us or switch us off the track, they do not hesitate. When you are pursuing this proposition you have here to use the powers of the President of the United States and the powers of Congress in an indirect and an insincere way to prohibit the introduction of fresh fish into this country. When we get to that point in the discussion, if we pause you always commence talking about sneers and retaliation, and Yankees and slaveholders, and the like.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator allow me? While the Senator was making those somewhat severe charges he was looking at me. I beg him to remember that in all the course of this debate I have made no charge or insinuation of any kind against the Senator from Alabama. I am a full-blooded Yankee, and I do not know of any man on that side of the Senate for whom I have a more profound admiration than I have for the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. My eyes wander to the Senator from Maine, because I feel that they rest upon an honest and benevolent face. It is some relief to me to have that opportunity when looking on that side of the Chamber.

Now, if I am permitted, we will go on with this protocol. After the treaty was arranged and signed Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. West, and Mr. Tupper having endeavored to get Mr. Bayard to treat with them on the subject of a tariff on fish or reciprocity of trade between the United States and Canada, and having utterly failed to get him even to consider the question, for he barred it out of consideration absolutely, they then said: "We have a protocol which we desire to offer to you;" and it was presented. I shall read that protocol, and then I shall read what Mr. Bayard and our other negotiators, Mr. Putnam and Mr. Angell, said about it.

PROTOCOL.

The treaty having been signed the British plenipotentiaries desire to state that they have been considering the position which will be created by the immediate commencement of the fishing season before the treaty can possibly be ratified by the Senate of the United States, by the Parliament of Canada, and the Legislature of Newfoundland.

In the absence of ratification the old conditions which have given rise to so much friction and irritation might be revived, and might interfere with the unprejudiced consideration of the treaty by the legislative bodies concerned.

Under these circumstances, and with the further object of affording evidence of their anxious desire to promote good feeling and to remove all possible subjects of controversy, the British plenipotentiaries are ready to make the following temporary arrangement for a period not exceeding two years, in order to afford a "modus vivendi" pending the ratification of the treaty:

1. For a period not exceeding two years from the present date the privilege of entering the bays and harbors of the Atlantic coasts of Canada and Newfoundland shall be granted to United States fishing vessels by annual licenses at a fee of $1.50 per ton, for the following purposes:

The purchase of bait, ice, seines, lines, and all other supplies and outfits.

Transshipment of catch and shipping of crews.

2. If during the continuance of this arrangement the United States should remove the duties on fish, fish-oil, whale and seal oil (and their coverings, packages, etc.), the said licenses shall be issued free of charge.

3. United States fishing vessels entering the bays and harbors of the Atlantic coasts of Canada or of Newfoundland for any of the four purposes mentioned in Article I of the convention of October 20, 1818, and not remaining therein more than twenty-four hours, shall not be required to enter or clear at the custom-house, providing that they do not communicate with the shore.

4. Forfeiture to be exacted only for the offenses of fishing or preparing to fish in territorial waters.

5. This arrangement to take effect as soon as the necessary measures can be completed by the colonial authorities.

J. CHAMBERLAIN.
L. S. SACKVILLE WEST.
CHARLES TUPPER.

WASHINGTON, February 15, 1888.

Now, there was a protocol in response to that, signed by Mr. Bayard, Mr. Putnam, and Mr. Angell, as follows:

PROTOCOL.

The American plenipotentiaries having received the communication of the British plenipotentiaries of this date conveying their plan for the administration to be observed by the Governments of Canada and Newfoundland in respect of the fisheries during the period which may be requisite for the consideration by the Senate of the treaty this day signed, and the enactment of the legislation by the respective governments therein proposed, desire to express their satisfaction with this manifestation of an intention on the part of the British plenipotentiaries, by the means referred to, to maintain the relations of good neighborhood between the British possessions in North America and the United States; and they will convey the communication of the British plenipotentiaries to the President of the United States, with a recommendation that the same may be by him made known to the Senate for its information, together with the treaty, when the latter is submitted to that body for ratification.

T. F. BAYARD.
WILLIAM L. PUTNAM.
JAMES B. ANGELL.

WASHINGTON, February 15, 1888.

It will be alleged, as a matter of course, that this overture for the granting of these rights for two years to the fishermen of the United States was made for a purpose and to secure the interests of Great Britain. Mr. President, I think we have all of us lived long enough to understand that governments do not act upon mere sentiment. I do not know any arrangement between governments that does not concern their own material interests as well as the interests and welfare of those with whom they negotiate or treat.

But what is the interest that Great Britain is trying to advance here? She is trying to advance the interest of an increased commerce. She is trying to get our commerce back to that stage which was so splendidly represented here in debate the other day by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], as it existed under the treaty of 1871, when the commerce between the two countries grew to a sum equal to or in excess, I believe, of $60,000,000 annually. Great Britain is a commercial nation, the United States is one, and whatever increases the inflow and outflow of commerce from both of these countries must, of course, enrich their people and give them advantages without which they could scarcely get along so well as they can with them.

I do not suppose that the day will ever arrive when commerce between the United States and Canada can be suspended absolutely. In looking forward to the rejection of this treaty and to the execution of the act of 1887 for retaliation; in trying to realize in advance what will occur when the treaty is gone, when the modus vivendi included in this protocol has gone, and when the act of 1887 goes into full play and operation, and as a result of it a proclamation of non-intercourse between Canada and the United States is made, as the President intimates, a general proclamation of non-intercourse, one that will rest alike upon the people of the United States as a great body of national citizenship—when we try to forecast what will be the effect of our action in that day, we see that it must necessarily be one of great stringency upon our markets, of great disturbance in the channels of commerce, and interruption of social and other intercourse between the people of the two countries.

How long can that last? Sir, the strongest administration that ever existed in the United States of America could not keep it up for four years. If you should proclaim non-intercourse between Canada and Great Britain, general or special, you would not be able to maintain it for four years' time with all the power that the strongest administration ever possessed in a political sense. When the time of relaxation came, when the time of agreement arrived, where will we then be? We will then be in a mood and in a condition to treat, to negotiate, and we will come back right to the point that we are at now, a negotiation; but the circumstances under which we will reach that ground will have been so seriously changed that it is scarcely likely we could ever restore reciprocal commercial trade and the freedom of commercial relations between Canada and the people of the United States. Sir, it would be a damper thrown upon the relations of these two countries which is bound to work evil against us.

I hold that in treating with Great Britain for the friendly arrangement of this very peculiar interest we have with her people in the joint right of fishery upon their coasts, whatever advance we can make in that direction is so much gained. If we can not go the whole length we desire this year, perhaps we can go the whole length next year, and when those people have realized, as our people to-day are realizing, that in consequence of liberal arrangements of a commercial character between the two countries there is to follow a growth of trade and intercourse between the different peoples, they will press upon their governments on both sides of the line to make that intercourse more and more liberal, and instead of acting and reacting upon each other, with crimination and recrimination prevailing as the sentiment of accusation between the people, instead of our retrograding to a lower plane of commercial and social intercourse with those people, we shall be making a continual advance to the front.

Mr. President, that is a situation and temper and disposition that this modus vivendi is encouraging to-day, and if we shall come back here next December, having agreed that we will consider the treaty at that time, we shall find ourselves in a much better situation to come to some arrangement with the British Government about this matter, which can never be conducted except under a fair arrangement.

Sir, it would challenge the power of the greatest man, though he might be an autocrat and might be able to put every law upon the statute-book he chose to write; it would challenge the powers of the greatest man who ever lived in this world to conduct the relations of this joint fishery between the people of the United States and the people of Canada otherwise than by consentive arrangement between the two peoples. Can we do it by standing off at arm's length, by blow delivered in reply to blow, and exasperation increasing with every struggle between the parties, instead of undertaking to reconcile and compose these difficulties and keep the countries in proper relations and position towards each other by these belligerent means, for they are nothing less? We shall find ourselves compelled at last to resort to negotiation, and I believe that if we would now accept what has been done and step forward in this movement, we would find ourselves entirely satisfied, our people free from harassment and from difficulty upon the subject of this vexed fishery controversy, and peace and prosperity would reign in both countries.

I do not propose to-day, Mr. President, to discuss the merits of the treaty. I have never indulged in any argument upon that question, my purpose having been to try to meet the extraneous matters, the outside questions which have been lugged into this debate and into the report of the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations unnecessarily, to try to dispose of them as far as I was able to do by argumentation, or at least to state my views in regard to them before we come to the specific articles of the treaty. The field as covered by those specific articles will be found, I think, not to be a very broad one, and I think the argument upon them will be comparatively very brief, but I can not forbear to call the attention of the Senate this morning to one of the questions which enter into the consideration of the treaty articles themselves to some extent, but which is also a question that bears upon the particular motion now before the Senate to postpone the further consideration of the treaty until December. I ask the Secretary to read an extract from a paper that I send to the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

MORE TROUBLE ABOUT FISH—WILL RHODE ISLAND AND MASSACHUSETTS ENTER INTO A TREATY?

[New Bedford dispatch in the Providence Journal, August 1.]

Rhode Island fishing steamers will probably be more careful in future about fishing in the waters about here. Several steamers have visited Buzzard's Bay in the past few months and have been very bold about fishing. Such fishing is in violation of an act of the Legislature, approved May 6, 1886, entitled "An act for the protection of the fisheries in Buzzard's Bay." The steamer Cora P. White, of Newport, R. I., came into the lower bay last week and set her nets, getting, it is said, a good catch of menhaden. On Monday the steamer Seaconnet, of Portsmouth, R. I., was fishing in the bay. The steamers have been in the habit of coming up to the wharves at night, and even selling their catch for bait. The fishing began to attract attention, and yesterday when police officer Sisson saw a steamer hauling in menhaden in the upper harbor he reported the matter to Judge Borden of the third district court. By direction of the judge he went to the chief of police and procured a letter cautioning fishermen against taking menhaden. Tuesday evening the officer went on board the Cora P. White, and showed the captain the letter. The captain claimed that his United States license gave him the right to fish in Buzzard's Bay and declared he should fish again to-day, as the matter might as well be tested now as any time. The officer threatened the captain with arrest if he should try to fish again, but the captain was still defiant. Early this morning the police officer went to the lower bay in a yacht, and at 4.30 p. m. the Cora P. White got up steam and seemed to be getting ready for business. The captain, however, saw the officer's boat and at once left the bay at full speed.

Steamer Fannie Sprague, from Narragansett Bay, arrived in port Tuesday for the purpose of fishing, but finding detectives were about she sailed to-day.

Mr. MORGAN. If that was a controversy between Canadians and the people of the United States we should have the drums of the militia beating over this country very intensely; but it is a controversy between Rhode Island and Massachusetts. It is a controversy about what? Whether a Rhode Island fisherman shall go into Buzzard's Bay, Massachusetts, and fish for menhaden, and having caught menhaden whether he shall have the impudence to go up to their wharf and sell the menhaden for bait. Do you not see how between the State sovereignties in the United States questions grow up precisely as they do between the United States and Great Britain in relation to fishing rights?

If you will examine the statutes of the different seaboard States in this country you will find a number of the same sort that I now read from chapter 192 of the acts of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts for the year 1886, two years ago:

SECTION 1. No person shall draw, set, stretch, or use any drag-net, set-net, or gill-net, purse or sweep seine of any kind for taking fish anywhere in the waters of Buzzard's Bay within the jurisdiction of this Commonwealth nor in any harbor, cove or bight of said bay except as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. Any net or seine used in violation of any provision of this act, together with any boat, craft, or fishing apparatus employed in such illegal use, and all fish found therewith, shall be forfeited; and it shall be lawful for any inhabitant or inhabitants of any town bordering on said bay to seize and detain, not exceeding forty-eight hours, any net or seine found in use contrary to the provisions of this act, and any boat, craft, fishing apparatus, and fish found therewith, to the end that the same may be seized and libeled if need be by due process of law.

SEC. 3. All nets and seines in actual use, set or stretched in the waters aforesaid in violation of this act, are declared to be common nuisance.

SEC. 4. Nothing contained in this act shall be construed to interfere with the corporate rights of any fishing company located on said bay nor in any way to affect the fish-weirs mentioned in section 70 of chapter 91 of the public statutes, nor the use of nets or seines in lawful fisheries for shad or alewives in influent streams of said bay, nor to the use of set-nets or gill-nets in the waters of the town of Fairhaven within a line drawn from Commorant Rock southwesterly to the buoy on West Island Rips, and from thence westerly in a straight course through the buoy on West Island Ledge to the town line of Fairhaven.

SEC. 5. Whoever violates any provision of this act or aids or assists in violating the same shall pay a fine not exceeding $200 for each offense.

SEC. 6. District courts and trial justices shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the superior court of all offenses and proceedings under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 7. All fines received under this act shall be paid one-half to the complainant and the other half to the Commonwealth. All moneys from any forfeitures incurred under this act shall inure and be paid one-fourth to the informer and one-fourth to the person filing the libel and the other half to the Commonwealth.

This is an act which the State of Massachusetts passed in 1886 for the protection of her fisheries. There is no doubt at all about her having a right to pass it, but let us consider its application to the people of Rhode Island who have gone in there and set their nets and drawn their seines and caught menhaden. It is claimed by the State of Massachusetts that they had not any right to do so; that that fishery right belonged to the people of Massachusetts and not to the people of Rhode Island; and although we are citizens of a common country and united under a common Federal Constitution, yet that does not give the people of Rhode Island the right to go into Massachusetts and in Buzzard's Bay to interfere and catch fish there the property of the State of Massachusetts.

So these difficulties arise, these controversies find their way into courts, this libel proceeding is instituted mentioned in the newspaper slip which has just been read, and when they come, if the vessels or the seines are condemned, or if the men who are concerned in the fishing are condemned, a fine not exceeding $200 is to be imposed for each offense, and all fines received under the act shall be paid one-half to the complainant and the other half to the Commonwealth.

Mr. President, there has been a great deal of argumentation here against colonial laws, and the Committee on Foreign Relations in their majority report declaim against the laws of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick because, in the libel proceedings which are to be conducted there against foreigners, Frenchmen and Americans alike, for fishing, contrary to treaty right or contrary to statute, within their waters, a portion of the sum, I believe it is one-half, is to go to the informer. Yet Massachusetts repeats that same provision of law and enforces it against the citizens of Rhode Island about the same subject.

I suppose it is too late in this era of enlightenment, Christianity, and moral elevation to expect a State or a people to have any consistency of conduct, and that we have a perfect right to get up on the floor of the Senate and declaim against a foreign government for doing precisely what our own States do. Still I have not been educated up to that standard. It still grates on me. I am sorry that I am so constituted as that these things still rub and irritate. It causes me to apprehend that perhaps there is a want of sincerity somewhere, in the Legislature or somewhere else, when men living in houses so well glazed as these are should take up the regular profession of throwing stones.

That law of Massachusetts applies to a Canadian fishing there. It would have applied under the treaty of 1871 as well as it applies now. Nobody doubts the right of Massachusetts to enact that statute. How extensive is it? It covers the whole waters of Buzzard's Bay. How wide is that bay at the mouth? I do not know but that it is 8 or 10 miles wide.

Suppose under the treaty of 1871 a British or Canadian vessel had come down there to fish under the privileges which the Republicans gave to them in that year, and had encountered a statute, as she would have encountered statutes all along that coast just as formidable as the one I have read, of the State of Massachusetts, what would have become of that vessel? When we speak of extending rights of reciprocity to the Canadian fishermen we confine ourselves in our debates to that sort of reciprocity which is provided by the laws of the United States, not paying the slightest attention to the fact that the States themselves under our constitutional system of government have the right to pass laws of just the character I have read, and to punish men, and punish them severely, with the forfeiture of property, besides a fine not exceeding $200, one-half to go to the informer, for venturing to go into their bays and fish there contrary to their statutes, their local laws.

What do you suppose the people of Massachusetts would have done with those twenty-one ships that ran into Fortune Bay if they had come into a bay of Massachusetts—say into Boston Harbor—and cast their nets about in that bay on a Sunday morning? Why, sir, the whole atmosphere would have been blue with Presbyterian swearing against such a violation of the Sabbath as that. There would have been no end of indignation.

Mr. FRYE. Boston is a Unitarian city.

Mr. MORGAN. Well, there are enough Presbyterians there to salt it. I speak of it as a Presbyterian community because I have the greatest possible respect for that denomination, for they always stand up for what they say and act out their principles. So I think it would have made a Presbyterian elder swear until his hair curled on his head if he had seen twenty-one ships in Boston Bay fishing there—catching the big blackfish that run in there, or the menhaden that run in sometimes accidentally, and even the mackerel that once in a while lose their way and find themselves in Boston Harbor.

Mr. DAWES. They might be obliged to pay for it afterward.

Mr. MORGAN. When we come to apply the doctrines of law to other people it is well enough for us to understand how far we admit that we are subject to the doctrines of the same law on our part.

Now, the statutes of the United States are referred to here as giving to the fishermen of Great Britain or of Canada large privileges and liberties on our coasts. According to my reading, that is a very badly mistaken interpretation of our laws. I will read one of our statutes to see the character of some of the privileges that we say we confer upon the fishermen of Great Britain or of Canada:

SEC. 4365. Whenever a vessel, licensed for carrying on the fisheries, is found within 3 leagues of the coast, with merchandise of foreign growth or manufacture, exceeding the value of $500, without having such permission as is directed by the preceding section, such vessel, together with the merchandise of foreign growth or manufacture imported therein, shall be subject to seizure and forfeiture.

What does that mean? What kind of vessel is that? It must be a vessel licensed for carrying on the fisheries. Does that mean American vessels? Foreign vessels licensed to carry on fishing would be in the same category. If found within 9 miles ("3 leagues") of the coast of the United States with merchandise of foreign growth or manufacture exceeding the value of $500 without having such permission as is provided by the preceding section of the law, such vessel, together with the merchandise of foreign growth or manufacture imported therein, should be subject to seizure and forfeiture.

The preceding section, No. 4364, is as follows:

SEC. 4364. Whenever any vessel licensed for carrying on the fishery is intended to touch and trade at any foreign port it shall be the duty of the master or owner to obtain permission for that purpose from the collector of the district where such vessel may be previous to her departure, and the master of every such vessel shall deliver like manifests and make like enteries, both of the vessel and of the merchandise on board, within the same time and under the same penalty as are by law provided for vessels of the United States arriving from a foreign port.

And then if such vessels are found within 9 miles of the coast with more than $500 of foreign products on board they are liable to forfeiture.

Now, if we give to such ships a right to touch and trade in foreign ports, and they give to their ships the right to touch and trade in our ports, how do they escape, or how do we escape the burden of that statute on them? How do they escape the burden of that statute if they are found within 9 miles of our coast with more than $500 worth of property on board? They, according to law, shall be liable to forfeiture.

We talk a great deal about demanding for our fishermen the same liberties that we give to Canadian fishermen. And yet when we come to admeasure, as I propose to do at some hour in this debate, the rights and privileges and the liberties given by our statutes to Canadian fishermen along our coast, we will find that they are the most meager allowance possible, and that we have actually enjoyed, and I do not know but as matter of consent, as large liberties for years in trading upon their coast as they have enjoyed or are entitled to enjoy under our own statute. The barbarism of these statutes of Canada has been frequently spoken of, and doubtless some of them have been very harsh, but the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] has called attention to the fact that our own system of commercial relations, especially as applicable to fishermen, is just as barbarous as any laws in the world. The truth is that these laws of commerce are in their nature barbarous. I mean by that that they are severe.

What means that statute of the United States that authorizes the captain of a revenue cutter to go 12 miles to sea and board a vessel destined to an American port and examine the whole of her cargo, her manifest, and all that is in that ship, to take possession of the cabin, examine the goods in the captain's apartments and those of other officers, take charge of the ship, take it into custody and remain on board, taking the virtual command of her until that ship is landed at the wharf of the port to which she is destined? Now, what is the meaning of all that?

That is our statute, plain and necessary. Why is it necessary? Because stringent—yes, even barbarous—laws have been found necessary throughout all the ages of commercial civilization for the purpose of preventing smuggling from one country into another; for the purpose of preventing evasions of the revenue laws and the bringing in of matters that are contraband and not importable.

We should find on looking through our statutes, as I propose at some time to do during this debate, that we have not got a system that is quite as liberal as the views that are stated by Senators on this floor. On the contrary we have—and it is necessary that we should have—a very arbitrary and very severe system of inspection, as well as a system giving us rights of seizure of ships that are approaching our ports for any breach of customs regulations.

Let some of the learned jurists and publicists who have been discussing this question of the 3-mile fringe with so much of ability and research, running back into the lore of ancient days to find illustrations about what that law means and how it had its origin and what sort of jurisdiction it confers on the United States—let them now explain to the wide world how it was that when we came to fix the border line between Mexico and the United States we went 10 miles into the sea from Brazos Island and there fixed the termination of the line. What right had Mexico and the United States 10 miles from the shore, out in the depths of the Gulf of Mexico, planning a division line between Mexico and the United States and settling it at that distance from shore?

Where was our jurisdiction to do that? When it stands us in need or becomes convenient or agreeable to us to extend our jurisdiction into the high seas, it makes no difference who interferes with us, we take occasion to do it.

These controversies in question, Mr. President, do not apply alone to the Atlantic coast. While the Senate of the United States is settling its doctrine upon questions of this kind, it is just as well to cast your eye across the continent to waters lying opposite to Alaska and around it, and the waters that wash the shores of Washington Territory and the British possessions there, that lie between the two. For, sir, the principles of public law and the administration of public law that we apply to these fisheries on this side of this continent find their way across the continent to the western waters, and they will be there to plague us when we come to settle other questions of far greater magnitude than those that concern the Atlantic fisheries.

Now, Mr. President, I shall conclude what I have to say on this motion—the motion to postpone until December. I have advanced every argument on this subject that has presented itself to me, and I have felt in duty bound to do it because it has occurred to me that the Senate is not in that temper of mind just now in which it can treat with judicial fairness these very important and intricate questions that are up for decision.

The results of our work upon this treaty will reach down among generations of Americans yet unborn. What we are doing here now must affect the destiny of this country for a great many years to come; for it turns out that we are not merely arranging, temporarily, matters that concern the intercourse between two great countries, but we are laying down principles of diplomatic association, we are laying down principles of general public law which will be appealed to as final and conclusive authority upon this question when we are dead and in our graves for perhaps a century.

Mr. President, I would as soon expect of the Supreme Court of the United States—and I would sooner expect of that court—to render a deliberate, cool, and satisfactory judgment in a matter where every judge on the bench was interested to the amount of a million dollars in property, in litigation, if such a case could be supposed, as to expect the Senate of the United States will be impartial when the behests of parties stand in front of both sides of this Chamber and cause us to make every speech we deliver here, and every motion that is voted upon, and every fact stated, more with reference to a pending political campaign than to the grave questions that are now pending. Just as well might you expect to get an honest, reliable, and satisfactory judgment from a court where the judges were interested pro and con to an amount of a million dollars in the judgment that they are to render, as to expect the Senate of the United States or any other body of men in this country to be able to deliver a cool, quiet, and impartial judgment in the midst of the prevalence of the hot passions of a great political campaign.

I do regret, sir, most sincerely, that the consideration of this question has been brought before the American people at this time; I regret it very deeply, but it is here. It came, I know, without the expectation of its exciting political animosities, or dividing this country upon the lines of the political organizations that are now battling again for the supremacy in the executive government. Still that does not relieve the case of its misfortune. It is a matter that ought to be postponed for our own good and our own credit, for when the Senate of the United States pronounces final judgment upon this matter, those men who are to follow us, in these seats that we now occupy, during the coming generations ought to be able to say, "The wisdom of the Senate was coolly and impartially exercised in the annunciation of the doctrines of that treaty which led to its ratification, and there was no disturbing cause there to influence the molding of the judgment of the Senate by temporary considerations, and to meet temporary emergencies."

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. If this is not a proper subject to be discussed on the eve of a Presidential campaign, why is it that the President of the United States put it on the Senate and on the country on the eve of a Presidential campaign, with the request that it should be made public?

Mr. MORGAN. Because he was an honest, brave, and sincere man, that had confidence in the integrity of his countrymen—a man who believed that he could submit to the Senate of the United States a great treaty like this, a great question like this, without the slightest apprehension that it would be taken and dragged off into the dark secrecy of a party caucus and there fixed and shaped as a man might be prepared to shape a coffin for the burial of his victim.

Mr. MITCHELL. In the first place it was not in the caucus, and in the second place——

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, the Senator can deny that this treaty ever got into a caucus as much as he pleases, but to convince us he has got to revoke what we know. He can not disprove it to our satisfaction. The record is made on that. No, sir, the President of the United States had no idea when he brought this subject to the attention of Senators who are sworn negotiators in this case that the power of party politics would be able to carry it off into the secret conclave of a party caucus, there to have a decree pronounced which there is not liberty enough in the Senate to resist, and which doomed the treaty to destruction.

But this election will pass away, Mr. President; this event will be gone after awhile, and then some of the Senators who thus provoke the indignation of the people will be crying out for the rocks and the mountains to fall on them. This condition of things will not last long. My motion furnishes an opportunity to tide this question over until this unfortunate phase of public opinion and public heat shall have disappeared. But we have to confront it, and I know the doom of the treaty; I know the doom of the motion that I make here today. I know that the political party which in its utter desperation is clutching at every straw that floats upon the surface is engaged here this very hour, using the great powers of the Senate of the United States and its hitherto splendid influence, to drag this country back into the possession of that party that has made this treaty necessary by their act of 1883 repealing the duty on fish and by their treaty of 1871 giving five and a half million dollars as purchase-money for ten years' peace rather than to meet like men the questions that were then just the same that they are this day—just precisely the same.

The people of the United States are not apt, I think, to be very seriously deceived about this matter. And yet, Mr. President, I confess the subject weighs upon my mind with great apprehension, because I see opportunities of evil growing out of it and no good to come. Why is this treaty to be destroyed this day or this week? What harm would it do to the country to let it stand until December? What harm has it done since this discussion began? Who will be the worse off for it if it should live until December and then fall beneath your knife? What wrong or injustice does it inflict upon any human being? Why must the sacrifice be made now? Whose demand is it that requires that this subject shall now be disposed of, while no American citizen can trace to its death any single benefit or advantage?

But for the command of your party this immolation would not take place; but for the ruling of that caucus this treaty would live until December, and take its place along with that other one which you were afraid to bring to the attention of the country at this time, the treaty of extradition—it would pass over like that until December, as we are informed by the Senator from Virginia; I do not speak of it as information that I have a right to utter, but I quote that Senator for the fact. No, sir; it makes no difference what may be the importance and weight of the question, the treaty is not allowed to stand for one moment in the way of the supposed necessities of party rule.

However strongly this present situation appealed to the pure and lofty mind of Daniel Webster, and the no less pure and lofty mind of Edward Everett, or to the sagacious and magnificent mind of William H. Seward, or the strong, earnest, manly, brave, and patriotic mind of Ulysses S. Grant—however strongly the principles that are incorporated in this treaty, and improved upon beyond anything that was ever attempted before in our negotiation, appealed to the judgment and satisfied the consciences of those great men, the politician in this hour who has not the courage to stand against the will of some of his political managers comes into this Senate and decrees the death of a treaty that Edward Everett or Ulysses S. Grant or Daniel Webster would have been glad to have affixed their signatures to, and would have rightfully claimed that it was one of the chief honors of their lives.

I now yield the floor, Mr. President, on this question, on which I expect I shall have nothing further to say.

Mr. GEORGE. Before the Senator from Alabama takes his seat I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. MORGAN. Very well.

Mr. GEORGE. I would like to ask the Senator from Alabama if there is not a modus vivendi provided for in the protocol to the treaty which is of value to the fisheries, and which would fall with the rejection of the treaty?

Mr. MORGAN. Why, I suppose, of course, it would fall. The treaty itself is the only support that the modus vivendi has, as I understand it. The modus vivendi is called a protocol, and is offered as a protocol to a treaty.

Mr. GEORGE. So that any advantages that would come to our fishermen under that protocol to a treaty that we seem to be in haste to reject would be lost by the rejection of the treaty?

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator from Mississippi will indulge me a moment, I think it is for the reason that the protocol is proving the value of the treaty every day that Senators are in great haste to get rid of it, for fear that by December the testimony would be so strong that they could not withstand the effect of the treaty. That is my judgment about it. Perhaps I am mistaken. But if I wanted to defeat this treaty, the first work I should commence would be to dig a mine beneath the protocol and overthrow that, for every hour that it has lasted and every hour that it will last will prove more and more satisfactory to the fishermen and to the American people. It will prove more and more that it is a wise and excellent arrangement, and one that will bring peace and satisfaction to the people both of Canada and of the United States.

Mr. TELLER. Before the Senator from Alabama leaves the Chamber I desire to call his attention to a statement made by him yesterday which I sought then an opportunity to correct, or at least to ask him for his authority, which he declined to allow me to do.

I find that the Senator used yesterday this language, when speaking in reference to the speech of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER]:

If that had occurred to the Senator from New Hampshire when he was a member of the Presidential Cabinet during which these very evils and wrongs were perpetrated as flagrantly as they have been during Cleveland's administration, if that idea had occurred to him then in the plenitude of his patriotic love of country, I suppose that that Senator would have been in St. Elizabeth's by this time through the pressure upon his brain of the terrific neglect with which he had treated the great affairs of this American Union, for he and all his colleagues were as dumb as oysters about these things. The old offenses and the new, this long category, which I grant you has been unredressed through many varying administrations of the Government of the United States, this long category which has oftentimes been condoned by purchases of a very expensive nature made by our people was smoothly passed over by this alert administration of which that Senator was a member. These gentlemen now proclaim from the house-tops to the world the delinquencies of everybody, forgetting that they themselves were the chief delinquents. What did they do or even attempt while in the Executive Departments to assert the rights or redress the wrongs of our fishermen?

I think it is only fair that I should give the Senator from Alabama an opportunity to show what wrongs were committed upon our fishermen at that time before I comment on that very remarkable statement.

Mr. MORGAN. The wrongs that are unredressed and unrequited since 1818 and which are set forth in the report of the minority of the committee, and also in the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts—wrongs that were accumulated, unrequited, unredressed, and almost without protestation from anybody, remained until this present Administration came in, as far as I have been informed, and were passed over with perfect quietude after Mr. Adams got through, in 1823, making his protestations against the seizure of the Reindeer, the Ruby, and the schooner Charles.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, Mr. President, then the Senator goes back to 1823. The statement that he made to the Senate and to the country——

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator wishes to put limitations upon it, of course he is at liberty to do so.

Mr. TELLER. The statement which the Senator made to the Senate and to the country was that these outrages had been perpetrated under the late administration, that is, within the last eight years.

Now, Mr. President, I assert, not only from the recollection of my connection with the last administration, but from a careful examination of the diplomatic correspondence, that there is not a word of truth in that statement. I do not mean to be offensive, but a charge against an administration that it had quietly and without protest allowed outrages of so serious a character as these should not be made when there is not the slightest evidence for it.

During that administration, Mr. President, there never was a seizure of a single American vessel for a violation of the treaty of 1818—not one. During the preceding administration there was a seizure of no vessel for a violation of the treaty of 1818. The Fortune Bay affair, that has been discussed here so much, was promptly met by the then Secretary of State, and Great Britain was compelled to contribute to the payment of the damage that those men had suffered, not a single one of whom, however, had been taken into custody by the British Government.

Since this Administration came into power there have been more than four hundred vessels seized and taken out of their course and subjected to expense and cost. More than two thousand vessels have been boarded by Canadian and British authorities. The flag has been hauled down, and no apology has ever been made for it—no apology that is decent or fit for a government to receive. The Senator from Alabama would have it understood that the late Administration was guilty of neglecting the interests of the people, as the present Administration has been guilty of neglecting the interests of the people in this particular.

I want to put it upon record, Mr. President, that the Senator, although he has left the Chamber, will not say here or elsewhere, nor will any of his associates, that during the four years of Republican administration preceding this there was a single attempt made on the part of the Canadians to take any of our vessels into port and to condemn them—not one.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to ask the Senator from Colorado a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly, I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to ask the Senator this: Was not a treaty in force during the whole of the preceding administration?

Mr. TELLER. Of course it was.

Mr. GEORGE. A treaty which allowed the fishing vessels of the United States free fishery rights in the waters of Canada?

Mr. TELLER. Of course it was in force. There is not any doubt about that. That is why, I suppose, there were not any outrages and that is why there is not any truth in the statement here made. The Senator from Alabama made the same statement when he referred to myself and my connection with the Administration, that I had not raised objection or found any fault with these outrages. No outrages occurred, Mr. President, and nobody ought to know it better than the Senator from Alabama. To say that he referred to the outrages of 1823 and the subsequent outrages is not consistent with the language that he used.

I do not desire to say anything improper toward the Senator from Alabama. He declared yesterday that he was one of the most patriotic men in the Union. I concede it; I have never questioned his patriotism; I have never questioned the patriotism of his associates here. I have denied their right to assert that they had all the patriotism that there was in the American Senate, and I have asserted that because they have been in rebellion against the Government, because they have fought to destroy the Government, it did not follow that they were more loyal to the Government now than I, who was always loyal to it. I do not think it is absolutely necessary in order that a man may be loyal to the Government that he should have fought on our side, and it certainly does not follow that he is loyal simply because he fought on the other side.

A great many American citizens like myself did not enter the Army, but during all the time of that great contest we were found in sympathy with the Government, contributing to its support, maintaining its credit, and assisting it in all varieties of ways. All our sympathies and hopes and aspirations were bound up in it, while the Senator from Alabama was praying for its destruction, and not only praying, Mr. President, but he was laboring for it. And he tells us here to-day that when the war was over we did not dare to punish treason.

I was one of the men weak enough to believe that if we had to live with these people as fellow-citizens it was not well that we should commence punishing them for the treason of which they had been guilty. I was one of the great number and of the great mass of Northern people who said, "You have been guilty of crimes of great magnitude. By the laws that govern transactions of this character you are amenable to punishment, even unto death. But we do not believe that punishment of that kind makes treason any more odious, or gives any greater guaranties that it will not occur again." And we said, with one accord, with one voice, "We want no punishment save that which you have inflicted upon yourselves; you will have to help us to bear the great debt which you have put upon the country." We opened the doors, Mr. President, to these men, with few exceptions, without any exception when they came here and prayed for relief. We said they might come back; and to-day we are told that this great munificent and magnificent charity, unlike anything seen in the history of men, grew out of the cowardice of the Northern people! Why, Mr. President, a drum-head court-martial was the way to punish these men, if we punished them at all. To talk about going into court, and that we were afraid that the judiciary was not sound as to the right of a State to secede, is bosh, and the Senator from Alabama and everybody else knows it. They were not entitled to a civil trial. They had been caught in arms against the Government, and they might have been hung without a jury in accordance with a law that runs everywhere among civilized and even among merciful and charitable people.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. I mean to say that in no civilized country, where there is a civil war—certainly in no Anglo-Saxon country where there is a civil war—in which men are captured in arms against the Government, are they liable to be tried for treason against the Government except in a civil court. They may be tried by military tribunals for acts done while they are in arms which are in violation of the rules of war, but they can not be tried, if I have not misread the history of this country and of England, for the crime of treason by any but a civil court.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Mississippi simply exhibits his lack of reading. There was not a man that had carried a musket, there was not a man that had ridden a horse as an officer in the rebellion who had not committed a crime for which he could have been punished under the military law—not a single one. The Government declined to do it, and rightfully in my judgment, for while it might have struck terror among the people to have executed the leaders, including the head of the Confederacy and the men who led the masses into rebellion, the Government of the United States could not hope or expect, if it was to maintain its status as a nation undivided, to do so except by the love and the good-will of all the people, and it did not propose by terrorism or by punishment to hold these States to itself; but hoped to hold them by loving fellowship and by the blessings that it could hold out to them of a great and united people.

It was with that hope and in that spirit, Mr. President, that we said, "Come back," and it was not because we were cowards. Why, what had we to fear? We had the grandest army that the world ever saw, led by the grandest leaders that history has ever mentioned. And we had then, if we had it not before, the sympathy of the civilized world. What had we to fear? As the Senator from Massachusetts to my left [Mr. DAWES] suggests, we had to feed the armies of the Confederacy to keep them from starving when they surrendered, and it was our great captain who said to them, "Take your horses and go home; you will need them to put in your spring crops"—contraband of war that every other nation in the world would have taken from them, being thus returned to them. Was that cowardice on the part of General Grant? Ah, Mr. President, it does not come with good grace from a Senator who owes his position here to the clemency and to the mercy of the Northern people and of the Government to talk about cowardice and that we were afraid to punish them as civilized nations have again and again punished rebellion.

I do not assert and have not asserted anywhere that the Senators sitting on that side of the Chamber who were in arms against the Government are not loyal to it now. But I deny their right to stand here and charge that because I differ with them I am not loyal to it, as loyal as they, or that my associates sitting here are not as loyal as they. I deny that there is anything in the history of a single member on that side, personal or political, that justifies him in proclaiming that he has greater devotion to the interests of the whole people than I have or than my associates have.

The Senator from Alabama says the people of the North are not to be fooled and that the country is not to be fooled. He will find that all this ranting about loyalty and devotion on his side and the lack of it on ours will "fool" nobody in this country.

We used to hear this talk before the war. We used to hear gentlemen talk about devotion to the Constitution, and because we did not want slavery to be carried to the Territories we were charged with want of devotion to the Constitution. Within a few months after these declarations were made on this floor and elsewhere the gentlemen making them were in arms against the Government; men sitting in this Chamber and in the other House, men holding high official position, were plotting against the Government while they were drawing its pay and while they were under oath to serve it with fidelity and with zeal.

It is time, Mr. President, that this thing was stopped. We did not begin it on this side of the Chamber; we have imputed no lack of patriotism to gentlemen on the other side. We have not talked even about the war. It is the Democratic Senators who have introduced this subject, and they expect that we shall sit quietly by and hear it said that there is a merit in their having gone into rebellion because they were honest. Granted that they were honest, it was certainly a mistaken honesty, as they now admit. It did not rise to the height of statesmanship when they led off into rebellion to destroy this Government. It must have been that they were grossly ignorant of the great strength of the American people, as they were ignorant of the Northern sentiment, which they believed was so bound up in trade that the Northern people would quietly yield rather than disturb the commerce of the country.

But when they heard the tramp of more than two millions of men, when they felt the strong arm of the law, when they were compelled to meekly surrender, they were ready to accept what we would give; they did not expect the terms they got. It has been repeatedly declared by leading men of the Confederacy that they did not expect those terms, and there are men now sitting in this Chamber who were so confident that the Government would measure off to them their just deserts that they fled the country and went to foreign lands. Yet we are told that we did not dare to inflict punishment upon them. If there is anything that will make the Northern people at times think that we were mistaken in our terms given to those men upon that occasion, it is declarations like that made by the Senator from Alabama.

I do not intend, Mr. President, to enter into any discussion of this treaty now. I do not intend to reply any more to this sort of language from the Senator from Alabama or anybody else. I want to say, once for all, that in my judgment it is unbecoming the American Senate to have such language used here. Every one here ought to be presumed to be loyal to the Government. Every man here ought to be presumed to be as patriotic as every other man, and a difference of opinion upon the question of a treaty does not justify anybody in charging the other with less patriotism than himself.

Mr. GEORGE and Mr. CHANDLER addressed the Chair.

Mr. CHANDLER. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. GEORGE. I will not detain the Senate more than a moment. The only controversy, I will not say quarrel, that exists between myself and the Senator from Colorado in respect to this matter arises out of a statement I made in response to the statement which he had made. He stated that at the end of the war the United States might have legally and constitutionally proceeded for the crime of treason——

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to correct him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I did not state any such thing. We could have settled those questions before the war closed; that was the time to settle them, and the war did not close until long after the Confederate soldiers had laid down their arms.

Mr. GEORGE. Then I understand the Senator to modify his statement, or else I misunderstood him. I understood him to say that at any time during the war and at the close of the war the United States might have punished for the crime of treason by proceeding by a drumhead court-martial. I suppose I have got the statement of the Senator right now. In response to that I stated that under the Constitution of the United States, and in England, or wherever Anglo-Saxon institutions prevail, the crime of treason per se could not be punished except in a civil court. Treason is a crime where it is perpetrated against the United States. Section 3 of Article III of the Constitution says:

> Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, as in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort.

There is a definition of treason—it "shall consist only" in that. There is no constructive treason; there is no treason by words. It is a crime recognized in the Constitution of the United States as being a crime against the United States. By Article V of the amendments to the Constitution it is provided:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous, crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger.

If treason, then, be a crime against the United States, as I admit it is (I do not admit, however, that we were guilty of treason; but I shall not discuss that now), there was no way of punishing a man for that offense consistent with the Constitution of the United States except by presentment or indictment before a grand jury. No grand juries, as I suppose the Senator will admit, are used in drum-head courts-martial.

The Senator made another statement; I will see if I have got this one right, if the Senator will give me his attention, as I do not wish to misrepresent him. After I had made the statement that by military court-martial no man in arms against the Government could be punished except for a breach of military law, I understood the Senator to say, in order to obviate the force of that objection, that every single Confederate had been guilty of a breach of military law. This is the first time I ever heard that statement made. It is a very sweeping assertion to charge that men who were carrying on what they considered as lawful war, recognized by the United Sates as carrying on lawful war, by cartels, by military agreements, by exchange of prisoners—that every single man thus engaged had been guilty, not now of treason—that is not the question—but guilty of a breach of military law, that is, a breach of the laws and customs recognized by civilized people as governing men who are engaged in warfare.

I undertake to say that that assertion of the Senator, broad and sweeping as it is, is, as I understand and as I believe, untrue, and without proper foundation in the history of the country.

A breach of military law is not the same thing, as the Senator will recognize, as a breach of civil law in levying war against the United States. I think the Senator has gone too far in that matter. If I were to ask him to specify and point out the breach of military law, that is of military customs which restrain men and bind men engaged in war against others to the performance of certain acts and to the refusal of the doing of certain acts, I think the Senator would find himself under very great difficulty in specifying.

The question whether we were guilty of treason or not I shall not undertake to discuss now. I will merely add this remark, that according to the doctrine recognized in the early history of the country, recognized as late as 1814 by several of the New England States in the Hartford convention, recognized later even than that, I believe, between 1830 and 1840, by one of the then most distinguished writers on American constitutional law, Mr. Rawle, the Senator would find it difficult to make out in a court the proposition that the men who in obedience to the action of the States of which they were citizens made war against the United States were guilty of treason.

However, I will not go into that question. Whenever it becomes proper to be discussed here, I think my contention can be made very evident. At least I will not go very far into the matter now, because it is really a question that ought not to be discussed at all; but I will go to the extent of saying that it will be found that while there were differences of opinion on that question, there was very respectable authority not only among the statesmen of this country but also among the jurists of this country, which would exempt from the crime of treason the men who fought in obedience to the command of their State.

Now, as to the controversy between the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] as to whether the United States did or did not dare to try us for treason, that is not my controversy.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I would like to suggest to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], as that statement has been made again and again and again since the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] went out of the Chamber, that he made no such statement as that attributed to him by the Senator from Colorado, and which seems to be repeated by the Senator from Mississippi. What the Senator from Alabama said was that the Government did not dare to try Jeff Davis where he was arraigned before a civil court where he was indicted on this charge of treason. He did not say anything about its not daring to try other people or to punish other people.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well. That, at any rate, is not my controversy.

If the Senator from Colorado or any other Senator wishes to say that it was an act of magnanimity on the part of the United States that we were not prosecuted for treason, I am very willing to join in that opinion—very willing. I will state this, however, that in no civilized country, so far as I know, after millions of people on either side had been engaged in civil war for a long time, were the great body of the people ever prosecuted for treason after the close of hostilities.

Mr. TELLER. I did not say that all the Confederates were guilty of a violation of the articles of war or of the rules of war.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me just a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield?

Mr. TELLER. No, I must decline to yield now. I will state what I said.

Mr. GEORGE. I simply appealed to the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. I said that we were under no obligation, when we had subdued the men in arms against the Government, to put them to trial before a jury. The war lasted a good while after General Lee surrendered, and it was not formally declared to have ended until late in the season.

Mr. HOAR. The 15th of August, 1866.

Mr. TELLER. The 15th of August, 1866—a long time afterwards. And does the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] suppose that during all that time all proceedings were to be conducted in accordance with the Constitution and the written law of the land? Does he not know, and does not everybody know, that it is an axiom as old as the law itself that in war the laws are silent? Inter arma silent leges. Does he not know that all over the South during that period there was no pretense of civil authority at all? How many men were court-martialed and sentenced to death in our Army? And I think we had as much power over the other army as we had over our own. Suppose we had seen fit to punish one hundred and fifty of the leaders? Suppose we had taken a man who stood in this Senate and furnished information to the men in arms? Suppose we had taken members of this Senate now who did not have the excuse that their States were in rebellion, and we had punished them with death, who was there to have lifted his voice or his hand—who could have invoked the Constitution then in Mississippi, where the Senator from Mississippi lived? The Senator did not expect that that would be done. He did not anticipate that the Government was going to put these people before a jury, if they were to be punished. The like was never heard of anywhere. All nations assert the right when their citizens are in rebellion against the government to punish them if they see fit. Simply we did not see fit. That is all there is about it; and I am not astonished that the Senator from Mississippi says that there was not any treason at all. That was the theory of all the reconstructed people; that was the theory upon which the war began, that there could not be any treason by levying war against the Government of the United States if the State only said levy war. What will he do with the many thousand men who went from Kentucky, the many thousand men who went from Missouri, when their States were in full unison with the Government of the United States? Will he assert that they were not guilty of treason? But is it not pretty late to raise the question in the American Senate whether those people were guilty of treason or not? Is it not pretty late to raise the question who was right? For if they were not guilty of treason, then we were wrong when we put down with the strong hand the rebellion. If it was not a crime, then we were guilty of a crime, and that is what the Senator from Mississippi proposes to say. Then we were violating the principles of good government and we were the murderers when we killed the soldiers in arms.

That question has been settled, settled in such a way that it does not need to be mooted any more in this country. It is not worth while for the Senator to raise that question now, and I hope that very few of the people of his section of country will attribute the clemency of the Government to the same source and reason that the Senator from Alabama did.

I notice that the Senator from Arkansas says the Senator from Alabama did not say that we did not dare to try others but that we did not dare to try Jeff. Davis. Jeff. Davis was no more guilty than the Senator from Mississippi, no more guilty than the Senator from Alabama. If we could have convicted one we could have convicted the other. It was not the policy of the Government to convict anybody, and it was a mercy that I am sorry to say has never been appreciated by the men who were the recipients of it from the General Government.

Mr. GEORGE. If I misstated the position of the Senator from Colorado it was his own fault, because, having corrected me in the first statement I made, when I came to make the last one I especially appealed to him to correct me if I was in error, which he did not do. That is my apology if I have made any misstatement of his position. Certainly I did not desire to do so.

There is only one other remark that I desire to make, and that is this: I did not raise the question of treason here. If I measured my words as I intended to do—and I confess that I sometimes do not do that—I said that I would not discuss that question now. I said in addition that when the question came to be investigated it would be found that there was respectable authority from the earlier history of the country, and sustained by a law writer about 1830, for the position that we did not commit treason under those circumstances. I do not propose to discuss that question. I think that question is out of date.

But I might call the attention of the Senator from Colorado—his reading, however, is so much more extended than mine on these matters that possibly I am only reminding him of something that he knows very well—to the fact that it so turned out that when Mr. Davis, who the Senator says very properly (and I thank him for saying so) is no more guilty than the Senator from Alabama and myself, was indicted he was triable before Chief-Justice Chase, then the presiding Chief-Justice of the United States, who sat in the circuit in which Mr. Davis was indicted. Let me remind the Senator that Chief-Justice Chase decided—and that would have controlled the decision on Mr. Davis's case—that the fourteenth amendment was a constitutional barrier against a prosecution for treason during the preceding war. The judge before whom Mr. Davis was to be tried entertained the opinion, and expressed it in a solemn judicial judgment, that Mr. Davis could not be convicted. Whether the dismissal of the prosecution against Mr. Davis was the result of the judgment (in another case, however) pronounced by Chief-Justice Chase or was the result of pure magnanimity I leave to the Senator from Colorado to decide for himself.

Mr. FRYE. Now, can we not have a vote?

Mr. HOAR. Allow me to say that the fourteenth amendment did not become operative until July 28, 1868.

Mr. FRYE. I think this matter has been discussed about long enough.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I think I have heard to-day for the fourth time since this debate commenced allusions made to the Hartford convention. Precisely what the Hartford convention has to do with this debate, or precisely why Senators upon the other side should think that they can gain some advantage in the discussion by referring to the Hartford convention, I am somewhat at a loss to know. Once when it was referred to it was in connection with a statement that people who live in glass houses should not throw stones; and it occurred to me that if there was a parallel there was at least a contrast between the Hartford convention and some other conventions which have been held in the United States, a contrast which it is worth a moment's time to portray.

The Hartford convention is now a matter of ancient history. Few men live in this country who have any recollection of the times or the circumstances under which it was held. It is seventy-five years since the Hartford convention convened. It is but a few years comparatively, and fresh in the minds of a great many of us, since other States held conventions which eventuated in an entirely different manner from the Hartford convention. The Hartford convention was called not to take any State out of the Union, not with any such purpose, but for the purpose of determining how States which felt that they had grievances might best secure their rights under the Constitution. The resolutions which came from the State of Massachusetts to the State of Connecticut suggesting the Hartford convention, called upon the States of Connecticut and Rhode Island to join with Massachusetts—

To devise, if practicable, means of security and defense which may be consistent with the preservation of their resources from total ruin, and adapted to their local situation, mutual relations and habits, and not repugnant to their obligations as members of the Union.

The call which was issued for the Hartford convention to be held on the 15th day of December, 1814, was—

To confer with delegates from Massachusetts and such other New England States as shall join in the enterprise—

Was, to use the words of the committee—for the purpose of devising and recommending such measures for the safety and welfare of those States as may be consistent with our obligations as members of the National Union.

It is not for me to defend that convention. It sat with closed doors. Its public utterances consisted of four or five resolutions, one of which suggested amendments to the Constitution of the United States, and in no one of which was there an intimation that any of the States represented in that convention would under any circumstances secede from the Union, in no one of which was the right of secession even hinted at.

How was it with certain other conventions in recent times, within the memory of Senators who sit here, within the memory of young men who but for a few years have cast their ballots as citizens of the United States, called for the avowed purpose of destroying the Union, called for the avowed purpose of seceding from the Union, and resulting in carrying out the purposes for which they were called so far as it was possible for those States to carry them out? I think Senators may well say that those who live in glass houses should not throw stones.

But, Mr. President, if Senators see in the facts which I have detailed even a dim and remote parallel between the Hartford convention and its action and the conventions of the seceding States and their action, there is a contrast which is apparent. So jealous were the people of Connecticut, of Massachusetts, of Rhode Island, of the Union, of the obligation of all citizens to the Union, so impressed were they with the idea that the Union was indissoluble, that the men who sat in the Hartford convention and partook in its deliberations were forever banished, as it were, from the councils of this nation. Those men never took up arms against the Government; those men never levied war against the United States; those men were never guilty of the crime of treason; those men never by resolution or act indicated that they ever intended to sever their relations and the relations of their States to this Union; and yet no one of them was ever thereafter permitted to take part in the councils of this nation or to become an officer of any of the departments of this nation.

I want to read what a Connecticut historian says on that subject:

The grave has closed over them all. In their lifetime they were kept from the councils of the nation because they had been unfortunate enough to be designated by the General Assembly for the place that they filled with such ability and integity. Like a priesthood honored in their monastic retirement, but excluded from the field where they were eminently fitted to shine, they passed the rest of their days under a cloud. Let their conquerors be generous. Let them not trample rudely upon the ashes nor trifle with the fame of the strong men who were singled out by the State as hostages to remain in exile for the policy, demeanor, and future good faith of those whom they represented.—Hollister's Connecticut, volume 2, page 505.

How about the men who sat in conventions to take their States out of the Union? How about the men who sat in the conventions of the Confederate States, as they were called? How about the men who were engaged in levying war against the United States? How about the men who met loyal men upon the battle-field and helped to shoot down those who were defending the integrity of the Union? Have they by their States been relegated to private life? Have they by their States been kept out of the councils of the nation? No, Mr. President, they are here with the blood of loyal men upon their hands, telling us that they are loyal and by insinuation that we are not. Sir, it is well to say that people who live in glass houses ought not to throw stones.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the reference I made to the Hartford convention when I was on the floor before was not meant, as I think the RECORD will bear me out in saying, in any sense of casting opprobrium upon that convention. Whatever I may think about that convention, I am sure I expressed nothing of disapprobation of that convention in the remarks which I made. I alluded to that convention as recognizing in their proceedings the right of secession; and now I have before me the proceedings of that convention, published by Mr. Dwight, who was secretary of the convention. That convention, if I understood the Senator from Connecticut—and I am not sure that I did, because he spoke low and I hear with difficulty—did something more than pass some resolutions, unless the historian of the convention is not to be credited. On page 352 of the History of the Hartford convention, by its secretary, Mr. Dwight, commences a report as follows:

The delegates from the Legislatures of the States of Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island, and from the counties of Grafton and Cheshire in the State of New Hampshire and the county of Windham in the State of Vermont, assembled in convention, beg leave to report the following result of their conference.

It is a very long report and a very able report. I propose to read from it, simply to justify me in the statement which I made, a short extract. On page 361 that report proceeds as follows:

That acts of Congress in violation of the Constitution are absolutely void is an undeniable position. It does not, however, consist with respect and forbearance due from a confederate State—

Note, according to the present idea, what a treasonable expression they used, "a confederate State"— toward the General Government to fly to open resistance upon every infraction of the Constitution. The mode and the energy of the opposition should always conform to the nature of the violation, the intention of its authors, the extent of the injury inflicted, the determination manifested to persist in it, and the danger of delay. But in cases of deliberate, dangerous, and palpable infractions of the Constitution, affecting the sovereignty of a State and liberties of the people, it is not only the right, but the duty of such a State to interpose its authority for their protection, in the manner best calculated to secure that end. When emergencies occur which are either beyond the reach of the judicial tribunals or too pressing to admit of the delay incident to their forms—

And here is very treasonable language, according to the present understanding upon the other side of the Chamber—

States which have no common umpire must be their own judges and execute their own decisions. It will thus be proper for the several States to await the ultimate disposal of the obnoxious measures recommended by the Secretary of War, or pending before Congress, and so to use their power according to the character these measures shall finally assume as effectually to protect their own sovereignty and the rights and liberties of their citizens.

That is a whole paragraph. Now I turn to page 376, and I will read the first resolution passed by that body, which is as follows:

Therefore resolved, That it be, and hereby is, recommended to the Legislatures of the several States represented in this convention to adopt all such measures as may be necessary effectually to protect the citizens of said States from the operation and effects of all acts which have been or may be passed by the Congress of the United States which shall contain provisions subjecting the militia or other citizens to forcible drafts, conscriptions, or impressments not authorized by the Constitution of the United States.

I have read that, sir, not for the purpose of casting any reproach upon anybody, but to justify me in referring to the proceedings of the Hartford convention to show what opinions were held on the subject of State rights in the early days of the Republic as offering some excuse or palliation for the secession of 1861 in the judgment of those who are so much opposed to it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, a statement made yesterday by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] was as follows:

If that occurred to the Senator from New Hampshire when he was a member of the Presidential Cabinet during which these very evils and wrongs were perpetrated as flagrantly as they have been during Cleveland's administration.

I join with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] in denying that during the three years in which we had the honor to be members of the Cabinet of President Arthur any of these wrongs or outrages were perpetrated by the Canadians upon the New England fishermen. There was no reason why they wished to perpetrate these outrages then, because the treaty of 1871 was then in force, and under that treaty they had the right to bring their fish free of duty into American markets. When that treaty was terminated in 1885, they lost their right to free fish and they recommenced their outrages.

When the Senator from Alabama was asked by the Senator from Colorado what were the outrages which he so boldly asserted were so flagrantly perpetrated during the administration of President Arthur and the Senator from Colorado and myself were as "dumb as oysters," he referred to the list of such outrages, which he said could be found in the report of the minority of the Committee on Foreign Relations upon this treaty.

An examination of that list, which has been made by myself and by the Senator from Colorado, fails to reveal a single outrage happening during the administration of President Arthur, and the statement of the Senator from Alabama is quite as inaccurate as many others which he has been making during this long debate, but to which I will not now undertake to call the attention of the Senate.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to discuss the details of the pending treaty. Since the Republican majority, with a view to party advantage, abandoned the long-established usage of the Senate and determined to take our adversaries into their confidence by considering this treaty in open session; since distinguished Senators, especially the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], deliberately surrendered their opinions against an open session upon the supposed exigencies of party warfare, I have considered the defeat of any treaty with England so absolutely certain that my interest in the matter has been greatly diminished. I am compelled to state, Mr. President, that in my opinion the Administration of Mr. Cleveland could in no possible contingency negotiate any treaty with England which would be approved by the Republican majority in this Chamber. It has been predetermined and foreordained that no such treaty shall be ratified. I believe this, and have no disposition, therefore, to waste my own strength or the time of the Senate in debating a foregone conclusion. To allow the man who defeated the Republican party in the last canvass, and who is now a living, breathing barrier to their reaching again power and patronage, to successfully negotiate a treaty with England could not for one moment be contemplated. Besides this, it was necessary to secure the Irish vote by publicly twisting the tail of the British lion until he "roared again." No amount of indignant denial by the Senator from Ohio, or any other Senator, will remove this impression in face of the record showing the almost unanimous vote of the Republicans against the consideration of the treaty in open session, and then their equal unanimity in the opposite direction. For a time the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER] stood alone, but as the Presidential canvass waxed warm and party exigencies increased he was reinforced, without one additional argument except that of party expediency, by the entire Republican vote in the Senate.

To the intelligent reader of American history this attempt to identify the Democratic party with English ideas or interests is supremely ridiculous. The attempt of the Republican party, lineally descended from the old Federalists, to pose as the peculiar advocates of home rule and local self-government is equally absurd. In the convention of 1789, which framed the Constitution, Mr. Hamilton, the leader of the Federalists and the author of the tariff system, declared that the British Government was the best ever constructed, and that we should adopt its leading features upon this continent. On the other hand, Thomas Jefferson, "the great philosophic statesman," as Mr. Blaine terms him in his recently published book, earnestly opposed the centralizing and monarchical tenets of Hamilton, and advocated home rule and local self-government. Through all our subsequent political history and now this is the great fundamental and ineradicable distinction between the Democratic party and its adversaries.

The Irish, whatever else may be said, are not idiots, nor have they forgotten in the recent past how they were denounced as the drunken, ignorant, Democratic Irish by the party now soliciting their suffrage. So long as the negro vote was supposed to furnish a political contingent to be used for the absolute supremacy of the Republican party in the Southern States, these choice epithets were the usual terms employed by the Republican press and Republican orators towards Irish voters, but the negro vote has failed to bring desired results, and now the air of this Chamber is heavy with eloquent sympathy for "downtrodden and oppressed Ireland," and with eulogies by the party of centralization upon home rule and local self-government. Verbs, adverbs, pronouns, and participles in martial array have been hurled against England by the lineal political descendants of the Federalists of 1800, who then praised English institutions and denounced Jefferson as an apologist for the atrocities of the French revolution and an ally of Napoleon Bonaparte.

Mr. President, we have heard some strange things recently in this Chamber.

Old John Brown's body lies moldering in the grave,
But his soul is marching on, has been supplemented by "Erin go Bragh." But this is not all. We were told some days since, by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], that the Democratic party had done nothing especially worthy of commendation towards excluding the Chinese from our shores, but that every measure looking to that end had come from the Republican party.

My principal object in now addressing the Senate is to show by the record beyond any doubt or question that the reverse of this statement is true, and that all the opposition to legislation intended to prevent Chinese immigration has come from the Republican party, and from distinguished Republicans, including their candidate for the Presidency, General Benjamin Harrison, of Indiana.

CHINESE LABORERS.

On February 24, 1882, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill "to execute certain treaty stipulations with the Chinese," reported favorably by the Committee on Foreign Relations, and which provided as follows:

Whereas in the opinion of the Government of the United States the coming of Chinese laborers to this country endangers the good order of certain localities within the territory thereof: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the expiration of ninety days next after the passage of this act, and until the expiration of twenty years next after the passage of this act, the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States be, and the same is hereby, suspended; and during such suspension it shall not be lawful for any Chinese laborer to come, or, having come after the expiration of said ninety days, to remain, within the United States.

SEC. 2. That any master of any vessel, of whatever nationality, who shall knowingly on such vessel bring within the jurisdiction of the United States, and permit to be landed, any Chinese laborer from any foreign port or place, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500 for each and every such Chinese laborer so brought, and may be also imprisoned for a term not exceeding one year.

SEC. 3. That the two foregoing sections shall not apply to Chinese laborers who were in the United States on the 7th day of November, 1880.

The first amendment proposed was that of Mr. Grover, a Democratic Senator from Oregon, on February 28, 1882:

That the words "Chinese laborers" wherever used in this act shall be construed to mean both skilled and unskilled laborers, and Chinese employed in mining.

On March 9, 1882, this amendment was adopted by the following vote:

Yeas—Bayard, Beck, Call, Cameron of Wisconsin, Cockrell, Coke, Fair, Farley, Garland, George, Gorman, Harris, Jackson, Jonas, Jones of Nevada, Maxey, Miller of California, Morgan, Pugh, Ransom, Slater, Vance, Vest, Voorhees, Walker.

Twenty-three Democrats and 2 Republicans.

Nays—Aldrich, Allison, Blair, Brown, Conger, Davis of Illinois, Dawes, Edmunds, Frye, Hale, Hill of Colorado, Hoar, Ingalls, Lapham, McDill, McMillan, Miller of New York, Mitchell, Morrill, Saunders, Sawyer, Teller.

Twenty-one Republicans and 1 Democrat.

The next amendment of importance was offered by Senator INGALLS (Republican), providing that—

From and after the expiration of ninety days next after the passage of this act, and until the expiration of ten years next after the passage of this act, the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States be, and the same is hereby, suspended.

On March 8, 1882, this amendment was rejected by the following vote:

Yeas—Aldrich, Allison, Blair, Brown, Cockrell, Conger, Davis of Illinois, Dawes, Edmunds, Frye, Harris, Hoar, Ingalls, Jackson, Lapham, McDill, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill, Saunders, Sewell, Sherman, Teller.

Nineteen Republicans and 4 Democrats.

Nays—Bayard, Beck, Call, Cameron of Wisconsin, Coke, Fair, Farley, Garland, George, Hale, Hampton, Hill of Colorado, Jonas, Jones of Nevada, McPherson, Maxey, Miller of California, Miller of New York, Morgan, Ransom, Slater, Vest, Walker.

Eighteen Democrats and 5 Republicans.

By this vote all except five Republican Senators declared that Chinese immigration should be permitted after ten years, while every Democratic Senator except four voted to prohibit such immigration for twenty years. General Harrison was paired with Senator Maxey, the former being for the amendment. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, March 9, 1882.)

The next important amendment was proposed by Senator HOAR (Republican), as follows:

That this bill shall not apply to any skilled laborer who shall establish that he comes to this country without any contract by which his labor is the property of any person other than himself.

Upon the adoption of this amendment the vote was:

Yeas—Aldrich, Allison, Brown, Conger, Davis of Illinois, Dawes, Edmunds, Frye, Hale, Harrison, Hoar, Ingalls, McDill, McMillan, Mahone, Mitchell, Morrill.

Sixteen Republicans and 1 Democrat.

Nays—Bayard, Beck, Call, Cockrell, Coke, Fair, Farley, George, Groome, Harris, Hampton, Jackson, Jonas, Jones of Nevada, Maxey, Miller of California, Miller of New York, Morgan, Plumb, Pugh, Ransom, Saunders, Slater, Teller, Vance, Vest, Walker.

Twenty-two Democrats and 6 Republicans. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 13, part 2, pages 1702 to 1717.)

It will be noticed that the plain effect of this amendment, for which the Republican candidate for President voted, was to admit into competition with American labor Chinese skilled labor, unless it could be shown that it was brought here by contract. Its adoption would have practically destroyed the bill.

Senator HOAR (Republican), who opposed the bill persistently in all its stages, then offered an amendment providing—

That any laborer who shall receive a certificate from the United States consul at the port where he shall embark that he is a citizen, coming to this country at his own expense, and by his own free will, and has established such fact to the satisfaction of such consul, shall not be affected by this bill.

This amendment, it will be noticed, permitted Chinese labor to come into competition with American labor, provided the consul should certify that the laborer was coming here at his own expense.

The vote in the Senate upon this amendment was:

Yeas—Aldrich, Allison, Brown, Conger, Davis of Illinois, Dawes, Frye, Hale, Harrison, Hoar, Ingalls, Jackson, McDill, McMillin, Mahone, Mitchell, Morrill, Plumb, Saunders.

Seventeen Republicans and 2 Democrats.

Nays—Bayard, Beck, Call, Cockrell, Coke, Fair, Farley, George, Groome, Hampton, Harris, Jonas, Jones of Nevada, Maxey, Miller of California, Miller of New York, Morgan, Pugh, Ransom, Slater, Teller, Vance, Walker.

Nineteen Democrats and 4 Republicans. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 13, part 2, pages 1702 to 1717.)

It will be noticed that here again the Republican candidate for President placed himself upon record in favor of allowing Chinese labor to compete with American labor, if the Chinaman could only procure a certificate from a consul that he had himself paid for his passage to this country. In other words, whenever a Chinaman, no matter how degraded or brutal, could beg, borrow, or steal enough money to pay his passage, and should go to a United States consul and make exhibit of that sum and obtain his certificate, he could then land upon our shores and compete with the American laborer.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], fully appreciating the significance of these votes, attempts to explain them away by the following extraordinary statement:

General Harrison at that time, in common with most of the Eastern people who had not visited the Pacific coast, was ignorant of the character of the Chinese, of their tricks and devices to evade our laws, and it seemed to him unreasonable to exclude free and independent skilled laborers who came to the country of their own accord and not under cooly contracts or contracts for labor. He would certainly have voted otherwise if he had been better informed, as his subsequent record abundantly proves.

These votes, which the Senator from Nevada seeks to explain, were cast on March 8, 1882, twelve years after the debate on the Chinese question in 1870, to which the Senator devoted so much of his speech on the 7th instant, and which he declared to have been "earnest, serious, and exhaustive." During all the intervening years the question of Chinese immigration had been the burning issue on the Pacific coast and had largely attracted the attention of the entire country. For more than two weeks an able and instructive debate had been proceeding in the Senate, in which every phase of the Chinese question was elaborately discussed. But it is within my personal knowledge that General Harrison knew from actual observation much more of the Chinese question than many of his colleagues, for he had before giving this vote often visited Helena, Mont., his son being United States assayer at that place, and had there seen the Chinese quarters, with all the curious habits of this strange people. The plea of ignorance by the Senator from Nevada in behalf of General Harrison, is therefore, under the circumstances, an attack upon his intelligence both as a public man and an individual which constitues a reflection upon the party presenting him as their candidate for the highest office within the gift of the American people.

CHINESE NATURALIZATION.

An amendment to the bill offered by Senator Farley (Democrat) provided:

That hereafter no State court or court of the United States shall admit Chinese to citizenship; and all laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

On March 9, 1882, a vote was taken in the Senate upon this amendment, with the following result:

Yeas—Bayard, Beck, Call, Cameron of Wisconsin, Cockrell, Cole, Fair, Farley, Garland, George, Gorman, Harris, Jackson, Jonas, Jones of Nevada, Maxey, Miller of California, Morgan, Pugh, Ransom, Slater, Teller, Vance, Vest, Voorhees, Walker.

Twenty-two Democrats and 4 Republicans.

Nays—Aldrich, Allison, Blair, Brown, Conger, Davis of Illinois, Dawes, Edmunds, Frye, Hale, Hill of Colorado, Hoar, Ingalls, Lapham, McDill, McMillan, Miller of New York, Mitchell, Morrill, Plumb, Saunders, Sawyer.

Twenty-one Republicans and 1 Democrat.

General Harrison did not vote, and was not paired, but, as will appear by his subsequent record, would certainly, if present, have voted in the negative.

The bill as amended passed the Senate by the following vote:

Yeas—Bayard, Beck, Call, Cameron of Wisconsin, Cockrell, Coke, Fair, Farley, Garland, George, Gorman, Hale, Harris, Hill of Colorado, Jackson, Jonas, Jones of Nevada, Miller of California, Miller of New York, Morgan, Pugh, Ransom, Sawyer, Slater, Teller, Vance, Vest, Voorhees, and Walker.

Twenty-two Democrats and 7 Republicans.

Nays—Aldrich, Allison, Blair, Brown, Conger, Davis of Illinois, Dawes, Edmunds, Frye, Hoar, Ingalls, Lapham, McDill, McMillan, Morrill.

Fourteen Republicans and 1 Democrat.

General Harrison was paired with Senator Maxey both on the amendment limiting the prohibition of Chinese immigration to ten years instead of twenty and on the passage of the bill, being in favor of the amendment and against the bill. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 13, part 2, page 1753.)

VETO OF BILL.

The bill as amended was vetoed by President Arthur, and in his message (Mis. Doc. No. 53, page 451) he distinctly based his veto upon that provision in the bill which fixed the prohibition of twenty years upon the immigration of Chinese to this country.

I regard this provision of the act—as a breach of our national faith; and being unable to bring myself in harmony with the act of Congress on this vital point, the honor of the country constrains me to return the act with this objection to its passage.

He says—

On page 448 of the public document from which I quote will be found the following:

I call especial attention to this portion of the veto message because it becomes exceedingly important in view of the votes afterwards given by General Harrison when the question of Chinese immigration again came before the Senate at the same session. President Arthur says:

As to the class of persons to be affected by the treaty, the Americans inserted in their draught a provision that the words "Chinese laborers" signify all immigration other than that for "teaching, trade, travel, study, and curiosity." The Chinese objected to this that it operated to include artisans in the class of laborers, whose immigration might be forbidden. The Americans replied that they "could" not consent that artisans shall be excluded from the class of Chinese laborers, for it is this very competition of skilled labor, in the cities where the Chinese labor immigration concentrates, which has caused the embarrassment and popular discontent. In the subsequent negotiations this definition dropped out and does not appear in the treaty. Article II of the treaty confers the rights, privileges, immunities, and exemptions which are accorded to citizens and subjects of the most favored nation upon Chinese subjects proceeding to the United States as teachers, students, merchants, or from curiosity. The American commissioners report that the Chinese Government claimed that in this article they did, by exclusion, provide that nobody should be entitled to claim the benefit of the general provisions of the Burlingame treaty but those who might go to the United States in those capacities or for those purposes. I accept this as the definition of the word "laborers" as used in the treaty.

On April 5, 1882, the question of Chinese immigration again came before the Senate on a motion by Senator HARRIS (Democrat) to postpone the Presidential-count bill in order to consider the President's message vetoing the bill "to execute certain treaty stipulations with the Chinese."

Upon this motion the vote was as follows:

Yeas—Bayard, Beck, Call, Camden, Cameron of Wisconsin, Cockrell, Coke, Fair, Farley, Garland, Gorman, Groome, Grover, Hampton, Harris, Jackson, Johnston, Jones of Nevada, Lamar, McPherson, Maxey, Miller of California, Morgan, Pendleton, Pugh, Slater, Vest, Voorhees, Walker.

Democrats 26, Republicans 3.

Nays—Aldrich, Anthony, Blair, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Davis of Illinois, Dawes, Frye, Harrison, Hawley, Hill of Colorado, Hoar, Ingalls, McMillan, Mahone, Miller of New York, Mitchell, Morrill, Platt, Plumb, Saunders, Sawyer, Sewell, Sherman, Teller, Windom.

Republicans 25, Democrats none.

It will be seen from this vote that every Republican Senator, including General Harrison, except three voted against considering the question of prohibiting Chinese immigration in preference to other business, whilst every Democratic Senator voted in favor of such consideration.

The next motion by the enemies of the bill was that of Senator SHERMAN (Republican) to refer the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and upon this the vote was as follows:

Yeas—Aldrich, Anthony, Blair, Dawes, Frye, Harrison, Hawley, Hill of Colorado, Hoar, Kellogg, McMillan, Miller of New York, Mitchell, Morrill, Platt, Sawyer, Sherman, Windom.

Republicans 18, Democrats none.

Nays—Bayard, Call, Cameron of Wisconsin, Cockrell, Coke, Davis of Illinois, Davis of West Virginia, Fair, Farley, Gorman, Groome, Grover, Hampton, Harris, Ingalls, Jackson, Johnston, Jones of Nevada, Lamar, McPherson, Maxey, Miller of California, Morgan, Pendleton, Plumb, Pugh, Sewell, Slater, Teller, Vest, Voorhees, Walker.

Democrats 26, Republicans 6.

It will be seen that General Harrison again voted with the opponents of the bill.

It was then moved by Senator SHERMAN (Republican) to refer the President's message and accompanying papers to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and upon this motion the vote stood:

Yeas—Aldrich, Anthony, Blair, Dawes, Frye, Harrison, Hawley, Hoar, McMillan, Miller of New York, Mitchell, Morrill, Platt, Plumb, Sawyer, Sewell, Sherman, Teller, Windom.

Republicans 19, Democrats none.

Nays—Bayard, Cameron of Wisconsin, Cockrell, Coke, Davis of Illinois, Davis of West Virginia, Fair, Farley, Gorman, Groome, Grover, Hampton, Harris, Ingalls, Jackson, Johnston, Jones of Nevada, Kellogg, Lamar, McPherson, Maxey, Miller of California, Morgan, Pendleton, Pugh, Slater, Vest, Voorhees, Walker.

Democrats 25, Republicans 4.

The vote of General Harrison is again recorded with the enemies of the bill.

Upon the question of passing the bill over the President's veto the vote was as follows:

Yeas—Bayard, Beck, Call, Cameron of Wisconsin, Cockrell, Coke, Davis of West Virginia, Fair, Farley, Gorman, Grover, Hampton, Harris, Hill of Colorado, Johnston, Jones of Nevada, Lamar, McPherson, Maxey, Miller of California, Miller of New York, Morgan, Pendleton, Pugh, Slater, Teller, Vest, Voorhees, Walker.

Democrats 23, Republicans 6.

Nays—Aldrich, Anthony, Blair, Davis of Illinois, Dawes, Frye, Harrison, Hawley, Hoar, Ingalls, Kellogg, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill, Platt, Plumb, Rollins, Sawyer, Sewell, Sherman, Windom.

Republicans 21, Democrats none.

General Harrison voted against the bill and in favor of permitting the Chinese to inundate the Pacific coast, as the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] tells us they were then doing.

CHINESE NATURALIZATION AGAIN.

On April 25, 1882, the Senate proceeded in Committee of the Whole to the consideration of House bill No. 5804, "to execute certain treaty stipulations with the Chinese." This measure was substantially the same as the bill vetoed by President Arthur, with the exception that the period during which the Chinese were not permitted to come within our territory was shortened from twenty to ten years, this having been the salient point of objection to the first bill on the part of the President.

The House bill had been framed from three bills introduced by Mr. Page (Republican) and Messrs. Willis and Berry (Democrats). In the Page bill the time during which Chinese immigration was prohibited was fixed at ten years, whilst in the Willis bill it was placed at fifteen years, and in the Berry bill at sixteen years. The first serious collision in the Senate between the friends and enemies of the measure occurred on the question of striking out the fourteenth section of the bill, as was recommended by the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations. That section reads as follows:

That hereafter no State court or court of the United States shall admit Chinese to citizenship; and all laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

Upon the question of striking out the vote was as follows:

Yeas—Aldrich, Allison, Anthony, Blair, Conger, Davis of Illinois, Dawes, Frye, Hale, Harrison, Hawley, Hoar, Ingalls, Kellogg, Lapham, McDill, McMillan, Miller of New York, Morrill, Platt, Plumb, Rollins, Saunders, Sawyer, Van Wyck, Windom.

Republicans 26, Democrats none.

Nays—Bayard, Beck, Butler, Call, Cameron of Wisconsin, Chilcote, Coke, Davis of West Virginia, Fair, Farley, George, Gorman, Groome, Grover, Hampton, Hill of Colorado, Jackson, Johnston, Jonas, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, McPherson, Maxey, Miller of California, Morgan, Pendleton, Pugh, Slater, Vest, Voorhees, Walker, Williams.

Democrats 27, Republicans 5.

And I should like to ask, parenthetically, my friend from Nevada——

Mr. STEWART. What is the date of that in the RECORD?

Mr. VEST. That, I believe, was on March 9.

Mr. STEWART. Can you give the page of the RECORD?

Mr. VEST. I have the reference here and will refer to it. This was copied from the RECORD.

Mr. STEWART. It was in 1882? Was that the House bill?

Mr. VEST. Oh, yes; it was in 1882. If the Senator will turn to volume 13, part 2, pages 1702, 1705, and 1717, he will find this record, which I personally know to be correct.

It is proper in this connection to state that when the bill came into the Senate Senator EDMUNDS (Republican) moved to strike out section 14, as retained in the bill by the vote just given in Committee of the Whole, and substitute the following:

Nothing in this act shall be construed to change the existing naturalization laws so as to permit Chinese persons to citizenship.

Upon this motion the vote in the Senate was as follows:

Yeas—Allison, Blair, Conger, Davis of Illinois, Dawes, Edmunds, Frye, Harrison, Hawley, Hill of Colorado, Lapham, McMillan, Miller of New York, Morrill, Platt, Saunders, Van Wyck.

Republicans 17, Democrats none.

Nays—Beck, Butler, Call, Cameron of Wisconsin, Chilcott, Coke, Fair, Farley, Garland, George, Grover, Hampton, Harris, Johnston, Jonas, Jones of Nevada, Maxey, Miller of California, Morgan, Pendleton, Pugh, Slater, Vance, Walker, Williams.

Democrats 21, Republicans 4.

The vote of General Harrison was recorded against the section prohibiting Chinese naturalization, and in favor of the substitute offered by Mr. EDMUNDS, which simply left the matter of Chinese citizenship to the courts, without any interference by Congress as to their jurisdiction or discretion.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] justifies these votes of General Harrison, and says:

There was no law, and never has been, allowing Chinese to be naturalized. On the contrary, the right of naturalization was denied to Chinese by the Conness amendment to the Burlingame treaty. * * * Farley's amendment proposing to repeal all laws granting the right of naturalization to Chinese was absurd when no such law existed, and ought to have been rejected.

In the debate upon the Farley amendment, in 1882, it was stated by Senator Farley and admitted by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], and will not be denied now, that Chinese had been admitted to citizenship by the courts of Massachusetts, and it was to condemn in unmistakable terms such action either by Federal or State tribunals that the amendment was offered.

It was not known then to the friends of the pending bill that in 1876, when General Harrison was the Republican candidate for governor of Indiana, the superior court at Indianapolis had, on motion of Mr. Miller, his law partner, naturalized seven Chinamen, who cast their votes at the next election for General Harrison and the Republican State ticket. It is not a matter of surprise that with this practical result of Chinese citizenship in his recent experience the Republican candidate for the Presidency voted against the provision in the act of 1882 prohibiting Chinese naturalization.

Mr. MITCHELL. What evidence has the Senator of that?

Mr. VEST. My evidence is——

Mr. STEWART. What judge was it who naturalized seven Chinamen?

Mr. VEST. I did not say what judge.

Mr. MITCHELL. I wish to know, if the Senator has it, upon what evidence he bases the statement he has just made?

Mr. VEST. I base my statement upon information derived from the Indiana delegation in the House and from Senators upon this floor, and I will produce the record if necessary.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to see the record.

Mr. STEWART. Who was the judge?

Mr. VEST. It was in the superior court, the State court of Indiana at Indianapolis, where these seven Chinamen were naturalized and voted the Republican ticket at the ensuing election in November. They were naturalized in September or October, 1876, and it is a notorious fact beyond any sort of question or dispute.

Mr. STEWART. In 1876?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir, in 1876; when General Harrison was defeated by Blue-Jeans Williams, as he was termed, for governor of Indiana. I take it that the General himself would not deny it.

CHINESE LABORERS AGAIN.

The next struggle between the friends and opponents of the House bill was over the fifteenth section, which the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations recommended to be stricken out, and which provided "that the words 'Chinese laborers,' wherever used in this act, shall be construed to mean both skilled and unskilled laborers, and Chinese employed in mining." It was upon this question that General Harrison made his only appearance in the debate of 1882, and it will not surprise those acquainted with his record and opinions on Chinese immigration to find that he opposed the fifteenth section, which specifically enumerated the classes of Chinese to be excluded, and contended earnestly against any legislation construing or affecting the treaty in which the term "Chinese laborers" had been used.

President Arthur in his veto message had, as I have shown, accepted that construction of the word "laborers" in the treaty which conferred upon Chinese subjects coming to the United States as teachers, students, merchants, or from curiosity the privileges accorded to citizens of the most favored nation, and that all others were excluded. But General Harrison said:

In the treaty the word "laborers" is used. I take it that it is not in the power of Congress to enlarge the meaning of that word. Whatever it meant in the treaty it would mean the same thing as used in the law. We can not make it mean more than that. Therefore why not let it stand in the law as in the treaty, and let the use of that word include what it will?

It is difficult to believe that a lawyer of General Harrison's standing meant that Congress had no power to construe or even to abrogate a treaty. The Supreme Court of the United States in several cases, and especially in the Cherokee tobacco cases, 2 Wallace, has emphatically declared that Congress has the power, and I assume therefore that his real objection to the legislation construing the term "laborers" as used in the treaty, came from his unwillingness "to let go of the old idea," as he expressed it in his letter to Mr. Brant, of St. Louis, "that this was the free home of all comers." As Senator Grover very properly said, both the President and the commissioners who made the treaty considered the section struck out by the committee the proper construction of the term "laborers," and it was absolutely necessary, in order to avoid an avalanche of Chinese upon our shores, to put the matter beyond doubt.

To this General Harrison replied with a sneering allusion to a will case he had once tried, when the lawyer on the other side had claimed to know what the will meant because he had written it, and he continued to insist that the term "laborers" should be left alone, to be construed by the officers enforcing the law.

On the question of striking out in committee the fifteenth section of the bill, the vote was as follows:

Yeas—Aldrich, Allison, Anthony, Blair, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Chilcott, Conger, Davis of Illinois, Dawes, Frye, Hale, Harrison, Hawley, Hill of Colorado, Hoar, Ingalls, Kellogg, Lapham, McDill, McMillan, Miller of New York, Morrill, Platt, Plumb, Rollins, Sawyer, Saunders, Van Wyck, Windom.

Republicans 29, Democrats none..

Nays—Bayard, Beck, Butler, Call, Cameron of Wisconsin, Coke, Davis of West Virginia, Fair, Farley, George, Gorman, Grover, Hampton, Jackson, Johnston, Jonas, Jones of Nevada, McPherson, Maxey, Miller of California, Morgan, Pendleton, Pugh, Slater, Vest, Voorhees, Walker, Williams.

Democrats 25, Republicans 3.

When the bill came into the Senate a vote was taken on concurring in the action of the Committee of the Whole striking out the fifteenth section, and resulted as follows:

Republicans 20, Democrats none.

Nays—Beck, Butler, Call, Cameron of Wisconsin, Chilcott, Coke, Fair, Farley, Garland, George, Grover, Hampton, Harris, Johnston, Jonas, Jones of Nevada, Maxey, Miller of California, Morgan, Pendleton, Pugh, Slater, Vance, Walker, Williams.

Democrats 22, Republicans 3.

Senator EDMUNDS (Republican) then moved to insert the following:

The words "Chinese laborers," wherever used in this act, shall be construed to mean persons usually engaged in manual labor.

Upon this motion the vote was as follows:

Yeas—Allison, Blair, Conger, Davis of Illinois, Dawes, Edmunds, Frye, Harrison, Hawley, Hill of Colorado, Lapham, McMillan, Miller of New York, Morrill, Platt, Saunders, Van Wyck.

Republicans 17, Democrats none.

Nays—Beck, Butler, Call, Cameron of Wisconsin, Chilcott, Coke, Fair, Farley, Garland, George, Grover, Hampton, Harris, Johnston, Jonas, Jones of Nevada, Maxey, Miller of California, Morgan, Pendleton, Pugh, Slater, Vance, Walker, Williams.

Democrats 21, Republicans 4.

It is evident that if the amendment of Senator EDMUNDS had been adopted it would have resulted in "confusion worse confounded" as to the meaning of the term "laborers." The question then presented to each officer enforcing the law and to the courts would have been the meaning of the terms "usually employed," and pending the determination of that question the Chinese would continue to throng our ports.

If consistent with his argument previously made, General Harrison ought to have opposed the Edmunds amendment, because it sought to construe the word "laborers" as used in the treaty, and he had strenuously insisted that the meaning of this phrase in the treaty should not be disturbed; but he voted on this as on every other occasion with the opponents of restrictive legislation against Chinese immigration and to embarrass the pending bill.

On the passage of the bill as amended, and as it became a law, the vote was as follows:

Yeas—Beck, Butler, Call, Cameron of Wisconsin, Chilcott, Coke, Davis of Illinois, Fair, Farley, Garland, George, Grover, Hale, Hampton, Harris, Hill of Colorado, Johnston, Jonas, Jones of Nevada, Maxey, Miller of California, Miller of New York, Morgan, Pendleton, Pugh, Saunders, Slater, Vance, Van Wyck, Vest, Walker, Williams.

Democrats 22, Republicans 10.

Nays—Allison, Blair, Conger, Dawes, Edmunds, Frye, Harrison, Hawley, Hoar, Ingalls, Lapham, McMillan, Morrill, Platt, Sherman.

Republicans 15, Democrats none.

CONCLUSION.

After reading these votes, what impartial mind will not conclude with the Presiding Officer of this body in his letter of June 16 that "SHERMAN, ALLISON, HARRISON, etc., have records that would be awkward on the tariff, the currency, the Chinese question," etc.

The record of General Harrison, and of the Republican party in the Senate, assumes great importance at this time from the declaration recently made by Hon. James G. Blaine, "the uncrowned king of America," who has just returned from Mr. Carnegie's castle in Scotland, purchased with his annual profits of $1,500,000 in the manufacture of steel and iron in Pennsylvania, that the issue in this canvass is the protection of American labor against the pauper labor of other countries.

On June 23, 1870, Hon. Henry Wilson, one of the most distinguished Republicans who has ever been in public life, said in this Chamber, when discussing the immigration of Chinese:

I think the time has come when we should have some action upon this subject, for it does seem to me at the present day that there is a conspiracy of capital in this country to cast a drag-net over creation for the purpose of bringing degraded labor here to lower and degrade our laboring men. And I think it is time to meet that question.

In the debate of February, 1882, on the Chinese question, Senator Miller, of California, also a distinguished Republican, said:

The Chinese can thrive in America on lower wages than will afford the pauper laborers anywhere in Europe a mere frugal subsistence. And in this connection I venture to say, and I hope without offense, that if a speech shall be made in the Senate in opposition to Chinese restriction I shall not be surprised if it is made by a protectionist. Not, perhaps, by a protectionist who advocates high tariff primarily for the protection of American laborers from low wages, but for the protection of what he calls "American industry," which is a convenient and comprehensive phrase.

It includes and is intended to be descriptive of other interests than those of labor; interests which a certain class of political economists in this country regard as paramount to all others in the adjustment of tariff laws.

The average American manufacturer is interested generally in two things, namely, the highest protective tariff and the cheapest labor. If he can secure these all else desirable speedily follows. The first he has secured. The second he can readily secure through unrestricted Chinese immigration if this measure shall be defeated. It is not difficult to perceive the origin of that political economy which suggests high protective tariff and at the same time advocates the admission of servile laborers into the country without limit. It means high prices for the products of manufacture and low prices for the labor which produces them; the aggrandizement of capital and the debasement of labor; greater wealth to the wealthy and greater poverty to the poor.

Read by the light of recent events, how must this, from a Republican Senator who has passed away, but whose devotion to his party was never doubted, impress the laboring men of America?

The Republican candidate for the Presidency opposed at every stage, and in every way possible, the legislation against Chinese immigration. If he had succeeded, the law on the statute-books would not exist. For the truth of this statement I appeal to the record placed now before every American citizen.

That record shows to every intelligent and unprejudiced mind that the struggle in 1882 as in 1870 was between the two irreconcilable ideas; that on the one hand this country should be kept open to all comers, without regard to consequences, and on the other hand the American idea, that as a people we must first consult our own interests and protect ourselves and our posterity from a vicious horde of immigrants who come not to share our destiny, but to prey upon our abundance.

Charles Sumner was the great apostle of the doctrine that all the world had an inherent right to land upon our shores, and therefore in 1870 he moved to strike the word "white" from the naturalization laws, and carried his motion in the Senate against the votes of Allen G. Thurman and the six other Democrats then in this body.

In the debate of 1882 the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who led the opponents of the bill against Chinese immigration, declared the same doctrine in the following words:

The insertion of the phrase "the pursuit of happiness" in the enumeration of the natural rights for securing which government is ordained, and the denial of which constitutes just cause for its overthrow, was intended as an explicit affirmation that the right of every human being who obeys the equal laws to go everywhere on the surface of the earth that his welfare may require is beyond the rightful control of government. It is a birthright derived immediately from Him "who made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed and the bounds of their habitation." He made, so our fathers held, of one blood all the nations of men. He gave them the whole face of the earth whereon to dwell.

In his letter of February 25, 1888, to Rev. J. S. Brant, of St. Louis, General Harrison gives the real cause of his opposition to the bills restricting Chinese immigration, in the following sentence:

It seemed to me then to be in violation of our treaty with China, and it was a little hard for me to let go of the old idea that this was the free home of all comers.

For myself I deny now, as I did in the debate of 1882, that the idea of giving up the right to control immigration as we think proper has been ever entertained by the American people.

There is no inherent right in any foreigner to become either a citizen or denizen of this country. That is a question for us to determine, and for us alone. I said then as I say now:

To the thrifty German, the generous and gallant Celt, the hardy Scandinavian, to all who come to share the responsibilities and work out the problem of our civilization and destiny, to all who seek home and shelter in our vast domain, fling wide the portals; but to the people that come not for homes or shelter but only for gain, who have no share in our destiny, no love for our institutions, no reverence for our religion, we have the right to say and do say, "You have no lot or part in this great matter."

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I do not intend to repeat what I said the other day, but I think it proper to again express my regret after a question is settled that there should be an effort to draw it into politics as an issue. The Democratic party must indeed be very barren of issues if they must drag in settled questions for present emergencies.

I have heard much said by Democrats on the stump and in this Chamber—it appears to me that it has been for the last twenty years the burden of their song—in favor of letting bygones be bygones after the whole country had agreed to the settlement of a question. I have been one of those who refrained from alluding to settled questions. It is "unsettled questions which have no pity for the repose of mankind," and the Republican party can not be injured by a question which has been disposed of and put to rest mainly by their efforts.

We have at the present session taken action here which shows the unanimity which exists in this Chamber upon the question of excluding Chinese. Early in the session several bills were introduced to exclude Chinese, to perfect the laws which had been previously passed and which the Chinese evaded. The Committee on Foreign Relations promptly took the matter in hand and gave a hearing to all the representatives from the Pacific coast, both Republicans and Democrats, heard them through, printed all they had to say, and reported a bill in conformity with their unanimous wish.

That bill was pending before the Senate when the new treaty came here. It would have undoubtedly passed the Senate as unanimously as it passed the Committee on Foreign Relations. The subject has now been investigated and it has been ascertained and declared officially that it is incompatible with our institutions to allow Chinese to immigrate to this country. That, I say, was the unanimous verdict of the Committee on Foreign Relations and would have been the unanimous verdict of the Senate in passing the bill.

The President then sent us a treaty which I would have been willing to accept, provided we could carry out by legislation what was claimed for it. There was much doubt, however, whether a proper exclusion bill could be passed which would not be held to be in conflict with the treaty. Those who were most interested were unwilling to have it adopted in the form presented, because it did not provide that there should be only written evidence on the return of Chinese, but under the ordinary rules and regulations the loss of certificates might be supplied by parol. The people of the Pacific coast said that "we have had experience enough with parol evidence; amend the treaty so that no Chinese can enter without a certificate, no matter to what class he belongs." That was the amendment adopted by the Senate to the second article of the treaty, and is in the following words:

And no such Chinese laborer shall be permitted to enter the United States by land or sea without producing to the proper officer of the customs the return certificate herein required.

The second article to which this amendment applies is the article which in the new treaty allows a Chinaman to return who has a lawful wife, child, or parent in the United States, or property therein of the value of $1,000 or debts of like amount due him and pending settlement. If such Chinaman could return without presenting the written certificate, but was allowed to enter on proof of the loss of such certificate, the people of the Pacific coast, who understand the artful ways of the Chinese, saw that the door would still be open for their entry on perjured testimony.

The first article of the treaty implied clearly to my mind that the Chinese now absent from the country could not return, but it was not explicit. It was unfortunately open to a dangerous construction. This defect in that regard was pointed out by the press and the people of the Pacific coast. They feared that it would be so construed as to allow those who have been in the country and are now absent to return, and not only those, but others who never have been in this country would be able to enter by false testimony showing previous residence, and that the courts would be appealed to as they are under existing laws to allow such Chinamen to enter. The language of the treaty was that "the coming, except under the conditions hereinafter specified, of Chinese laborers to the United States shall be absolutely prohibited." It did not say that the return of Chinese was also prohibited. This was a grave omission, and the people of the Pacific coast saw in it a prolific source of trouble and that the "former-residence" fraud, under which thousands of Chinese have been smuggled into the country through perjury on the pretense that they had formerly resided here, would be again repeated. The Senate, to avoid this evil, added the following amendment to the article:

And this prohibition shall extend to the return of Chinese laborers who are not now in the United States, whether holding certificates under existing laws or not.

I do not charge the Administration with any evil design or any purpose to so frame the treaty as to allow the continued coming of Chinese. I am unwilling to follow the example of Senators who criticise in a technical and unfair manner the votes of Republican Senators who were, in 1882, in good faith endeavoring to perfect a bill for the exclusion of Chinese in conformity with our treaty obligations; on the contrary, I commend the laudable efforts of our Democratic Secretary of State in his endeavors to secure a treaty for the exclusion of Chinese.

In order to carry out the provisions of the new treaty when the amendments of the Senate shall have been agreed to by the Chinese Government, it was deemed expedient by both Houses of Congress to provide the necessary legislation at the present session. Inasmuch as the treaty might not be ratified until after Congress adjourns, it was deemed expedient to legislate in advance. Bills were introduced in each House and referred to the appropriate committees. The Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate prepared the bill which was passed the other day, and reported it as their measure. They had it printed for the use of the committee, and the same bill so printed was introduced in the House of Representatives and reported favorably, showing absolute unanimity of action thus far. No more perfect bill could be devised to exclude Chinese than the one which was unanimously passed by the Senate a few days ago, and which in all probability will be passed during the present week by the House without any change in its essential provisions.

There is no difference of opinion in either branch of Congress as to the necessity of excluding Chinese. Why revive this controversy and by garbled extracts, and unfair and misleading statements attempt to misrepresent the position of Senators while the controversy was pending and attempt to make political capital out of this dead issue? It is as dead as the issue of secession, and there is as much propriety in reviving the one as the other.

Furthermore, the Chinese issue was settled, and well settled, by a Republican Senate before the commencement of this Congress. In the last Congress, in 1886, it having been ascertained that the law was being evaded by Chinese coming to this country, Mr. MORROW, a Republican Representative from California, prepared an elaborate bill, a very stringent bill in its provisions, and introduced it in the other House. A copy of the bill was introduced in the Senate by Senator Fair, of Nevada. It was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, there examined carefully, and perfected, and reported, and that report was regarded as entirely satisfactory to all the people of the Pacific coast, who were especially interested in this question, approved by the press of the Pacific coast, and it passed the Senate unanimously in 1886.

Mr. MITCHELL. General Harrison was a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. STEWART. General Harrison, I was going to repeat, as I said in a former speech, was a member of that committee and approved of the bill. He was in the Senate when the bill was passed, removing objections and assisting in its passage. He had then learned the difficulty of excluding the Chinese. He had learned their devices in evading the laws, and he was willing to go as far as any Democrat in devising means to exclude them. That was in 1886. The sentiment was unanimous then and it has been unanimous ever since, not only here but in the country.

If we go further back—and we may as well trace this history back—we find that when the question was first sprung upon the Senate it was under most unfavorable circumstances for its impartial consideration. There had been a heated discussion for several years with regard to the colored race. The people of the East did not know the character of the Chinese immigration that was overrunning the Pacific coast. They did not know the capacity of those people to supplant the people of the United States. They did not know that the Chinese could not be assimilated with our people, could not be incorporated into the body-politic; that they were a foreign element able to subsist on half of what the white men could, and that where they came the white men were compelled to leave. They did not know these facts.

Under that state of things the question was presented to the Senate on July 2, 1870, to strike out the word "white" from our naturalization laws for the purpose of extending the right of naturalization to the colored race, which would have included Chinese as well as Africans. The Chinese were not particularly considered, and when the Republican Senators from the Pacific coast desired to make an exception against Chinese it was thought by many honest Senators to be unreasonable and unjust to make such distinction. This was the crisis of the Chinese question. If the naturalization laws had then been extended to them there would have been millions of naturalized Chinese now in the United States controlling the destinies of several States, and presenting one of the most embarrassing and dangerous questions which have ever arisen for solution in this country. After two days and one night of serious discussion, although there was a large majority for naturalizing Chinese in the beginning, the proposition was voted down by an overwhelming majority, 27 to 14. Of the 27 who voted against it 20 were Republicans. Of the 14 who voted for it 3 were Republicans and representing Northern States, namely, Fenton of New York, Morrill of Maine, and Pomeroy of Kansas; 7 were Republicans representing Southern States, namely, Brownlow of Tennessee, Harris and Kellogg of Louisiana, McDonald of Arkansas, Revels of Mississippi, Spencer of Alabama, and Robinson of South Carolina, and 4 were Republicans who were about to sever their relations with the party, and who never afterwards voted with it, but joined the Democratic-Greeley party in the following election, namely, Sumner of Massachusetts, Trumbull of Illinois, Ross of Kansas, and Sprague of Rhode Island. It will thus be seen that the Republican majority against naturalization after the discussion was overwhelming.

The whole Chinese question was then explained in these Halls by the Senators from the Pacific coast. Senator Williams, of Oregon, debated it in the most masterly manner. He was an able man, and his explanations and his speeches on that occasion will compare with the best that have been delivered in this Chamber.

The discussion was calm, deliberate, and exhaustive, and the Republican party of the North deliberately decided that they would not incorporate the Chinese in the body-politic. When they had taken this step, that they would not allow them to be naturalized, which was the great question involving every other question, it soon became apparent that the Chinese were invading our shores; that they were coming too rapidly; and that they were supplanting our free labor.

But we had made an unfortunate treaty with China, which the Republican party were reluctant to violate. I refer to the Burlingame treaty, made in 1868. That treaty, as it was presented to the Senate, recognized the right of Chinese to naturalization by conferring on them all the privileges that were extended to any other people. But a Republican Senator from California, Mr. Conness, discovering to what that might lead, offered an amendment providing that nothing in that treaty should be construed to extend naturalization to the Chinese, which was adopted. This was the first protest against the naturalization of Chinese. It came from a Republican. No Democrat suggested it.

But that treaty was in the way of legislation. It provided that the Chinese might come; and the Republican party were slow and this nation has ever been slow to trample upon a treaty with a friendly power. When the complaints came from California we were met by the terms of that treaty, which had been adopted by the unanimous consent of both Democrats and Republicans. It is true that we had saved the main question of naturalization by the amendment of Mr. Conness, but the treaty provided for free intercourse and free immigration to this country in the most unequivocal terms. In 1879 the evil of Chinese immigration had become so manifest that a determined effort was made to stop it—treaty or no treaty. A bill to prohibit Chinese immigration was introduced in the House by Mr. Wren, a Republican from Nevada, on January 14, 1878, at the second session of the Forty-fifth Congress, and passed the House on January 28, 1879, by a vote of 155 to 72.

Mr. Sargent, a Republican from California, had charge of the bill in the Senate, and ably defended it in elaborate and forcible arguments. Mr. Blaine also took a leading part in advocating the passage of the bill and won by his able efforts in that behalf the affection and admiration of the people of the Pacific coast. The bill passed the Senate on February 15, 1879, by a vote of 39 to 27—21 Democrats and 18 Republicans voting for the bill. The Republicans who voted against the bill placed their opposition on the ground that it was in violation of the treaty. President Hayes vetoed the bill solely on the ground that it was in violation of the treaty and not because he was in favor of Chinese immigration; on the contrary, the evil was so apparent that the administration immediately opened negotiations to secure a treaty excluding Chinese. A commission was sent to China, consisting of Messrs. Swift, Trescot, and Angell, to negotiate a new treaty restricting Chinese immigration, and succeeded in their mission and negotiated the treaty of 1880. The treaty provided that immigration might be restricted and regulated by the United States, but that the immigration of laborers should not be totally prohibited.

Then, in 1882, came proposed legislation with a view of carrying the treaty into effect. Amendments were constantly offered to embarrass those who were perfecting the bill to carry the treaty into effect in good faith. The amendments of Grover, of Oregon, and Farley, of California, were of that character. These amendments had no tendency to restrict Chinese immigration or improve the bill. Farley's amendment, which General Harrison voted against, and for which vote the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] has so severely criticised him, was in the following words:

That hereafter no State court or court of the United States shall admit Chinese to citizenship; and all laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.—Record, part 2, pages 1481, 1749.

The manifest object of this amendment was to embarrass the bill, and Senator EDMUNDS made that fact very clear in the following remarks:

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I did not know the sincerity of my friends from California in their desire to accomplish what the treaty now allows us to accomplish in a reasonable way on this subject, I should have supposed, if I were a stranger here, that the object was to break down this bill and to load it with incongruous provisions to defeat in the end any legislation at all. This amendment proposed by the Senator from California on my left [Mr. Farley] has nothing whatever to do with the question that this bill proposes, and that this last treaty, which is the only one I am speaking of, deals with. That is a question simply of the incoming persons who are not now in the United States, and who have no other right to come here than such as the laws of nature, whatever they may be—I am not going into that again—may give. Now, coming or going is an entirely different thing from naturalization, from being admitted to citizenship; and if there is anybody here who is a real friend of the substance of this bill—I am not speaking of its details or of its excess or want of excess—if there is anybody here who is really in favor of the substance of this bill, to deal with the subject of it, and nothing else, I should expect that that person would vote against any amendment that would introduce any element into the bill that did not legitimately and correctly belong to it. This certainly does not.

Mr. EDMUNDS, for the purpose of making the amendment consistent with the facts and the law as it then stood, offered to amend the bill by substituting the following in place of Farley's amendment:

Nothing in this act shall be construed to change the existing naturalization laws so as to admit Chinese persons to citizenship.—Record, part 4, page 3411.

Upon which Mr. EDMUNDS made the following remarks:

Mr. President, as this section now stands in the bill, it is the first time in the history of this nation that Congress has undertaken to make prohibitions against naturalization. The Constitution provides that Congress may make rules of naturalization, so that no person can be admitted to citizenship without affirmative action by Congress. I do not wish for one to have Congress enact any statute which shall prohibit by affirmative declaration any person from becoming a citizen. He can not become a citizen until Congress shall affirmatively provide that he may; and as this section now stands, it is absolutely unique, probably not only in the history of this country, but of every other, and so I move this change so as to leave the law just as it is now, in order to avoid what hereafter will be a very unhappy precedent, I am afraid, for a good many people.

There was nothing in the law as it then stood, and as it still stands, extending naturalization to Chinese. Farley's amendment assumed that there was, and proposed to repeal the laws authorizing the naturalization of Chinese and prohibit their naturalization, which was unlawyer-like, unnecessary, and absurd. The statute on that subject then, and now, is in the following language:

The provisions of this title shall apply to aliens being free white persons, and to aliens of African nativity, and to persons of African descent. (Revised Statutes United States, section 2169.)

As early as April 29, 1878, the United States circuit court of California, on the application of Ah Yup to be admitted as a citizen, decided that there was no law under which Chinese could be naturalized. (See 5 Sawyer, page 155.)

This decision was followed by all the United States courts and was binding on the State courts as a construction of the statutes of the United States. The United States is under no obligation to naturalize any one, and none can be naturalized without express and affirmative law. There being no such law General Harrison was too good a lawyer to vote to repeal a law which did not exist.

The Senator from Missouri states that in 1876 seven Chinamen were naturalized in the State superior court at Indianapolis on motion of Mr. Miller, law partner of General Harrison. The Senator made this statement upon the representation of the delegation from Indiana. Whether the information be correct or not is immaterial. The State court had no right to naturalize these Chinese, and made a very absurd mistake if it did so. But this mistake was made before the United States courts had declared the law, as I have already shown. No lawyer will now say that there was a particle of authority for such naturalization, and it is not pretended that General Harrison himself had any knowledge of the transaction.

General Harrison voted for the lawyer-like and accurate amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS], the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and against the incongruous amendment offered by Senator Farley for the manifest purpose of embarrassing the bill. For doing this a labored effort is made to misrepresent him and to make it appear that he was in favor of the naturalization of Chinese.

Grover's amendment was entirely useless and could not by any possibility improve the bill, but was manifestly intended to impede its passage. It is as follows:

The words "Chinese laborers," wherever used in this act, shall be construed to mean both skilled and unskilled laborers, and Chinese employed in mining.—Record, part 2, pages 1480, 1750.

This amendment was very objectionable, and was not within the power of Congress. It attempted to construe the treaty. This Congress has no power to do. Congress may abrogate a treaty, but its construction is a matter for the courts, or for negotiation between the contracting parties. Besides, the word "laborers" has a distinct meaning, and is sufficiently broad to include at least all persons engaged in manual labor. General Harrison is arraigned for voting against this amendment. He should be commended for such vote. It was an honest effort to preserve the bill in the most effective form and make it conform to the treaty. Senator EDMUNDS also offered a substitute for this amendment, which is in the following words:

The words "Chinese laborers," wherever used in this act shall be construed to mean persons usually engaged in manual labor.—Record, part 4, page 3411.

General Harrison voted for this amendment because it gave the usual and ordinary definition of the word "laborers," and was more comprehensive than the Grover amendment.

The only other material propositions in the way of amendment to the bill were the following, offered by Senator HOAR:

Provided, That this bill shall not apply to any skilled laborer who shall establish that he comes to this country without any contract by which his labor is the property of any person other than himself.

Provided further, That any laborer who shall receive a certificate from the United States consul at the port where he shall embark that he is an artisan, coming to this country at his own expense and of his own free will, and has established such fact to the satisfaction of such consul, shall not be affected by this bill.—Congressional Record, volume 13, part 2, first session, Forty-seventh Congress, pages 1716 and 1717.

The Senator from Missouri commented with great severity upon General Harrison's votes for these amendments, and also upon the following statement made by me in a former speech in regard thereto:

General Harrison at that time, in common with most of the Eastern people who had not visited the Pacific coast, was ignorant of the character of the Chinese and their tricks and devices to evade our laws, and it seemed to him unreasonable to exclude free and independent skilled laborers who came to the country of their own accord, and not under cooly contracts or contracts for labor. He would certainly have voted otherwise if he had been better informed, as his subsequent record abundantly proves.

He contended that inasmuch as General Harrison had a son residing at Helena, Mont., and had visited him there, he must be familiar with the Chinese question, and must, necessarily, have known the fact that no skilled Chinese laborer ever came to this country without a contract for the purpose of establishing himself here, but that all Chinese, skilled or unskilled, come under contract of some kind, and have no intention of establishing themselves here, but intend to return to their native land, dead or alive. He assumed that these facts were known to General Harrison, whereas the fact is they were not generally known at that time outside of California, Oregon, and Nevada. The amendments would have led to frauds and evasions of the law, which General Harrison had no disposition to countenance, as his course on the whole subject establishes beyond controversy. A quibble like this is unfair, and would not be attempted for other than partisan purposes.

General Harrison voted against the first bill because the Farley and Grover amendments were incorporated therein, and because it provided for exclusion of Chinese laborers for the period of twenty years. The bill was vetoed by President Arthur because he regarded twenty years' exclusion in violation of the treaty which allowed the United States to regulate and restict Chinese immigration, but prohibited absolute exclusion. He also voted against the passage of the bill over the veto of the President for the same reason that induced him to vote against the bill on its passage by the Senate. The bill introduced by Mr. Page, a Republican, from California, in the House, prohibiting Chinese immigration for a period of ten years, was immediately thereafter taken up by the Senate, passed, and approved by the President.

General Harrison also voted against this bill solely on the ground that the Grover and Farley amendments were incorporated therein, and because he wanted a better bill and one in exact conformity with the treaty, to which no objection could be made, and not because he was opposed to carrying out the treaty in good faith and excluding Chinese.

When the bill of 1884 was passed General Harrison was absent, was not paired, and had no opportunity to participate in the passage of the bill.

We now have the entire record of General Harrison on the Chinese question, and we have already shown his affirmative action in 1886 in the passage of the most stringent bill to exclude Chinese that has ever passed either House, and which the Democrats of the House refused to consider on account of its supposed conflict with the treaty.

I repeat that the amendments offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], and for which Senator Harrison voted, are more in harmony with the treaty, more lawyer-like and more appropriate, than those against which Senator Harrison voted. In none of the discussions was one word uttered by him, and, I think, by none of the Republicans, in favor of Chinese immigration. They did not speak in favor of immigration then; they were legislating in favor of carrying out a treaty to exclude Chinese immigration, and all concurred that a proper bill ought to be passed. The only difference was in regard to the details of the bill. A bill was finally passed, as I have shown, which was vetoed by the President. Of course General Harrison sustained the veto, because in the body of the bill Congress had gone beyond what he thought the treaty warranted.

At the time when the law of 1882 was being passed it was not anticipated that there would be any dishonest efforts to evade its plain provisions. If that law had been fairly complied with by the Chinese and those attempting to bring them into the country, if it had not been for tricks and evasions, the first law that passed would have been effective. It was by fraud that the Chinese came in.

Afterwards, in 1884, as I have already shown, a more stringent bill was passed, which had been introduced in the House of Representatives by a Democrat from California (Mr. Henley), and that was about the only initiative movement on the part of any Democrat, but it was in harmony with the sentiment of the Pacific coast. That bill was more stringent, but it did not answer the purpose. It then seemed that every device and every trick imaginable would be resorted to by the Chinese, and that still further legislation was necessary.

In 1886, while the law was still being evaded and Chinese were still coming into the country, General Harrison and the Committee on Foreign Relations, and every Republican here, said, "We will see that the treaty is carried out in its spirit and effect; we will not tolerate any further evasion of the law," and a bill was reported and passed here, as I have before shown, which was more acceptable to the people of the Pacific coast than any other legislation which has been had. That bill was sent to the other House and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and there was, as we understand, much discussion by the present Administration as to the power or the propriety of passing such a bill. I will not say the power, because we have the power to abrogate the treaty by law, but there has been a constant policy inaugurated by the Republican party and continued by this Administration to treat with the Chinese and remain on friendly terms with them. That has been the policy of both parties, and instead of passing the bill in the House in 1886 that was passed by the Senate, it being exceedingly stringent in its provisions, and there being some question as to whether it was in conflict with the treaty, the present Administration very properly opened negotiations with China and secured the treaty now pending. I congratulate them for following that policy established by the Republican party, to deal with this question as a great nation should, and to secure what we must by negotiation if we can, and there will be no trouble in so securing it. I say I am glad that this Administration pursued that course.

I think if the bill of 1886 had been passed, although it might have been in conflict with the treaty, still it would have answered the same purpose as effectively as the pending treaty and the bill we have just passed through the Senate to carry it into effect. But the Administration pursued a different policy and negotiated the new treaty. The Senate has amended it in the particulars I have stated, out of abundant caution, and, as I said before, it has passed by unanimous consent a bill to carry it into effect.

What can be said, I ask, against General Harrison, or against any Republican who has labored to carry out the exclusion of Chinese in a legal, proper, and orderly manner without violating treaties and without unnecessary denunciation?

In looking through the record I find not one word, not one sentence, uttered by General Harrison apologizing for the coming of Chinese, or intimating that he was in favor of it. On the contrary, I find his official act indorsing a measure which meant absolute exclusion, and I find that act to have been unanimously indorsed by all Republicans.

Is it a reproach to the Republican party that they would not legislate against a race until they had discovered the necessity? Is it a reproach to the Republican party that they did not make haste to discriminate against the Chinese before they knew that it was necessary to do so? The Republican party had gone through a great struggle. They had been reared in a school of politics which recognized the rights of man. They had made a grand struggle to abolish slavery and to protect all men in their equal rights. Until they were certain that it was right and proper to exclude these people they could not take action; they could not take action until they had the evidence.

But when the Republican party found that where these Chinamen came civilization could not exist, when they came to know more of the history of the race with which they were contending, when they saw that it was a repetition of the old contest which had been waged for more than a thousand years between the people of Asia and the people of Europe for supremacy, when they saw that where the Chinese came they remained, they recognized the necessity of excluding them. The Chinese can live on half what we can. They are slavish and more patient than Europeans, and they have their own institutions which they worship, and if we allow them to come here they will occupy the soil. Open the gates to China and she will populate this country. Give the Chinese suffrage and the Chinese Government and the owners of Chinese laborers would control our elections. They would bring them here by contract, naturalize them, and control their votes.

When these facts were known in the East there was a universal conviction as to what was proper to be done. We now know that it is no discrimination against any race that has a right to be here. We now know that it is necessary to preserve our race and our country to keep the Chinese away. If we keep them away, we shall not have this incompatible element to deal with. The negroes were differently situated. They were here; we have to deal with them; and it is our duty and our necessity to elevate their condition so that they shall not destroy us. But the Chinese are not here, and we are under no obligation to import a race which is entirely incompatible with our institutions and whom we know to be destructive of our civilization.

When I find a unanimous consent to that effect, when I find this great question so vital to the Pacific coast settled and settled right, I deprecate reviving the discussions of the past and making political capital of it. It is settled as solidly as the Union is settled. It is settled as permanently as the question of secession. It is one of those great problems that we have met. The Republican party have settled it, and when they have made up their minds that a proposition is right the world knows they will stand by it. The world now knows that the Chinese question is settled because the Republican party have so declared, and they will not change on this great question. They did not decide until they heard all sides; they did not decide until they investigated it; and I say instead of being a reproach it is an honor to them that they did not decide so momentous a question as this in ignorance or on account of prejudice, but on the broad grounds of humanity, on the broad grounds of preserving our institutions, preserving our people and our laborers, and preserving this continent for them.

The Republican party are unanimous that no more Chinese shall come. The Pacific coast knows it and rests in security. There is no need of making speeches to affect the Pacific coast. They understand how the question is settled. They have watched it more closely than you have. They watched every man, and they know how he stands and where he stands, and when he comes forward after investigation and appreciates what is right and stands by it, they accept him. General Harrison's record is as satisfactory on the Pacific coast as if he had abused the Chinese for forty years.

All the people of the Pacific coast desire is that no more Chinamen shall come, and that when those who are here go back they shall not return. They want to see an end of this trouble. They want to see an end of this evil that threatens the peace, prosperity, and progress of the country, and now that they see the end they are rejoiced; they are willing to let by-gones be by-gones, and they will deprecate the introduction of this question in politics, fearing that it will retard rather than hasten the final consummation of the work.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON I ask leave at this time to lay before the Senate the report of the committee of conference on the Army appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa submits a conference report, which will be read.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand we are in executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate can proceed to legislative session by unanimous consent.

Mr. ALLISON. At this moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At this moment, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida desire to interfere with the consideration of the conference report?

Mr. CALL. I merely wish to observe to the Senator from Iowa that I was requested by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] to ask that the conference report on the Army appropriation bill should not be considered until to-morrow morning. He desires to say something in regard to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa move the consideration of the report now?

Mr. ALLISON. I move that consideration, and I will say to the Senator from Florida——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question must be put without debate, if objection is made to its consideration.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well, then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to debate?

Mr. CALL. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. ALLISON. Does the Senator object to my making a statement?

Mr. CALL. No, I only object to the report being made at this time.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator from Iowa will be allowed to proceed. I was requested by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] to state that he did not desire the conference report to be considered this evening if it was presented at any time after 4 o'clock, and that he hoped it would be laid over until to-morrow, when he would be ready for its consideration. He was one of the conferees on the part of the Senate, being the conferee on this side of the Chamber, and I hope the Senator from Iowa will not insist upon the conference report being considered until the Senator from Maryland is here.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, may I have an opportunity of saying a word?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] stated to me that he was obliged to leave the Chamber, and that he desired to make a few observations upon the report before it passed from the consideration of the Senate, and he suggested to me, if I called up the question this evening, that it should not be finally concluded to-night, to which I gave my assent, stating to him that I thought for the information of the Senate it would be wise to have the report read so that it might appear in the RECORD in the morning, so that Senators would have an opportunity of making an examination of the report to see its effect upon the bill.

This I intended to state when I first took the floor, and would have stated but for the interposition of the Senator from Florida.

I ask that the report be read in order that it may appear in the RECORD, and if any Senator desires an explanation I shall be glad to give it to-night, and then the matter may be passed over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent, the report may be printed in the RECORD without being read.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to hear it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

Mr. PLATT. I withdraw my suggestion for the reading of the conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The conference report, then, if there be no objection, will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10234) "making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 6, 12, 18, 19, 22, 24, and 27.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 9, 10, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 20, 21, 23, 26, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, and 34, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 11: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert, after the word "change," in line 19, page 5 of the bill, the words "or over any of the bond-aided Pacific railroads;" strike out, in line 21, same page, the words "last-named railroad" and insert in lieu thereof the word "railroads;" and in lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by said Senate amendment insert the following:

"And provided further, That the transportation furnished by the Quartermaster's Department to officers traveling without troops shall be limited to transportation in kind, not including sleeping or parlor car accommodations, over said free roads, over bond-aided Pacific railroads, and by conveyance belonging to the said Department."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 25: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 25, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$42,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 33: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out, in line 5 of said amendment, the words "and increased facilities for their manufacture;" and strike out, in line 12, the word "six" and insert in lieu thereof the word "five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 35: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 35, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out, in lines 12 and 13 of section 2 of said amendment, the words "three Army officers and three" and insert in lieu thereof the words "the superintendent of the Military Academy and two;" and strike out, in lines 20 and 21 of said section, the words "War Department" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Army;" strike out all after the words "New York," in section 3 of said amendment, down to the end of said section, and insert in lieu of the matter stricken out the words "$700,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary;" in lieu of the sum named in section 4 of said amendment insert "$3,500,000;" insert, after the word "shall" where it occurs the second time, in line 8 of section 5 of said amendment, the words "have or;" strike out section 6 of said amendment; change the number of section 7 of said amendment to section 6; and strike out section 8 of said amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 7. The appropriations provided for in sections 3, 4, 5, and 6 shall be available until expended, and shall be expended under the direct supervision of a board, to consist of the commanding general of the Army, an officer of ordnance, and an officer of artillery, to be selected by the Secretary of War; and said board shall be under the direction and control of the Secretary of War and subject to his supervision in all respects."

W. B. ALLISON,
P. B. PLUMB,
A. P. GORMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
R. W. TOWNSHEND,
LEVI MAISH,
Managers on the part of the House.

PEREZ DICKINSON.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 94) for the relief of Perez Dickinson, surviving partner of the late firm of Cowan & Dickinson, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment to the said bill.

CHAS. J. FAULKNER,
GEO. F. HOAR,
JNO. C. SPOONER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
W. J. STONE,
T. R. STOCKDALE,
J. M. BROWER,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report requires no action on the part of the Senate.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SABIN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them without amendment:

A bill (H. R. 7261) granting the right of way through certain lands in the State of Minnesota to the Moorhead, Leech Lake and Northern Railway Company; and

A bill (H. R. 7964) granting to the Aberdeen, Bismarck and Northwestern Railway right of way across a portion of the Sioux reservation, in Dakota Territory.

Mr. SABIN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10112) granting to the Duluth and Winnipeg Railway Company the right of way through the Fond du Lac Indian reservation, in the State of Minnesota, reported it with amendments.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. RANSOM introduced a bill (S. 3449) to provide for grading and paving the approaches to the national cemetery near Salisbury, N. C.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. PADDOCK submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiencyappropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 8990) to provide for the adjudication and payment of claims arising from Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GEORGE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2691) to provide for the settlement of accounts with certain railway companies; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes the consideration of the fisheries treaty in open executive session.

Mr. FRYE. Quite a number of Senators have inquired of me whether a vote will be taken to-night on the proposition of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to postpone the consideration of the treaty until next December. As I understand, the discussion as to that motion is about if not quite completed; and I ask unanimous consent that on the proposition of the Senator from Alabama the vote may be taken at 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that to-morrow at 12 o'clock the vote may be taken on the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to postpone the further consideration of the treaty until the Wednesday after the first Monday in December. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky rise to object?

Mr. BECK. No, I do not. I rise to say something.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent the order is made.

Mr. BECK. I rose simply because so much surprise was expressed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] should have stated that the Republican candidate for the Presidency had not only aided in having Chinese naturalized in Indianapolis but received their votes when he was the Republican candidate for governor of Indiana in 1876, and they seemed to be anxious to obtain the record. I have not the record, but I have a verbatim report of a speech made recently by the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] in the city of Terre Haute, published in the Indianapolis papers and not contradicted, in which the Senator from Indiana says:

Every almond-eyed Mongolian now in the United States is here as the result of treaties and laws made by the Republican party; and when General Harrison voted fourteen times in the Senate against restrictions on Chinese immigration he was simply carrying out the principles and adhering to the established practices of his party. When he voted in the Forty-seventh Congress against both the bills reported by Senator Miller, of California, and Mr. Page, of the House, restricting the immigration of Chinese laborers into the United States, he was faithful to his instincts of hositility to American labor. When he voted to strike out of these measures all restriction on the right and power of the State courts and of the United States courts to naturalize the Chinese and to admit them to citizenship, he was not only consistent with the teachings and logic of his party, but also with the sanction he himself gave to the naturalization of Chinamen at Indianapolis, procured by his law partner from the courts with his full knowledge and approval.

Mr. DAWES. I would inquire of the Senator from Kentucky if that is the same speech in which the Senator from Indiana denounced as a crime the votes which he himself had given on the greenback question in the House of Representatives?

Mr. BECK. I do not know about what else the Senator from Indiana said; but as so much surprise was expressed because any one should suggest that the Republican candidate for the Presidency had taken any part in naturalizing Chinese to get the benefit of their votes, I thought gentlemen might be enabled to ascertain the facts by reading what the senior Senator from Indiana said last week in a public address as published in Indianapolis, especially after the Senator from Nevada had said that the reason why the Republican candidate for the Presidency had voted to sustain the veto of President Arthur was because there was something in the bill as presented that did not quite meet the approval of men who desired to maintain treaties in their full faith. And yet when another bill came in that did meet the objection and that the President was able to sign, his candidate for the Presidency still voted against it, with full knowledge that it was put in such shape as to remove all the objections, or paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. Maxey], I forget which, meaning the same thing. Really that is the amusing part of the whole performance of the Senator from Nevada. He does not want that spoken of at all; let by-gones be by-gones, he says.

When the Republican party at Chicago are proclaiming themselves as the special friends and guardians of American labor, and denouncing the Democratic party as working in the interests of foreigners while they themselves are maintaining such a policy as will sustain the industries of the country, is it not proper to show that steadily and persistently their own candidate for the Presidency as long as he had power to do it exhibited his opposition to excluding those very Chinese laborers up to the last moment? And though the Senator from Nevada announced that a Senator from California had settled the question of naturalization years ago against the Chinese, the law partner of the Republican candidate is shown to have gone into a court at Indianapolis after that was done and had several Chinese men naturalized, and the candidate received their votes.

In 1886 the Senator says we were all agreed that they must be kept out. The bill of that year was proposed and passed in the Senate after a Democratic administration had come into power. For twenty years the Republican organization, the special friends of American labor, had allowed them to come in. During the war they imposed taxes to the highest possible point, and when they had both Houses by nearly a unanimous vote, certainly more than two-thirds in each, they passed a law providing that men should be brought here from all parts of the world by contract to labor for the great protected organizations that they had built up. The only law of that kind they ever did pass was "An act to encourage immigration," and section 2 of it provided:

That all contracts that shall be made by emigrants to the United States in foreign countries, in conformity to regulations that may be established by the said commissioner, whereby emigrants shall pledge the wages of their labor for a term not exceeding twelve months, to repay the expenses of their emigration, shall be held to be valid in law, and may be enforced in the courts of the United States, or of the several States and Territories; and such advances, if so stipulated in the contract, and the contract be recorded in the recorder's office in the county where the emigrant shall settle, shall operate as a lien upon any land thereafter acquired by the emigrant, whether under the homestead law when the title is consummated, or on property otherwise acquired until liquidated by the emigrant.

That act was approved July 4, 1864, and was maintained on the statute-book unrepealed until after the election of Mr. Cleveland, repealed by a law passed February 26, 1885, when power was departing from those men by the election of a Democratic President; never repealed until the power had gone from them; and even the homestead was subjected to a lien here created. They knew that men could go and could take up their little homestead, which could not be levied upon for debt, which could not be taken from them by any law for any obligation. But by this act the man who brought them here, whether from China or from Hungary or from Italy or anywhere else, could follow their homestead and take it away from them unless they paid what money had been advanced to bring them here. There never was a law like that passed before; and yet these gentlemen are the special guardians of American industry and of American labor!

The remarks of the Senator from Nevada made me think it was well to say that much in regard to it. Why, Mr. President, it was shown in the records of investigations made in California that the Central Pacific Railroad Company operated under this law. Mr. Pixley, representing the city of San Francisco, proved it before the committee. That company sent money to China through the Six Companies, or some of them organized in California, and at one time brought ten thousand Chinese to our country and placed them upon the railroad and drove out the American laborer. The Central Pacific was built largely in that way, and so it was along the other great lines, and so it was in the factories.

During all the twenty years that those gentlemen could maintain the law I have just read men were brought from all parts of the world, from Asia, Africa, Europe, and America, outside of the United States, to work in the factories and to run machinery, protected then as now by 47 to 50 per cent., driving out the American laborer with machinery that is capable of performing more labor than all the human muscle in the world combined.

The machinery owned by a few men can produce more in six months than the country can consume in a year; and when it lies idle it neither drinks nor eats nor wears any of the products of American industry, but waits until the time for profit comes. It drives out laborers. Under this law, maintained as long as it could be, and under the Chinese system and the system of contracts, the capitalists got the cheapest labor they could find in order that they might pocket all the profits, and this on the plea that the system was intended to protect the American laborer and nothing else!

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, drowning men catch at straws, and I do not wonder that after the protracted discussion of the base surrender of American rights which is proposed by the treaty now under consideration by the Senate, and after the passage of what is known as the Mills bill by the Democratic House of Representatives, by which it is proposed to flood this country with the cheap-labor products of the 404,000,000 inhabitants of China, the 350,000,000 inhabitants of India, and the pauper labor of Europe, by which it is proposed to destroy fifty-three of the great industries of the North, which give employment to white laborers, who are voters and who in theory and in fact control in political affairs there, who pay an enormous tax to sustain the sugar industry of Louisiana, an industry which has been protected by duties upon imported sugar for over forty years, and to support which nearly a thousand million dollars have been paid by the consumers of sugar in the United States, and all to swell the profits of a few of the former slaveholders who own the sugar plantations, an industry which is carried on by colored labor, by men who, although they are citizens under the Constitution and laws, are permitted to exercise none of the rights of citizens, men who are compelled to labor for such wages as are offered by the planters and manufacturers, and then to take their pay in barter, and who, if they undertake to improve their condition and to demand better wages, are forced to comply with the demands of their employers, as was lately the case when the militia of Louisiana was called out to compel the laborers upon the cane plantations to go to work again after they had struck for better wages—I say I do not wonder that Senators on the other side of the Chamber, in the face of such a situation and in their extremity to divert attention from more important subjects, turn their attention to the Republican candidate for President and undertake by such means as have been resorted to to-day to show that he has at some time been in favor of the admission of Chinese laborers into the United States.

But, sir, I deny that the record of General Harrison in Congress will show that he ever was in favor of the admission of Chinese laborers into the United States, or that he was ever opposed to the restriction of the immigration of Chinese laborers to this country.

As to the statement which has been made that his law partner secured the naturalization of Chinese in Indiana, I am not prepared to-night to speak, as I never heard of such a charge before and believe it is without foundation; but if such a thing occurred there must be a record of it, and the matter will be examined and referred to hereafter.

Mr. President, who is responsible for the presence of Chinese in this country? I assert that the Democratic party is largely responsible for their presence. China for thousands of years was willing to be isolated from the rest of the world; did not desire the presence of foreigners, and never has desired that her subjects should migrate to this or any other foreign country; but the United States and other countries sought commercial relations with that country, and the first treaty between the United States and China was ratified in 1845 under the administration of President Polk, and was promulgated by him. In 1857 or 1858 another treaty between China and the United States was negotiated, by which the rights of our citizens in China were greatly enlarged—they were to be entitled to go to and reside and trade in China, and were to be protected by the Chinese Government.

That treaty was made during the administration of James Buchanan. At that time and for many years prior thereto there were numbers of Chinese on the Pacific coast. As early as 1853 a Democratic senate in California, nearly all the members being Democrats, presided over by a Democratic lieutenant-governor, passed a resolution in which they recited that the future commerce with China would be very valuable, that California, being the State nearest to China, would be greatly benefited by the Chinese trade, and asking the President to appoint a commissioner to reside in China to look after the commercial interests of the United States. As was stated the other day by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], Mr. Hager, afterwards a United States Senator from California and at present collector of customs at the port of San Francisco, and now strongly in favor of the exclusion of Chinese laborers, was a member of that senate and was active in procuring the passage of that resolution.

As I have said, induced by these representations, the Buchanan administration negotiated a treaty with China securing to citizens of the United States important rights which had theretofore been denied to them by the Chinese Government. There was no express provision in that treaty in regard to the coming of Chinese to this country: first, because the Chinese Government was not in favor of the emigration of its subjects, and second, because it was not necessary under the laws of the United States and the theory of our Government up to that time. Emigrants from all countries had been welcomed here to a home among us, to participate in the advantages of our institutions, and enjoy the protection of our laws, and therefore no affirmative provision of the kind was required. The Democratic party, through the press and on the stump, and Mr. Buchanan in his annual message, claimed that that treaty negotiated with China was the crowning success of his administration.

Time passed on and China changed her policy toward the outside world and sought closer relations with other countries. She appointed a commission, at the head of which was Anson Burlingame, an American citizen, to come to the United States and negotiate a new treaty. When the commissioners arrived in California they were given a great banquet by the leading citizens of that State. The Democratic governor, H. H. Haight, presided at the banquet. Mr. Hager, who has already been referred to, and other leading Democrats were present and sat down to this feast with the leading Chinese merchants of San Francisco, and around the table in after-dinner speeches congratulated each other and the country upon the new departure of the Chinese Empire which would open her ports to an extensive commerce with the United States.

Up to that time there had been no danger apprehended from Chinese immigration. A supplemental treaty with China was negotiated by Andrew Johnson, then President. That treaty came before the United States Senate for ratification, and since the Senator from Missouri closed his speech I have been curious enough to examine the record to see what it shows in reference to its ratification. It will be remembered that the Senator from Alabama a few days since, when the bill to restrict Chinese immigration was under consideration, dilated at length upon the Burlingame treaty and laid it at the door of the Republican party, but the record is as follows:

Mr. Sumner submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the additional articles to the treaty between the United States and His Majesty the Emperor of China of the 18th of June, 1858, signed in the city of Washington, D. C., the 4th day of July, 1868, with the following amendments:

Article 5. After the words "United States," where they occur the second time, insert "or Chinese subjects."

Same article. After the words "Chinese subjects" insert "or citizens of the United States."

At the end of article 6 insert "but nothing herein contained shall be held to confer naturalization upon citizens of the United States in China nor upon the subjects of China in the United States."

Strike out all of article 7 in the following words: "The United States and the Emperor of China, recognizing in the present progress of nations a favorable tendency toward a unity of civilization, and regarding a unity of money and a unity of weights and of measures as favorable to that great object, do hereby agree that they will use their influence and efforts to obtain the establishment, by the general agreement of nations, of representative coins having a common value, and also a common standard of weights and measures for all countries."

Strike out article 8 in the following words: "The United States freely agree that Chinese subjects shall, without hindrance on account of their nationality or religion, be admitted to all schools, colleges, and other public educational institutions without being subject to any religious or political test. And, on the other hand, His Majesty the Emperor of China agrees that citizens of the United States may freely establish and maintain schools in that empire at those places where foreigners are by treaty permitted to reside," and insert in lieu thereof as follows:

"Citizens of the United States shall enjoy all the privileges of the public educational institutions under the control of the Government of China, and reciprocally Chinese subjects shall enjoy all the privileges of the public educational institutions under the control of the Government of the United States which are enjoyed in the respective countries by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation.

"The citizens of the United States may freely establish and maintain schools within the Empire of China at those places where foreigners are by treaty permitted to reside, and reciprocally Chinese subjects may enjoy the same privileges and immunities in the United States."

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the said resolution; and on the question to agree thereto,

It was determined unanimously in the affirmative.

Not a Democratic member of the Senate raised his voice against it. It was unanimously ratified by the Senate.

Mr. President, as time passed on it became evident that Chinese immigration was not desirable. The Chinese did not assimilate with our population; they did not come here to become citizens; they were not interested in our system of government; they saved their earnings, but not to enrich this country; they carried their accumulated gains away when they returned to China; and a sentiment grew up on the Pacific coast in favor of Chinese restriction.

By the representations of leading citizens of the Pacific coast of both parties the Government was induced to take action, and a Republican administration negotiated a new treaty modifying the treaty of 1868 so as to permit Congress, without a violation of the treaty, to enact laws for the restriction of Chinese immigration. I repeat, it was a Republican measure; and all that has ever been done until the recent treaty, which is not yet ratified, looking to the exclusion of Chinese laborers from this country, or the restriction of Chinese immigration, has been done by the Republican party.

That treaty, negotiated under a Republican administration, authorized the United States for a limited time to restrict but not to wholly prohibit Chinese immigration. A bill was introduced—it was a Senate bill, I think; at least it was pending before the Senate—which provided that for twenty years the coming of Chinese laborers to our shores should be prohibited. Mr. Harrison, it appears, was opposed to the period of twenty years, and thought the time of exclusion, to conform to the treaty, should be less. Whether he had any intimation from the President, that according to his judgment that was too long a period or not, is not known, but the action he took upon that bill shows that he was in favor of restriction. The senior Senator from Texas, upon the passage of the bill, arose in his place in the Senate and said substantially—I have not the RECORD before me—"I have received a letter from Mr. Harrison, in which he states that if this amendment is not adopted"—that is, the amendment reducing the time to ten years—"he will vote against the bill." That leaves the fair inference that if the amendment had been adopted he would have favored and voted for the bill, does it not? Is not that logical?

Mr. BECK. But the bill came in——

Mr. DOLPH. I will get to that in a moment.

Mr. COKE. The Senator alludes to my former colleague, Senator Maxey, I suppose.

Mr. DOLPH. Yes. I said the senior Senator from Texas. I meant Senator Maxey, who was the Senator who was paired with Mr. Harrison, and who stated on the floor of the Senate that he had received a letter from Senator Harrison, who was detained from the Senate on business of the Senate, in which he said that if the amendment was not adopted he would vote against the bill. I think I state it too strongly against General Harrison, but let it stand as I have stated it. The letter will speak for itself.

I say the fair inference from the statement is that if the amendment had been adopted Senator Harrison would have favored the bill, and it shows that he favored the restriction of Chinese immigration; that can not be denied.

Well, the bill passed—passed without the vote of Senator Harrison for or against it, and went to the President. He vetoed it, and vetoed it upon the very ground upon which Senator Harrison had opposed the bill, and I say if the rest of the Senate had been as wise and acted as judiciously as Senator Harrison did, and had adopted his views in regard to that amendment, it would have saved all the subsequent trouble of passing a new bill.

After the veto another bill was introduced in the House of Representatives by a Republican member, Mr. Page, and largely by his efforts its passage through the House was secured. It came to the Senate, and was taken up for consideration. It contained two provisions which Senator Harrison objected to—the fourteenth and fifteenth sections, which have been referred to by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. One of those sections provided in substance that no court should have the power or authority to naturalize Chinese subjects. Senator Harrison opposed that provision, and so would I have opposed it if I had been here, and I think that every other man who knew what the law was and was not willing to legislate for political purposes would have opposed it, too. Everybody knew that a Chinese subject could not be naturalized in the United States, and although it had been attempted by some judge up in Boston—I forget whether it was the United States circuit or United States district judge up there—the judges on the Pacific coast, one or more of them—I am not sure but the district judge and the circuit judge and Associate Justice Field had all decided that a Chinese subject could not be naturalized.

What would have been the effect of Congress saying the courts should not have that power to naturalize Chinese would it not have been an assumption by legislation that they already had the power to naturalize Chinese subjects? It would have thrown a doubt, at least, upon the action which had already been taken by the courts. The attempted naturalization of Chinese was illegal. Even the record of such a proceeding would not have entitled a Chinese subject to citizenship, and Senator Harrison knew it, and as a lawyer he was bound to vote against that provision.

As to the other provision referred to which was opposed by Senator Harrison, the provision undertaking to construe the word "laborer" as used in the treaty, the Senator from Missouri rightly says that Senator Harrison was too good a lawyer not to know that the treaty itself could be set aside by a law of Congress. That is not what Senator Harrison was discussing. He said that the word "laborer" had a fixed meaning, and it was used in the treaty with reference to this meaning, which the courts could determine, and that we could not make the word laborer, as used in the treaty, mean more or less by an act of Congress. Of course if we wished to go beyond the treaty, if we wished to violate the treaty, if we wished to exclude classes of Chinese by the law that were not excluded by the treaty, that could be done; but that was not what General Harrison was talking about. He was talking about enlarging the definition of the word "laborer" as used in the treaty by an act of Congress, and a very sensible remark he made about it, too, and his action in that matter shows, just as his action upon the previous bill showed, that he favored the restriction of Chinese immigration.

But suppose that that were not so. Is a man to be held forever to a position that he has taken at a particular time or to his views upon a question at a given time? Is there no room for change? Why, sir, it is only a fool or a bigot who never changes his opinions.

Senator Harrison was a member of the Senate in 1884 when an amendatory Chinese restriction bill was passed, and there is not a line or a scratch of a pen to show that he was opposed to it and was not in favor of it. I do not think the roll was called upon it. I do not know that Senator Harrison was present.

Mr. MITCHELL. In 1886?

Mr. DOLPH. In 1884 the bill was passed; 1886 I will come to in a moment.

I say there was a bill passed amending the act of 1882, more stringent in its provisions in regard to the main thing which was sought to be accomplished by it, the restriction of Chinese immigration, than the law of 1882, and Senator Harrison, for all there is in the record, appears to have been in favor of the bill; at least there was no sign, no word, no vote, and no action showing any opposition to it.

Well, sir, we come down to 1886 when a bill was reported from the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations by the distinguished Senator from the State of Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]. Mr. Harrison was then a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations. That bill reported in 1886 was an excellent bill. It would have cured the defects which had been discovered in previous legislation; it would have gone far to prevent the evasion of the laws of 1882 and 1884 by Chinese coming to this country. Mr. Harrison as a member of the committee joined in the report of the committee, was present when the bill was considered, made a friendly suggestion in answer to an inquiry by the honorable Senator who now occupies the chair [Mr. INGALLS] as to some objection that had been made by Senator McMillan from Minnesota. Mr. Harrison stated that the Senator from Minnesota had withdrawn his objection, thus showing his friendly interest in the bill and in the measure, and that he favored the bill, which was passed without a call of the yeas and nays.

Now let us trace that bill a little further. As I have said, that was an important bill to the Pacific coast, a bill that we were demanding, a bill that would have gone far to relieve the United States courts of the city of San Francisco, which were being overwhelmed with Chinese habeas corpus cases to the detriment of the public business. It went into the House of Representatives and was placed in the tomb of the Capulets to sleep its last sleep, and no attention was ever paid to it.

Mr. HOAR. What House of Representatives?

Mr. DOLPH. A Democratic House of Representatives. Therefore, Mr. President, I assert again that Mr. Harrison was in favor of Chinese restriction. The record shows that he favored and supported two bills for that purpose which have passed the Senate of the United States, one of which afterwards became a law, and one of which was pigeonholed by a Democratic House of Representatives. The record does not show that he was ever opposed to the principle, that he was opposed to the general proposition, and his opposition to the bill of 1882 was placed on other and perfectly defensible grounds. I shall be very much surprised indeed if an examination does not show that the statement which has been to-day made by the Senator from Missouri and subsequently reiterated by the Senator from Kentucky, concerning the naturalization of Chinese in Indiana, is a mistake, an entire and total mistake on their part, and something far worse than a mistake on the part of others.

Mr. President, this effort to show that Senator Harrison was opposed to Chinese restriction and in favor of Chinese immigration and cheap labor upon the Pacific coast will fail. The people of the Pacific coast are too intelligent and too well informed to be deceived. They know that the first treaty for commercial relations with China was negotiated by a Democratic administration. They know that the Republican party when in control of the administration took up this question, secured a modification of the treaty of 1868, and has secured all the legislation which has ever been had for the restriction of Chinese immigration, and knowing this they are willing to trust that party to deal with this question in the future.

And then, sir, they are engaged just now with more important things. They have read of the attempt of the Democratic Administration and the Democratic House to place wool on the free-list, and lumber on the free-list and salt on the free-list, and vegetables on the free-list, and fruit on the free-list, and the attempt to break down the barriers which have been erected around this country by the Republican party to prevent the wholesale importation of the cheap-labor products of other countries and to flood this country with such products; and these things are engaging their attention. Instead of searching the record now to find by what processes General Harrison came to the conclusion that Chinese immigration is not desirable, they are casting their eyes across the Pacific to Australia with her 3,000,000 inhabitants and 3,000,000 square miles and 80,000,000 sheep, and they are waiting to see whether the Democratic party will be able to open the flood-gates and let in the cheap wool of Australia and of South America and of Africa to destroy their flocks, to drive them to the slaughter pens, and ruin that great interest.

They know what party favors protection to the American laboring man; they understand the policy which lies back of the Mills bill, which inspired the President's message on the tariff, which would break down the great industrial system of the North, which would deprive millions of men of their daily labor, and therefore of their daily bread. They see the Democratic party with its arms around the great industrial structure of this country, as Samson had his arms around the pillars of the Philistine temple ready to pull it down over their heads, and they will be willing to trust this question of Chinese immigration to the Republican party, and they will look to it for the protection of the American laboring man against the cheap products of the four hundred and four millions of Chinese in China.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw the motion at the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. COCKRELL and others. Let us adjourn.

Mr. MITCHELL. I only want a minute.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from Oregon yield, as he has the floor, to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. MITCHELL. I will only occupy one minute of time.

Mr. COCKRELL. Very well.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, it is conceded, I believe by all, that General Harrison was a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations of this body in 1886. I hold in my hand a bill looking to the restriction of Chinese immigration, reported from that committee by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and agreed to unanimously by every member of that committee, as I understand, Republican and Democrat. That bill was reported to the Senate, and passed the Senate by a unanimous vote. The record shows, as has been already stated, that General Harrison was present in the Senate removing obstacles that seemed to arise, first one and then another, in regard to getting the bill up. There was no roll-call. The bill was passed unanimously, and this is the bill; and I ask to have it incorporated as part of my remarks in the RECORD.

I desire to say in this connection that in my judgment it is the best bill on the subject of Chinese restriction that has ever been reported from any committee of either House of Congress or has ever been passed by either House of Congress.

This bill, the Democrats of the Senate must admit, received the approval of General Harrison. Whatever may have been his notions years before, this shows what his record was two years and over ago on this subject.

Mr. TELLER. What became of that bill?

Mr. MITCHELL. That bill was passed, as stated by my colleague, by the Senate—a Republican Senate—and was sent to the House of Representatives—a Democratic House—and there it was suffered to die; it never was reported, no action was taken on it.

That is the record of General Harrison on the Chinese question over two years ago, and his action on the amendments which have been referred to by my honorable friend from Missouri [Mr. VEST], in which Senator Harrison declined to vote for certain amendments proposed, and in favor of others that were proposed, was, simply, not because he was opposed to legislation restricting Chinese immigration to this country, but because he desired to keep within the provisions of the treaty. The RECORD shows, all the way through, as was stated by my colleague clearly and distinctly in the correspondence he had with the then senior Senator from Texas, Mr. Maxey, that he was not opposed to a bill restricting Chinese immigration, but he was opposed to one that would prohibit Chinese immigration at that time solely because it was a violation of the then existing treaty between the two countries.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Oregon permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. Does he mean to say that the passage of the bill which he holds in his hands was indicative of the approval of its provisions by every member of the Senate? It passed unanimously and without the yeas and nays.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Mr. VEST. I should like to know if the Senators from Massachusetts approved that bill. They stand exactly in the same position that the Senator from Indiana, General Harrison, did. I do not think the Senators from Massachusetts will say they would have voted for it on a yea-and-nay call.

Mr. MITCHELL. General Harrison was on the committee, and the report was unanimous.

Mr. VEST. There is a record of that committee, and we all know how those reports are made and what they are worth so far as testing the opinions or making the record of any public man.

Mr. MITCHELL. The record shows that he not only joined in the report but that he aided in bringing the bill to a vote when it was brought to a vote in the Senate.

Mr. VEST. I leave General Harrison to speak for himself. In the letter which the Senator from Nevada was kind enough to put in the RECORD the other day, to Rev. Mr. Brant, of St. Louis, he gives two reasons for his action in 1882. One is that the two acts violated the treaty—for he voted against both. The second one is that he could not divest himself of the old idea that this country was a free place of refuge to all comers. I leave him to answer for himself.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have nothing further to say—I said I would only occupy a minute—except that the only Chinese restrictive legislation that has ever been approved in this country, two bills that have become laws, were approved by Republican Presidents.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like the floor for a moment.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask that the bill to which I have referred may be incorporated in my remarks without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has the right to insert it if he desires.

The bill is as follows:

A bill (S. 1991) supplementary to and amendatory of "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved May 6, 1882, as amended by an act to amend said act, approved July 5, 1884.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the words "Chinese laborer" and "Chinese laborers," wherever used in this act, or in the acts to which this act is supplementary or amendatory, shall be held to include and mean any laborer of the Chinese race, without regard to the government to which such laborer may owe allegiance, and without regard to the port, place, or country from which such laborer may come to the United States; and the words "Chinese passenger," wherever used in this act, or in the acts to which this act is supplementary or amendatory, shall be held to include and mean all persons of the Chinese race, without regard to the government to which they may owe allegiance, or the port, place, or country from which they may come to the United States.

SEC. 2. That section 1 of the act to which this act is amendatory and supplementary is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"That the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States from any foreign port or place is hereby suspended for the period of ten years next after the passage of this amendatory treaty; and during such suspension it shall not be lawful for any Chinese laborer to come from any foreign port or place, or, having so come, to remain within the United States."

SEC. 3. That section 4 of the act to which this act is amendatory and supplementary is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 4. That for the purpose of properly identifying Chinese laborers who were in the United States on the 17th day of November, 1880, or who came into the same prior to the 5th day of August, 1882, and in order to furnish them with the proper evidence of their right to come into the United States as provided by the act of Congress approved May 6, 1882, the amendment thereto approved July 6, 1884, and the treaty between the United States and China dated November 17, 1880, subject to the restrictions and limitations in this act contained, the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be prepared, and furnished to collectors of customs at ports where the same may be required, suitable books of registration, in such form as shall enable the said collectors to conveniently register and set forth fully all the particulars necessary to identify the Chinese laborers who shall apply for registration under this act. The said Secretary shall also cause to be prepared, and furnished to said collectors, books of preliminary and return certificates, in such forms as shall enable the said collectors to conveniently set forth and certify accurately, distinctly, and fully all the particulars necessary to identify the Chinese laborers to whom the said certificates shall be issued as hereinafter provided. The said return certificates shall be upon such quality, kind, and color of paper as to be readily distinguishable from the preliminary certificate, and the printing or engraving thereof shall be of such device as shall in the best manner guard against the counterfeiting or alteration of said certificate. Said return certificate shall be printed or engraved with a stub, in such manner that the stub when filled up shall contain a brief statement of all the particulars entered in the certificate, with the number thereof, and shall be so printed or engraved and stamped that when the certificate is detached from the stub it shall so correspond with it as to afford evidence of the genuineness of the certificate. Whenever any Chinese laborer shall be about to leave the United States, and being under the existing laws of the United States entitled to return, he shall, if he desires to return, apply to the collector of customs at the port from which he is about to depart, for registration and for the preliminary and return certificates herein provided; and for the purpose of identification the said Chinese laborer shall, at the time of such application, furnish to the said collector four photographs of himself of the size known as carte de visite, the dimensions of which shall be as near as may be 2½ inches in width by 4½ inches in length; the photographs or pictures to be a front face view, not less than 1 inch nor more than 1½ inches in width across the face of the actual picture; one of the said pictures to be mounted on card-board of the above-described dimensions, and furnished to the collector for preservation as part of the records relating to Chinese immigration, and to be used if necessary for the future identification of the applicant; the other three pictures to be unmounted, one proof to be securely pasted in the book of registration, so as to form part of the description of the person registered, one proof to be securely pasted and affixed to the preliminary certificate, so as to form in like manner part of that portion of the certificate describing the person to whom the certificate is issued, and the other proof to be attached as securely and permanently as possible to the return certificate, so that, with the descriptive particulars herein required to be set forth in said certificate, the Chinese laborer to whom said certificate is issued may be readily and fully identified. On application being made by any Chinese laborer to be registered as herein provided, the collector, his deputy or other duly authorized officer or clerk, shall thereupon ascertain the family, individual, and tribal name of the applicant in full, when and where he was born, the date of his arrival in the United States, his occupation, when and where followed, his last place of residence, his height, complexion, color of eyes, physical marks and peculiarities, and all facts necessary for the accurate, distinct, and full identification of the applicant. All the facts so ascertained shall be entered by the said collector, his deputy or other duly authorized officer or clerk, in the book of registration, in such way as to form with the said photograph the description of the applicant herein required. To such registration the applicant shall attach his signature. The collector, or his deputy, shall thereupon issue to the applicant, free of charge, the preliminary certificate of identification, signed by such collector or deputy, and attested by the seal of office of said collector. Said certificate shall be numbered to correspond with the entry of registration, and shall contain a statement of all the particulars required and entered in the book of registration, and shall certify that the person to whom it is issued is entitled to exchange it for a return certificate upon going on board the vessel on his departure from the United States. The said preliminary certificate shall have plainly printed upon it, in the English and Chinese languages, a notice that the certificate is not transferable, and can only be used by the person to whom it is issued, in exchange for a return certificate on board of the vessel prior to departure. At the time the said collector or his deputy issues the preliminary certificate as aforesaid, or as soon thereafter as convenient, he shall make out or cause to be made out the return certificate, which shall be numbered to correspond with the entry of registration and the preliminary certificate, and shall also contain a statement of all the particulars required and entered in the book of registration, and shall certify that the person to whom it is issued is a Chinese laborer; that he was in the United States on the 17th day of November, 1880, or came into the United States prior to the 5th day of August, 1882; that he is about to depart from the United States, and is entitled to return thereto on the presentation and surrender of the said certificate to the collector of customs at the port where he shall again re-enter the United States, subject to the restrictions and limitations hereinafter provided as to the number of Chinese passengers who may come into the United States on any one vessel from any foreign port or place. The said certificate may contain any other matter that the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary in the further identification of the person to whom the certificate is issued. The said certificate shall be signed by the collector, or his duly authorized deputy, and shall be attested by the seal of office of the said collector. The photograph herein mentioned shall be so pasted, affixed, and stamped upon the return certificate as to become permanently identified with its form. The said return certificats shall have plainly printed upon it, in the English and Chinese languages, a notice that it is not transferable, and will not be received by any officer of the United States as entitling the holder to land or come into the United States unless presented by the person to whom it was issued. That for the purpose of delivering return certificates to Chinese laborers about to depart from the United States, the collector of customs, his deputy or other duly authorized officer or clerk, shall go on board any vessel upon which a Chinese laborer is about to depart from the United States, and after having satisfied himself that such Chinese laborer is in fact about to depart from the United States, he shall deliver to such Chinese laborer, free of charge, the return certificate herein provided, in exchange for the preliminary certificate theretofore issued to such person; but in no case shall a return certificate be delivered without the return of the preliminary certificate. The said preliminary certificate shall thereupon be canceled and retained, and filed by the said collector as part of the records of his office relating to Chinese immigration. In case any Chinese laborer, after having received such final certificate, shall leave such vessel before her departure, he shall deliver his certificate to the collector of customs, or other officer representing the collector of customs on board said vessel; and if such Chinese laborer shall fail to return to such vessel before her departure from port, the said return certificate, and all return certificates not called for, shall be immediately canceled by the officer charged with the duty of exchanging return for preliminary certificates. The fact of such cancellation shall be noted upon the book of registration opposite to the number of the certificate canceled, and the canceled certificate filed and securely preserved in the records of the custom-house, together with a report from such officer showing the number of preliminary and return certificates issued for the Chinese laborers to depart on said vessel, the number of preliminary certificates exchanged for return certificates, the number of return certificates canceled, the number of Chinese laborers who departed without return certificates, and the number who took such certificates. The return certificate herein provided for shall entitle the Chinese laborer to whom the same is issued to return and re-enter the United States, upon producing and surrendering the said certificate to the collestor of customs of the district at which such Chinese laborer shall seek to re-enter, subject to the restrictions and limitations hereinafter provided as to the number of Chinese passengers who may come into the United States on any one vessel from any foreign port or place; and said return certificate, and the certificate issued under the acts to which this act is amendatory and supplementary, shall be the only evidence of the right of any Chinese laborer to return to and re-enter the United States. Upon the delivery of such return certificate by such Chinese laborer to the collector of customs at the time of re-entering into the United States, said collector shall cause the same to be canceled, filed, and securely preserved in the records of the custom-house. The Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe the form of such monthly statements to be made by collectors of customs as will show the number of Chinese arriving at and departing from the various ports of the United States, classified as laborers, merchants, and officials, and the aggregate of such statements shall be published as other statistics relating to commerce and immigration are now published."

SEC. 4. That whenever any Chinese laborer shall arrive at any port or place in the United States from any foreign port or place, claiming to be in transit to some other country, and desiring merely to pass through or across the territory of the United States in his journey to such other country, he shall not be permitted to land or come into the United States until the fact that a bona fide transit only is intended by such Chinese laborer shall have been established to the satisfaction of the collector of customs or other duly authorized officer at or nearest to such port or place of arrival; and to protect the people of the United States from Chinese laborers coming into or remaining in the United States under the pretense of being in transit to another country, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to make all needful rules and regulations to prevent the landing and coming into the United States of such persons; and for the identification of Chinese laborers in actual transit across or through the territory of the United States, the said Secretary shall prescribe such forms, documents, rules, and regulations as will insure a full and accurate record of the arrival in the United States and departure therefrom of such Chinese laborers. The said Secretary shall also prescribe the form of such monthly statements to be made by collectors of customs as will show the number of Chinese laborers arriving at the various ports of the United States claiming to be in transit to some other country, the number of such persons permitted to land, and the number who, having been so permitted to land, have departed from the United States.

SEC. 5. That for the purpose of identifying any Chinese person other than a laborer now or hereafter residing or being in the United States, and desiring to depart temporarily therefrom, with the intention of returning to the United States, the collector of customs of the district from which such Chinese person other than a laborer desires to depart shall register such person upon his or her application, and upon being furnished with the photograph of the applicant as in the case of a Chinese laborer, an i shall issue, without cost or charge to such Chinese person, the preliminary and return certificates in all respects similar to those provided for the identification of Chinese laborers by the act to which this is supplementary and amendatory, as amended in this act, and in accordance with such further provisions relating thereto as are made in this act, such changes to be made as the different character, occupation, and circumstances of the applicant may require. The said certificates shall be on such colored paper and in such form as to be readily distinguishable from the certificates herein provided for Chinese laborers; and such a certificate shall be sufficient evidence of the right of any Chinese person other than a Chinese laborer, temporarily departing, to re-enter the United States.

SEC. 6. That section 7 of the act to which this is amendatory and supplementary is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 7. That any person who shall knowingly and falsely utter or substitute any name for the name written in any preliminary or return certificate, or other certificate or permit issued under the authority of this act, or under the authority of any rule or regulation of the Secretary of the Treasury in execution of the provisions of this act or of the acts to which this act is amendatory, or forge any such certificate or permit, or knowingly transfer, utter, or have in possession, with intent to use the same, any forged or fraudulent preliminary or return certificate or permit, or falsely personate any person named in any such certificate or permit, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $1,000 and imprisoned in a penitentiary for a term of not more than five years."

SEC. 7. That section 9 of the act to which this act is amendatory and supplementary is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 9. That before any Chinese passengers are landed from any such vessel or allowed to come into the United States, the collector, his deputy or other duly authorized officer, shall examine such passengers and compare their number with the number and other particulars set forth in the list of such passengers as produced by the master of such vessel, and shall compare the descriptive particulars contained in the return certificates with the physical marks and peculiarities of the persons producing such certificates; and no Chinese passengers shall be allowed to land or come into the United States until the said collector, his deputy or other duly authorized officer, shall determine that such Chinese passenger is the person named and described in the certificate produced by him, and that he is entitled to land and come into the United States under the laws thereof; and in case such determination shall be by an officer other than the collector, and shall be against the right of such person to land or come into the United States, an appeal may be taken from such decision to the collector of the port at which the Chinese person seeks to land and come into the United States as aforesaid. But the provisions of this act shall not preclude a judicial inquiry into and determination of the right of any person to come into the United States."

SEC. 8. That on and after ninety days after this act takes effect, no master or other person in charge of any vessel, whether owned in whole or in part by a citizen of the United States or by an alien, shall take on board any such vessel, at any port or place within the Chinese Empire or at any other foreign port or place whatever, any number of Chinese passengers, whether male or female, exceeding one passenger to every 50 tons of the registered tonnage of such vessel, with intent to bring such passengers to the United States, nor bring Chinese passengers on board any vessel to any number exceeding one passenger to every 50 tons of the registered tonnage of such vessel, on one voyage, within the jurisdiction of the United States: Provided, That this section shall not apply to any master of a vessel seeking a harbor in stress of weather. Any person violating the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, for each passenger so taken on board and brought within the jurisdiction of the United States exceeding the number of one passenger to every 50 tons of the registered tonnage of such vessel, be fined $500, and may also be imprisoned for not exceeding six months. That the amount of the several penalties imposed by this section shall be a lien on the vessel violating the same, and such vessel shall be libeled therefor in the district court of the United States within which district such vessel shall arrive or be found.

SEC. 9. That the limitations herein provided as to the number of Chinese passengers that may be carried by any vessel on any one voyage to any port or place in the United States shall not apply to persons officially connected with the Chinese Government or any other Government, or any embassy thereof, or their body or household servants, or to persons rescued from shipwreck during the voyage of and by the vessel bringing the same within the jurisdiction of the United States.

SEC. 10. That the arrival and departure of Chinese persons by land shall be subject to the same restrictions, conditions, and regulations as are herein imposed upon the arrival and departure of Chinese persons by vessel, so far as the said restrictions, conditions, and regulations may by applicable, and subject to such further regulations and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe to prevent the admission or introduction of Chinese persons from adjoining foreign territory contrary to law.

SEC. 11. That all acts and parts of acts, so far as they conflict with the provisions of this act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], in citing the law of 1864, which permitted and encouraged and made provision with reference to the importation of foreign labor, stated that it remained the law of the land until it was repealed after the Republican party lost the power of action, in 1887.

Mr. COCKRELL. Eighteen hundred and eighty-five he said.

Mr. BLAIR. Eighteen hundred and eighty-five. The truth in regard to that labor legislation and most of the other legislation which has so vexed the Senate, or at least some members of the Senate, for several years past is, that it all originated in the impulse given to this class of ideas and movements in the country with the investigation ordered by the Republican Senate in 1883. I presume there are Senators here who remember something about that investigation and something about the opposition through which it made its way to the attention of legislative bodies in both ends of the Capitol and the country at large. There was an impulse which came from the people and which forced itself to the front at last, until we find our Democratic friends here for their own immortality claiming to depend on what they so exceedingly derided in the earlier stages of the proceedings.

But the particular law to which the Senator from Kentucky alluded, passed in 1864, has been the subject-matter of discussion several times in this Chamber. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is not present, but he has been present when the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] and other Senators on his side of the Chamber attacked him with tooth and fang on account of his record in connection with that law; but his explanation and answer was always, it seemed to me, triumphant, that that was a time when we needed assistance from any foreign country that would send its laborers or soldiers either to cultivate our fields, to dig in our mines, or to replenish our armies, and Senators from the South understand that very well. I am speaking of the explanation of the Senator from Ohio in reference to his record in regard to that law.

Mr. COCKRELL. In 1864 the law did not permit them to go into the Army.

Mr. BLAIR. The law itself became perhaps a dead letter; for years it was a dead letter; and after the investigation to which I have referred by the Senate Committee on Education and Labor in 1883, when our attention was turned further to this matter, bills were introduced, and I introduced them myself and pressed them, and as a result of that movement—I do not undertake to say that it originated wholly with one party or another, but I say it originated in that investigation and was pressed in consequence of the developments of that investigation—the law of February 26, 1885, was enacted. It had been pending for a long time prior to the election of Grover Cleveland, which took place in the November preceding. It was perhaps not a Republican measure wholly; I do not claim that it was; but it was certainly not a Democratic measure. It was followed by another law enacted in the year 1887.

The two parties, it is right to say, have been practically becoming more and more unanimous in pressing this class of legislation, and it is, I think, a compliment that both may lay claim to the patriotism which actuates them that they are inclined more and more to protect the American laborer and to insist that the foreigner who comes here shall come here under the influence of proper motives, and that he shall come here, too, of his own free will and accord, with a character fitting him to become an American citizen, and with something of this world's goods, so that he may not become at once a public charge.

I desired to say this much in order to correct what I thought was the inaccuracy of the Senator from Kentucky with reference to the origin of the existing anti-contract labor law.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, a few moments ago I sought the floor for the purpose of moving an adjournment, and I should renew that motion now without making a single observation but for the fact that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] sought to emphasize the action of the Republican party in former years as in favor of the immigration of Chinese into this country, and claimed that the Democratic party was a party opposed to Chinese immigration, thus endeavoring to draw a distinction upon that subject between the two great political parties in this country. As the Senator has made that attempt, and sought to emphasize it, I wish, before this Senate adjourns, to put in my own emphatic protest against any such claim.

There may have been, and doubtless were, running through the years 1878 and 1879, some members of the Republican party in this Chamber and out of it who did recall the Declaration of Independence as setting forth the general rights of man. I am speaking now from general memory, because I came into this Chamber late in the afternoon from other occupations and employments and found this debate going on and my own record challenged somewhat by the Senator from Missouri, and therefore I do not pretend now to speak with perfect accuracy; but I remember very well when Senator Morton, of Indiana, then the peer of any Senator on this floor, and recognized by all of us who heard him as such, took the lead in an investigation into this Chinese question and made an elaborate report. The special committee of which he was chairman took much testimony upon the subject; but before he was able to bring forward the legislation which he recommended in that report he was called away from us.

It is perfectly well known to members who have examined into his record that Senator Morton intended to prepare and did prepare, at least partially, a bill looking to the absolute legislative prohibition of Chinese immigration into this country; but he passed away before that legislation could be brought forward. Then Senator Sargent, at that time an active and energetic member upon this floor and a member of that committee, took up the question where Senator Morton laid it down by his death, and in 1879, if I mistake not, or it may have been in 1878, we had a long and vigorous debate upon the Chinese question in this Chamber. There was, with three or four exceptions, no Republicans on this side of the Chamber who denied that it was the duty of this Government to inhibit the immigration of Chinese to this country in the way they were then migrating here, and, as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] reminds me, many of them supported that measure by speeches on this floor.

Senator Sargent advocated it, I remember, with great interest and great assiduity, as did the then distinguished Senator from Maine, Mr. Blaine, and in that debate, as I repeat, with three or four exceptions—the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] will remember about that—there was no opposition to the general measure, because the report of Mr. Morton, based on testimony taken, had disclosed the difficulties on the Pacific coast with respect to Chinese immigration. But the difficulty was that it was claimed that here was a friendly power lying on the Pacific Ocean opposite to us, and that it was unwise for us to strike down by legislation a treaty which had been made some seven or eight years before, and that it would be an absolute breach of public faith and a public dishonor to do so. That was the argument made.

I remember very well that the Senator from New York, Mr. Conkling, who sat in the seat next to where I now am, based his entire opposition to that bill, not on the ground that we should not inhibit Chinese immigration, but that we should first give this great friendly power an opportunity of revising the treaty of 1868, known as the Burlingame treaty; that we should not ruthlessly strike down that treaty by legislation without giving China an opportunity of revising the treaty.

That bill, however, passed this Chamber and passed the other House. It was vetoed by President Hayes upon the sole ground that it was an infraction of the public faith because an infraction of the treaty. Did President Hayes say that he vetoed that bill upon the ground that the immigration of Chinese should not be prohibited? Not at all. And Secretary Evarts immediatly following that veto inaugurated a commission, consisting of three prominent men of our country, who were to go out to China and secure a revision of that treaty. They went to China and they accomplished substantially the purposes which the people of the United States had in view. There was no party in that. That treaty was regarded as a great success on the part of the men who negotiated it and who executed it, because it got rid of the very troublesome and unfortunate treaty, as it turned out to be afterwards, made in 1868.

That treaty provided various stipulations—I will not recount them and I do not remember them all—but it was, in substance, to give to the control of the Congress of the United States the question of inhibiting the immigration of Chinese to the United States.

I neglected to say, which I intend to say, because the Senator from Missouri calls my vote in question, that I voted for the bill of 1879, being strongly of the impression that we ought to do something and take some action, although I was impressed by the arguments made that it was an infraction of the public faith.

That treaty was ratified in this Chamber in 1880. It was ratified too late during that Congress to bring any legislation looking to the execution of the great powers given to Congress in that treaty. That treaty came in here. It came in here with the imprimatur of our Committee on Foreign Relations, and I ask the Senator from Missouri, whom I see in his seat, whether there was any statement then from any member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, either Republican or Democrat, that he was in favor of Chinese immigration? Was there any party in this Chamber, was there any considerable number—I do not know of one man on either side of this Chamber who stood up in his place and sought to antagonize the principles of that treaty, which were clearly in the interest of prohibition.

That measure came in here. The lamented Senator from California [Mr. Miller] was then chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and he brought in a bill carrying out and executing the provisions of that treaty. There were certain legislative provisions in it giving construction to the language of the treaty. Every lawyer in this body I believe at that time said that Congress could not by legislation change the well-fixed meaning of the language of a treaty. You can abrogate a treaty by legislation, but one party can not construe a treaty. That was the line of argument as I remember it. Nobody in this Chamber opposed that bill; nobody was opposed to carrying out to the letter and the spirit that treaty negotiated under Secretary Evarts.

There was pending, as I remember, at that time a Senatorial election in the State of California and another in the State of Oregon, and I say it with all respect here, but say it upon my responsibility, that there was an effort by Senators on the other side of the Chamber to demagogue on this question, to make amendments that were impracticable and that had no vitality in fact and there was no point in them, in order to put the Republican side of the Chamber in an attitude of embarrassment. They may have succeeded in doing so. I have seen that attempted many times in this Chamber. I have felt the influence and power of it sometimes myself, because we sometimes give votes here that we do not want to give. But does anybody think, does the Senator from Missouri or any Senator on that side of the Chamber think that he can make the American people for a moment believe that the Republican side of this Chamber occupied a different position toward the great question of Chinese prohibition from that occupied by the Democratic party?

I can not speak for other Senators upon this floor, but I speak for myself when I say that after the report made by Senator Morton in 1877 or 1878 and after the debate of 1879, my mind was clear that it was the duty of this Government to exercise its undoubted power in the most appropriate way, whether by treaty or legislation, to secure the prohibition of Chinese migration to this country. I have never varied one moment from that judgment, and I do not believe that General Harrison, who is now our candidate, and who I believe will be, as I know he ought to be, elected, ever entertained a sentiment other than that which I now express. But I do not speak for him. He is no Lilliputian in any debate or in any contest; he is the peer of his accusers from wherever they may come; and he will defend himself on proper occasion as respects his votes in this Chamber; and I say now that although there were negative votes cast by myself as respects some of those amendments, and when they were incorporated I voted against the bill, I did not so vote because I was in favor of putting the Chinese in competition with the American laborer either by admitting Chinese goods manufactured on the other side free or by admitting the Chinese laborer to this country to manufacture them here in competition with our own American workmen.

That was my attitude; and with that treaty fresh from the very pens of the men whom we sent to China to negotiate it, I did not propose by legislation to strike China in the face when she had shown a disposition to go as far as we desired to go in that regard. As the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] suggests to me, President Cleveland negotiated a new treaty in order that there might be a sound and proper basis for legislation.

That bill passed and became a law and the Chinese Government made no objection to it, although it was a legislative construction of the treaty of 1880, and to a certain degree an infraction of that treaty. What then did we do? Very soon thereafter, in 1884, finding that the Chinese Government was willing that we should put in force stringent legislation in this regard, a fresh and more vigorous bill was passed by the Senate than was ever dreamed of by the Senators from California and Oregon who sought their re-election by seeking to place Republicans in a hostile attitude by their votes in this Chamber.

That proposed legislation of 1884 went far beyond any suggestions made in these Democratic amendments introduced by the Senators from Oregon and California who then sat upon that side of the Chamber, and that bill passed this Chamber, I believe, without a yea-and-nay vote, although my memory is not clear upon that subject. It passed nem. con. What does that mean?

There is no limit to debate here; no man is constrained here; if a man hears read at that desk a bill which does not meet the approval of his judgment, he can rise in his place before the vote is taken and express his judgment upon it, and he can get a record if he desires to do it, because it is a universal courtesy to grant the yeas and nays in this Chamber when they are called for. So then in 1884, with General Harrison sitting in this Chamber, a more rigid bill than was even suggested or thought of in 1882 was passed by the unanimous vote of this body, reported, as the Senator from Nevada has stated, by the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which General Harrison was an able and strong and active member.

I have referred to what occurred here in 1884. Then we come to 1886, General Harrison still a member of this Chamber, and a still more stringent bill was reported in 1886 by a Republican Committee on Foreign Relations and passed again in this Chamber without a single hostile voice or hostile vote, and yet the Senator from Missouri takes pains now in the very beginning of this canvass to arraign the Republican candidate for the Presidency on the idea that he and the Republican party stand in a hostile attitude to the prohibition of the Chinese coming into this country, when he ought to know, and when every other man does know who investigates the subject, that upon that question the Republican party is as vigorous and as strong as is the Democratic party.

Mr. President, I make these statements not for my own vindication, although my own votes have been somewhat arraigned. I voted then, as I always try to do in this Chamber, from the light I had at the time. I voted as I did then because the lawyers of this Chamber convinced me that, with the ink scarcely dry upon the treaty of 1880, we were by legislation seeking to infract it.

Mr. VEST. I think the Senator from Iowa is a fair disputant, and that he does not want to do any injustice intentionally.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly not.

Mr. VEST. But I make this statement, and every intelligent man in this country will corroborate it. After the contest of 1882 and the signing by President Arthur of the second bill we passed, which was a House bill, the Chinese question was considered practically settled. The public sentiment of the country has crystallized in so large a majority in favor of that legislation that even the stringent opponents of the bill which had passed ceased their opposition.

Now, Mr. President, I make this assertion—and that is the test of the accuracy of the conclusions at least drawn by the Senator from Iowa——

Mr. ALLISON. I have not yet concluded.

Mr. VEST. He says that the acts of 1884 and 1886, that were passed here nem. con. and without the yeas and nays, show that every member of the Senate approved that legislation. I say now that the Senators from Massachusetts will neither of them say that they approved those laws, in my judgment, unless I am greatly mistaken in their opinions then and now.

Mr. ALLISON. Well, Mr. President, I leave the Senator from Missouri and the Senators from Massachusetts to settle that question. I want to say that if I am present here in my seat in this Chamber, and a bill is read by the Secretary and I make no objection to it, and it passes, and I neither explain my vote nor my situation respecting it, I am bound by that record as one who did not oppose that bill.

Mr. President, I do not rest General Harrison's record upon that statement, I rest it upon the fact that he was a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, which consisted of Democrats and Republicans, five of them Republicans and four of them Democrats. They are the proper witnesses, and I challenge here and now any Democrat or Republican, a member of the Foreign Relations Committee at that time, to say that Senator Harrison there or here did not give his hearty approval and concurrence to those two bills. If I intended to be hypercritical—indeed, I could do so without being hypercritical—I could say that the bill of 1886, which passed this Chamber with absolute and practical unanimity, went to the Democratic House of Representatives and there slept the sleep of death.

Mr. MITCHELL. Senator Harrison was a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations in 1886.

Mr. ALLISON. I am corrected by saying that General Harrison was not a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations in 1884, but he was in 1886. Then I am invigorated, I am strengthened, by the fact that General Harrison was a member of this committee in 1886, when this most stringent legislation was passed.

Mr. STEWART. And the chairman of the committee said in his report that the bill was unanimously agreed to by the committee.

Mr. ALLISON. I thank the Senator from Nevada for calling my attention to that.

That bill went to the House of Representatives. If the Democratic party were so vigorous and so ready to secure some stringent prohibitory legislation, they had the Speaker of the House, they had the committees of the House, they had the control of the floor; and why is it that they did not exercise that great power which they had, because in that Congress they had more than 40 majority while in this one they only have 16, and there might be some excuse for saying that the majority was so small that they could not bring this up; but here they were in the vigor of their power, in the plenitude of their influence, and yet they allowed that bill to die.

In view of these facts I say that it does not lie in the pathway of any proper or just criticism of any Republican for any Democrat to stand in this Chamber and arraign the Republican party or any member of it for hostility to the principle of prohibition of Chinese immigration.

Mr. President, I have said all I intended to say upon this subject, and I would not have said a word but for the second interruption of the Senator from Missouri after I had made a motion to adjourn.

Mr. BERRY. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, August 16, 1888, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, August 15, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

CORRECTIONS.

Mr. DUNN. I would like to have a correction made. I am reported in the Journal and the RECORD as having been absent without excuse upon each call of the House yesterday. The fact is, I was engaged in my committee-room examining witnesses in the course of an investigation heretofore ordered by the House.

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I am reported in the RECORD as absent without excuse upon the first call of the House yesterday. The truth of the matter is that I was present and responded to my name.

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made.

The Journal was then approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HUDD, indefinitely.

To Mr. PEEL, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. WILKINS, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. COWLES, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. YARDLEY, for two weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. DALZELL, for two weeks, on account of business.

To Mr. SEYMOUR, indefinitely, from August 17, on account of sickness in his family.

ADULTERATED LARD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MORGAN], on behalf of the Committee on Agriculture, asks that the resolution which will be read by the Clerk be adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House, That there be published for the use of the House 1,000 copies of the statements made before and papers submitted to the Committee of the House on Agriculture in regard to the bill (H. R. 6138) to regulate the manufacture and sale of counterfeit or compound lard.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I understand this includes all papers submitted to the committee as well as statements made.

Mr. MORGAN. It does. The language of the resolution is "statements made before and papers submitted to the committee." The committee unanimously directed that this resolution be presented to the House; and I presume that the chairman of the committee [Mr. HATCH] forgot it.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I did not know but that the resolution referred to a part only of the papers.

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir; the purpose is to publish the whole.

There being no objection, the resolution was adopted.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. KILGORE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled bills and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 288) for the erection of a public building at Sioux City, Iowa;

A bill (S. 509) authorizing an increase in pensions in case of deafness;

A bill (S. 1162) for the relief of Susan E. Alger;

A bill (S. 2106) granting a pension to William Kelsey;

A bill (S. 2116) to provide aid to State or Territorial homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States;

A bill (S. 2118) granting a pension to Richard H. Van Dorin;

A bill (S. 2500) granting a pension to Gertrude K. Lyford;

A bill (S. 2724) for the relief of H. H. Helper;

A bill (S. 2833) granting a pension to Caspar Blanke, of Portland, Oregon;

A bill (S. 3219) to increase the pension of Keyes P. Cool; and Joint resolution (S. R. 62) in recognition of the services of Joseph Francis.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment House bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 2190) granting a pension to Jane Smallridge;

A bill (H. R. 5155) granting a pension to John S. Bryant;

A bill (H. R. 5156) for the relief of Andrew R. G. Smith;

A bill (H. R. 9263) granting an increase of pension to Abraham J. Buckles;

A bill (H. R. 9363) granting a pension to Edwin J. Godfrey; and

A bill (H. R. 9830) for the relief of Lachlan H. McIntosh.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 7547) granting the right of way to the Yankton and Missouri River Railway through the Yankton reservation in Dakota, requested a conference with the House on said bill and amendments, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. DAWES, Mr. PLATT, and Mr. JONES, of Arkansas.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8662) to accept and ratify an agreement made with the Shoshone and Bannock Indians, for the surrender and relinquishment to the United States of a portion of the Fort Hall reservation in the Territory of Idaho for the purposes of a town-site, and for the grant of a right of way through said reservation to the Utah and Northern Railway Company, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the Senate had appointed Mr. STEWART in place of Mr. SPOONER as one of the conferees on the bill (H. R. 1761) for the relief of the First National Bank of Portland, Oregon, for money advanced the Oregon Iron Works, the contractor in building the United States revenue cutter Thomas Corwin.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 2715) for the relief of certain parties who have paid $2.50 per acre for United States Government lands reduced in price to $1.25 per acre by the act of Congress approved June 15, 1880;

A bill (S. 3234) to abolish circuit court powers of certain district courts of the United States, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. 3452) for the erection of a public building at Martinsburgh, W. Va.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Several members demanded the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

PEREZ DICKINSON.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I wish to submit a privileged report, Mr. Speaker, from a conference committee.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 91) for the relief of Perez Dickinson, surviving partner of the late firm of Cowan & Dickinson, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment to the said bill.

W. J. STONE,
T. R. STOCKDALE,
J. M. BROWER,
Managers on the part of the House.

CHARLES J. FAULKNER,
GEORGE F. HOAR,
JOHN C. SPOONER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. There does not seem to be a statement accompanying this report; but if there be no objection——

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope, at least, an explanation will be made.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. This bill was passed some two weeks ago, a Senate bill, with an amendment by the House striking out the amount of the appropriation made in the Senate bill. The committee of conference, having considered the matter, concluded that if any part of the amount was due the whole was, and therefore report in favor of receding from the amendment of the House to the Senate bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 5 and 6 strike out the words "ninety-six thousand one hundred and ninety-two dollars" and insert the words "sixty-six thousand eight hundred and eighty-three dollars and fifty cents."

Mr. HOLMAN. In view of the action of the House, and assuming that all gentlemen present are familiar with the facts of the case, I shall ask a vote on the motion to concur in the report of the conference committee.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 54, noes 9.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, while there is no quorum voting yet the vote is so decidedly in favor of accepting the conference report that I will not insist on that point, although I regret exceedingly that the House eems it necessary to adopt the report.

So, no further count being demanded, the conference report was adopted

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OHIO CENTENNIAL.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, on Thursday last I entered several motions to reconsider the votes by which certain amendments were adopted to the Senate bill 3182, and I wish now to call them up and have them disposed of, because unless disposed of promptly it will be too late entirely for any appropriation that might be made to be available for the purpose of enabling the Departments of the Government to participate in the Ohio Centennial. I call up first the motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] was adopted.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. This is a privileged matter.

Mr. SAYERS. I know, but I wish to ask a question for information. If the motion to reconsider should be adopted, does the privilege attach also to the main question, and will the bill then come before the House for consideration?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the situation. The gentleman from Ohio, within the time prescribed by the rules of the House, entered a motion to reconsider the several votes by which certain amendments, three in number, were adopted. He now calls up the motion to reconsider as a matter of privilege. If the House shall reconsider the votes in question, then it will be the duty of the Chair to proceed at once to take the votes over again upon agreeing to the amendments and proceed with the bill. If the House refuses to reconsider, the bill remains where it is now as unfinished business in the class of business to which it relates.

Mr. BARNES. I hope the gentleman will not take up that motion in the absence of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE].

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I have already delayed action for two days waiting for the return of the gentleman from Virginia; but as this is a public measure and must be promptly acted upon to be of any service, I feel that I can not wait any longer, but must call it up now. In order not to delay the business of the House at all, I move the previous question upon the motion.

Mr. BARNES. I hope the gentleman will not insist on that.

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable. The previous question was ordered on the third reading of the bill. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio to reconsider the vote by which the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] was adopted.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 59, noes 17.

Mr. ABBOTT. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. ABBOTT and Mr. OUTHWAITE were appointed tellers.

The House proceeded to divide.

Before the result was announced,

Mr. ABBOTT said: I withdraw the demand for a quorum.

Mr. BARNES. I will have to renew it.

The SPEAKER. The tellers will resume their places and continue the count.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. It is evident that there is no quorum present. I do not wish to delay the business of the House, but desire to ask the Chair a parliamentary question: Whether this matter can be withdrawn at this time without losing its privileged character?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair). The Chair will state that it can be withdrawn, and will retain its present status until called up again if not acted upon now.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. That being the case, I will withdraw the subject at this time, so that the business of the House may be proceeded with.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. SAYERS. I move to dispense with the morning hour and to permit gentlemen who have reports to make to present them at the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Is it the second hour?

The SPEAKER. There is but one hour for the presentation of reports, and there is the hour for the consideration of bills. The question is on the motion dispensing with the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to.

FILING OF REPORTS.

The following reports were filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

BRIDGE ACROSS POTEAU RIVER.

Mr. CRISP, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 11107) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Fort Smith and Choctaw Bridge Company to construct a bridge across the Poteau River, in the Choctaw Nation, near Fort Smith, Ark.;" which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LOUISA SELDEN.

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 10601) granting a pension to Louisa Selden; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

GEORGE C. QUICK.

Mr. BLISS, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 10738) to increase the pension of George C. Quick; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SAYERS. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of bills.

Mr. SAYERS. Is there not a motion already pending in the House?

The SPEAKER. There was a motion, but it must be renewed, other business having intervened.

Mr. SAYERS. Then I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering appropriation bills; and pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] be permitted to make a statement.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The purpose that I had in view yesterday was perhaps not well known in the House. I have no disposition to further obstruct the business of the House. My only purpose was that the fortification bill should not be disposed of until the questions in difference between the two Houses on the Army appropriation should be settled or a report made from the conference. I have been for over a week urging the conferees in the Senate to settle the questions in difference between the two Houses in order that a report might be made to the House. My only desire was that the attitude of the members of the conference committee from the House on the Army bill might be understood and that the result of the conference might be before the House when the fortification bill should be considered. It was for that reason that I have been antagonizing action on the fortification bill until the facts and the attitude of the members of the conference committee could be understood. We failed to secure any action in the conference committee on yesterday and the day before yesterday. I have concluded to wait no longer upon the action of the conferees on the part of the Senate, and therefore I have made up my mind that it is not necessary for me to vindicate the rights of the Committee on Military Affairs or do justice to myself or the House by contesting further the right of the gentleman from Texas to call up for consideration the fortifications bill. I will state further that the matters in difference between the two Houses will be finally determined and a report will be made of the conference.

The motion to go into Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

FORTIFICATIONS BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10998) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial service, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending order is the point of order raised by the gentleman from Illinois on section 4 of this bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. When this bill was under consideration last I had made the point of order which has not yet been disposed of. Since the last discussion upon the point of order I have looked into the precedents of the House and I find that I can show by bills I hold in my hand, which have become law, that the House, in addition to other items, upon the question of jurisdiction, have, during the years 1876, 1877, 1878, and 1879, and as far back as 1864, placed in the Army appropriation bills appropriations of the nature contained in the Senate amendments to the Army bill.

Now, in the year 1864 a provision is contained in the regular Army appropriation bill for the armament of fortifications, $2,000,000. In the bill for the year 1876 the House placed on the Army bill an appropriation "for the alteration of carriages now in use in seacoast forts, $100,000." In the bill for 1877 a similar appropriation was made. In the bill for 1878 the House, on the Army bill, made an appropriation for the conversion of 10-inch smooth-bore guns into rifle guns, and for carriages, $50,000. In the bill that became law in 1879 an appropriation for conversion of smooth-bores of $50,000 was placed in the Army bill. I merely allude to these bills that have become law in past years to sustain the position I have taken heretofore upon the question, that it is in order to place these amendments on the Army appropriation bill. It was in order under the rules, where it is expressly declared all matters relating to the military establishment and the public defense, and for its support, shall be, as the language of the rule states it, "referred to the Committee on Military Affairs."

Now, acting under that rule, the Committee on Military Affairs reported the bill which has been referred to as the Tracey-Cutcheon bill.

I want to say further, that if there was no such rule as that in existence in this House, and if there were no such precedents as I have cited, the Senate has the right to place on the Army bill any amendment that in its judgment it thinks should become law, and this House has no right to question the right of the Senate to regulate their proceedings as they may deem proper.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to obstruct the consideration of this bill. I do not wish to insist further in dilatory motions. The motions that I have heretofore been making to check the consideration of this bill were made with a view that the results of the conference could be found; and therefore I wish to say that, in order to avoid any further detention of the House, but not in any way waiving the rights of the Committee on Military Affairs to act upon this amendment or any agreement to concede that the Appropriations Committee have jurisdiction in this question, I am willing to withdraw the point of order and let the House take a vote on the merits of the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being withdrawn, the Clerk will report the next section.

Mr. TURNER, of Kansas. I renew the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the point of order raised now by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TURNER] to be the same that has been raised heretofore by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND].

Mr. TURNER, of Kansas. Yes, sir. As this disagreement between two prominent committees of this House has blocked our proceedings for several days, I, for one, am in favor of having it settled.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The point made by myself is withdrawn, and I would like to know what is the point of order that is made by the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. TURNER, of Kansas. The same point of order that was made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND].

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Can the gentleman from Kansas state what the point of order was? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TURNER] having renewed the point of order, the Chair will state what he understands to be the question that was raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] and subsequently withdrawn by him. As the Chair remembers, the point was this, that the items contained in section 4 of this bill were matters which properly belonged to the Committee on Military Affairs, and were within the jurisdiction of that committee, and therefore could not be reported by the Committee on Appropriations in the fortifications bill. The same question was raised when the Army bill was under consideration, and the Chairman of the committee at that time, the present occupant of the chair, made a ruling, a portion of which he will ask the Clerk to read as expressing his views upon this question.

The Clerk read as follows:

As to the other point, there might, perhaps, be some doubt as to what bill this should be reported in. The attention of the Chair has been called by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TRACEY] and others to clause 11 of Rule XI, which provides that all legislation in reference to the military establishment and the public defense, including appropriation for its support, shall be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. The attention of the Chair has also been called to the decision of the gentleman who occupied the chair when the naval appropriation bill was under consideration at the last session of Congress. At the time the Chairman of the committee held that a proposition for the purchase of guns for the use of the Navy was an object previously provided for by law and that the appropriation was a continuation of such work. The present occupant of the chair, had he presided at that time, would doubtless have made a similar decision; but if it were now proposed to appropriate a sum of money for the armament of ships it certainly would not be contended that that was in order upon this bill, although it might be held to be necessary for the public defense. The words "the public defense," in clause 11 of Rule XI, refer to such public defense as is committed to the Army of the United States, and as clause 3 of this rule has committed the subject of fortifications to the Appropriation Committee, all provisions for public defense to be made by fortifications should go to that committee, just as all provisions for the public defense relating to the Navy should go to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The Secretary of War has transmitted to the committee certain letters, among them one from the Chief of Ordnance, to the effect that this appropriation is desired for the armament of fortifications. The Chair will take cognizance of the fact that the proper officials of the Government who have communicated this matter to Congress have stated that the appropriation is for the purpose of providing armament for fortifications, and such being its object, it should be reported in the fortifications bill as provided in clause 3 of Rule II.

For these reasons the Chair sustains the point of order as to both propositions.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to add further, in connection with this ruling, that the bill then under consideration was the Army bill, and the Chair held that the provisions referred to should be reported in the fortifications bill. They have now been reported in that bill, and the Chair is of opinion that they properly belong in the bill, as they pertain to fortifications, a subject committed expressly by the rules of the House to the Committee on Appropriations. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order raised by the gentleman from Kansas.

When this bill was last under consideration, the gentleman from New York [Mr. NUTTING] offered an amendment which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 4 the following:

"The Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to select a site and purchase the same for the erection of a dry-dock at some point on Lake Ontario, and the Secretary of War is also directed to erect on said site proper machinery, buildings, and appliances for building and repairing armed ships for the defense of the coast of the United States. Five hundred thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, with which to pay for said site, buildings, and machinery."

Mr. SAYERS. I make the point of order on that amendment that it provides for a new work not authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. NUTTING. I would like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman; but it seems very plain that the point of order is well taken, as the work to which the amendment relates is not authorized by existing law.

Mr. NUTTING. I have offered that amendment in order to bring before the Chair, and through the Chair before the Congress, and through the Congress before the people of the United States, some points which I think important, and I desire to have it understood that the statement which I make in regard to them applies as well to the point of order which has been raised as to the points which I desire to present.

I hold in my hand a clipping from a Montreal paper, which states that on the 15th day of June last a steel-constructed ship of a thousand tons burden, a steam-ship constructed in England, entered that port on her way from England with a cargo destined for the city of Chicago.

Now, Mr. Chairman, while this in itself is no startling fact, yet the result which may occur from the possibility of such a thing as that happening is very important to the country at large. It shows that England and Canada have already prepared a water way from the Atlantic Ocean to the interior of our country; that they can now load a steel ship of a thousand tons burden and sail that ship to the city of Chicago or Duluth. The means of doing this they have provided at an expenditure of more than $60,000,000 in deepening the St. Lawrence River and in building canals through the strictures between the lakes upon our northern coast.

In every instance when gentlemen on the floor of this House or writers in the newspapers have discussed the seacoast defenses of our country they have always referred to the seacoast proper—the Atlantic and the Pacific coast and the bays upon the ocean. I say now and here, Mr. Chairman, and I desire to have anybody answer it who can, that our greatest danger at this time upon our coast, if trouble should occur between us and Great Britain, is upon the coast on our northern frontier.

Last winter the Canadian Government constituted a military board with a general at its head—General Middleton—who had the power by resolution passed in their Parliament to examine the northern coast along the lakes and see where it was necessary to build fortifications and prepare for the defense of the country. Under that authority that military committee has been acting from that time until the present.

I know it is said, Mr. Chairman, and I have heard it said on this side of the House, that there is no danger of war with England, and I hope to God the statement is true. But you know and I know that less than two years ago Mr. Cramer, a member of the British Parliament, came to this country with one of his colleagues and they held meetings here in favor of settling by arbitration, instead of war, the difficulties between nations. They held a meeting in the city of New York, and the present mayor of that city was chairman of such meeting. They held a meeting also in Philadelphia. I hope, sir, the time will come when arbitration will be the means resorted to for the purpose of settling difficulties between nations, as that method has for hundreds of years been pursued between individuals. But I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that time has not come yet, and the way to have it come and come successfully is for every nation on the face of the earth that has any standing as a nation to be so prepared, so that if arbitration should not successfully settle difficulties the nation will be able to settle them by force to its own satisfaction.

What was the result of this movement on the part of this member of Parliament, Mr. Cramer? He went back to England; and not later than last winter he presented this whole question to the Parliament of England, and asked a vote upon it. What was the result? In the English Parliament, when the question of having a committee appointed to ask the association of other nations to form a rule upon which arbitration could take place between nations, the vote was 224 in favor and 44 against war as a means to be still pursued in settling the international difficulties of England if she should have any. Now, I say this is a notice to our nation and to every nation on the face of the globe that England still persists in the idea that she will control, or try to control, the world by force in her ancient arrogant way.

Now what has been done since? I have offered here a resolution looking to the building of a dry-dock upon Lake Ontario so that we may, if necessary, build vessels there in time of war for national defense. Why, sir, not one month ago the Canadian Government—not any portion of the Canadian Government, but the Canadian Government itself—ordered the building of a dry-dock at Kingston, upon Lake Ontario, for the purpose of constructing vessels of war if necessary in time of difficulty. What does that mean? It is said we are to have no war with England or Canada; yet almost within cannon-shot of our shores, England or a dependency of England at Kingston, is building a dry-dock for the purpose of building war vessels for the defense of the colony of Canada. There is another notice, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, that while it may not be necessary for us to have a dry-dock or ships or any other preparation for war with England, while we may possibly in the future settle all difficulties by arbitration, still it is a notice that as a wise people we should prepare ourselves for possible difficulty in the future.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Does the gentleman remember the precise proposition upon which the British Parliament voted in reference to arbitration? I understand it was not upon an abstract proposition that it was well to refer differences between nations to arbitration, but the vote was on some special and distinct proposition——

Mr. NUTTING. The proposition was this: A resolution was offered for the formation of a committee who should devise ways and means for the purpose of creating a sentiment and formulating and adopting an arrangement by which arbitration might be resorted to as a settlement of difficulties between nations; and that was voted down, as I have stated.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I think it is fair to say to my friend that the vote was not in opposition to arbitration itself, but to a particular method.

Mr. NUTTING. Our only protection and our only means of protection now is by an appeal to arbitration. I hope and believe the time will come when nations will be wise enough and good enough, when men will be wise enough and good enough so that difficulties between one country and another can and will be settled by means of arbitration. What I argue here and now is that that time has not yet come. In other words, that it is not a wise and safe policy on the part of a nation like ours, with thousands of miles of defenseless seacoast and thousands of miles of lake coasts, to rely altogether upon arbitration for the settlement of our difficulties with other nations.

There is another thing I desire to call the attention of the House to. You may take Lake Ontario, which has more than 6,500 square miles of water that is navigable for the largest ocean steamers, and you can not take an American vessel from that Lake Ontario to the upper lake without passing through the waters and humiliating the American flag to the English colors which fly from the Canadian soil. You have to pass through the Welland Canal, a Canadian water entirely, between Lake Erie and Lake Ontario. You have to pass through a canal 30 miles in length which has cost the English Government more than $50,000,000. Every vessel for commercial purposes is obliged, when it goes eastward or westward over these 6,500 miles of navigable waters of Lake Ontario, to take down its flag and pass through Welland Canal, the water gateway of Canada, a dependency of the English Government.

Why, sir, last year a thousand and thirty of our vessels did this same thing in going east or west, loaded or unloaded—they had to pay toll to the English Government for the right to pass through that canal, while all the Canadian vessels passed through the canal free, notwithstanding the twenty-seventh article of the treaty of 1818 provides we may use this canal upon the same terms as Canadian vessels. I believe in order to avoid national difficulty it is our duty to agitate this question and to look into it at this time. I say there is discrimination after discrimination, unfairness after unfairness on the part of the Canadian authorities, act after act on the part of the Canadian Government or on the part of the English Government which may justly cause anxiety unless we are fully prepared for difficulty in the future with that nation, unless we so prepare to defend ourselves as that defense will not be necessary.

One thing further. This steel vessel to which I have referred can proceed all the way to Chicago. It is a vessel laden now with the commerce of the country. It would be easy to load it with arms necessary for the defense of Canada or with a view to the destruction of our country. By treaty we are allowed to keep only one vessel of 100 tons burden upon Lake Ontario for the defense of the country. But if the English and Canadian authorities violate the fisheries treaty, if they violate the treaty in the use of the Welland Canal, discriminating against our vessels engaged in commerce and in favor of their own, if they violate every treaty in every instance, why should we stand idle and allow our coast to remain defenseless? Under such circumstances it is our bounden duty to remain no longer unprepared for the most serious consequences in the future.

I simply here and now, Mr. Chairman, desire to give notice in the Congress of the United States, if difficulties shall hereafter arise my voice has been raised in time so that opportunity is afforded to furnish ample protection to the American people, not only upon the seacoast, but upon our northern border.

What do we find on the Pacific coast? There is now a railroad under the control of the Canadian and English Governments which crosses the continent from the Atlantic to the Pacific, so that the largest and most improved ordnance can be transported, and has been transported, over it and planted within sight of our own borders at Vancouver's Island. That island ought to have been included within our limits under the treaty upon the question of boundary, but the boundary line between the Dominion of Canada and the United States was deflected so as to leave it outside of our limits and place it within English control. There on Vancouver's Island is the best defense of the Pacific coast; there within sight of the American soil the very best cannon which can be constructed by England can be placed, and there they are placed, and pointed toward American soil. And forsooth we are told we should do nothing in preparation for the future, but rely entirely for our protection upon arbitration for the adjustment of any difficulty which may arise between this country and England.

In my judgment the time has come when preparations should be made for the defense of our seacoast, for the protection of our northern border or lake coast, and for the protection of the Pacific coast.

I have but little more to say. Last winter the English Government appropriated $1,500,000 for the purpose of deepening the St. Lawrence River and for the improvement of the Welland and other canals—for the deepening and improvement of the Welland Canal, which connects Lake Ontario with Lake Erie. It appropriated $900,000 for the purpose of making a canal on the Canadian side of the Sault Ste. Marie River, so that she could pass independent of us into the waters of Lake Superior from the lower lakes.

We have a canal on this side of the Sault Ste. Marie River, and by treaty she is authorized to pass her vessels through it from Lake Huron to Lake Superior; but when the resolutions introduced in this House by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] and myself looking to the idea that we are to retaliate if she does not stop discriminating against our commerce, she at once puts her people to work, and is to-day making the grandest preparations for the building of her own Sault Ste. Marie Canal. Now, this is a notice to us, notwithstanding the fact that we have sixty millions of people and sixty billions in wealth. It is a notice to us that Canada, a dependency of England, is preparing her own water way from the Atlantic to Duluth, and has already a railway from Duluth to the Pacific Ocean, while upon the Pacific Ocean she has her splendid works, one of the grandest and strongest fortifications in this country, at Vancouver's Island. In fact, our whole Pacific coast is defenseless, as well as our northern coast. Is it not time to take steps to remedy the danger?

Why, sir, talk about arbitration? It is all right, and it is the grandest principle in international complications imaginable; but I read in my paper from my own town of Oswego the other day a little item which I have here at my desk, giving as a matter of news the finding of a cannon-ball weighing 35 pounds which was taken up out of the garden of a man who lived half a mile from the lake shore while making an excavation for the erection of a building. This old ball was found and upon it a date, "1812," with these words:

The last argument of kings.

That was a cannon-ball fired by this nation which is now for "arbitration," and fired upon my own city in the year 1812. It is not late enough for us, Mr. Chairman, in our dealings with England and in our dealings with Canada, to rely upon arbitration as our sole means of defense in the settlement of difficulties that may arise.

Now, sir, I thank the House, and I thank you, Mr. Chairman, for your courtesy, because it has been mere courtesy accorded to me in listening to these remarks under the circumstances. I leave the question to the action of Congress. You may make your points of order if you will, gentlemen, against the building up of a place for the erection and repair of war vessels on Lake Ontario; you may resist all steps that may be taken in that direction, and may rest idle, if you will, and yet I tell you in view of the defenseless condition of our Pacific coast, when the British Government has planted such an establishment as they have erected on Vancouver's Island, in view of the defenseless condition of our Atlantic coast and the lake coasts, that the RECORD will show at least one man who in his way has called the attention of the American Congress and the American people to the fact that we as a great nation owe it to ourselves, owe it to the future and to the priceless boon of free government, the best form of government that the world has ever seen, a form of government on which all nations look with jealousy at the present time—that we owe it to all that we hold dear that we shall stand up for arbitration whenever arbitration can be made effective, but at the same time that we shall be backed up by such resolute means of defense and of offense as will make our idea of arbitration of some value to ourselves and to the rest of the world. [Applause.]

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words.

Mr. WEAVER. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. And wish that in the discretion of the Chair he could decide the amendment in order.

Mr. WEAVER. If the question of order has not been decided, I hope the Chair will confine discussion to the pending question.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I will, as far as I can, confine myself to the point of order.

I was going on to say that I hoped in the discretion of the Chair he could rule that this amendment was in order.

Mr. HITT. Will the gentleman yield to permit the amendment to be again reported?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

The amendment of Mr. NUTTING was again read.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, do I understand that the point of order has not been decided?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decided the question of order; but at the request of the gentleman from New York withheld the decision to permit him to present some remarks on the question. The Chair is ready to decide it.

Mr. DOCKERY. Then the debate is proceeding by unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. Entirely so.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I only want two minutes.

Mr. SAYERS. Very well.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is most excellent and it would be a good thing if the House could vote this appropriation into the bill.

But, sir, my attention is attracted to it the more because of this fact: The gentleman from New York [Mr. NUTTING] has stated how much the British Government has possession of the water ways on our northern frontiers; so that I think he said by water ways she can come in through the lakes and all the way up to the city of Duluth. From there they have railroad communication with the Pacific coast. But my purpose now is to call the attention of the House and the committee to what occurred in a debate in the Senate, on the 3d day of the present month, relative to certain railroad purchases that were about to be made by the Canadian Pacific Railroad, to bring these Canada lines into greater competition, but more favorable to them, with the trunk-lines on this side of the line in regard to railroad traffic and transportation.

Here we have it with steam-boat or water way transportation routes to Duluth, and beyond Duluth railroad transportation routes to the Pacific coast, and this is connected with the Pacific Railroad, which is now endeavoring to purchase railroads in Minnesota, railroads reaching to Manitoba, so that they can have the carriage almost entirely of freight from the Pacific coast to the Atlantic seaboard. I was utterly amazed at the statement of the gentleman from New York, and I simply wanted to say that in a few days, perhaps in a day or two, we may have before this House a very important bill that has passed the Senate—a bill to amend the interstate-commerce law; and I hope I may have an opportunity to offer an amendment to that bill to see whether we can not bring that Canada Pacific Railroad and other railroads running through Canada towards the Pacific in some degree under the provisions of the interstate-commerce law, so that our own trunk-lines may have at least the same rights and privileges and the same ease in carrying freight from the Pacific to the seaboard coast as the Canada Pacific Railroad, which not only carries freight from the Pacific within the borders of Canada, but which actually carries freight between points in the United States and to the Atlantic seaboard. I am glad that question has arisen here, and I would merely ask the attention of the members of the committee to the debate which occurred in the Senate on the 3d day of August upon this very question.

Why, sir, arbitration will do. The people I represent, or many of them, are in favor of a commission to arbitrate, and there is a bill before us now and many memorials have been presented in favor of it. Arbitration is very well, and I approve of it, especially as we have sixty millions of arbitrators behind any agreement that might be made by any commission appointed to arbitrate points of difference between our country and Great Britain. I said I hoped the Chairman might be able to rule this amendment in order. I think we should have a dry-dock on Lake Ontario with all the appliances necessary to make it perfect, and I am not surprised that the gentleman from New York has offered an amendment for that purpose.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Has this point of order been decided; and if not, may I be permitted to make a few remarks?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was about to decide; or was about to indicate the position of the Chair on the point of order. The gentleman from New York has already addressed the Chair.

Mr. FARQUHAR. If I thought any proposition of this character would be seriously considered by the House I should desire to be heard at length; but as it stands, I want to say simply one word. That is, that the State of New York can take a contract to take care of Canada and its five millions inside of sixty days. There are 245,000 soldiers ready to march at the tap of the drum, and a country which has passed through war, and where there yet live a million of men who are veterans who wore the blue and the gray, asks no odds of Canada or of the parent government.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, in the interests of peace, I hope that the New York delegation in this House will take a contract to bring the Canadian Pacific Railroad under the provisions of the interstate-commerce law. [Laughter.]

Mr. SAYERS. All of these remarks, I understand, are not to the point of order, and are proceeding under unanimous consent. Now, I would like to know from the gentlemen opposite how long they desire to debate this question.

Mr. NELSON. I would like to have a few moments to reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL].

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Minnesota will be heard for five minutes.

Mr. NELSON. I want more than five minutes or nothing at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks all this discussion is out of order and that we should proceed with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. NELSON. If I can be recognized I will give way to Mr. LAIRD for a few minutes.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] be permitted to address the committee for fifteen minutes.

Mr. LAIRD. I understand the gentleman from Minnesota to give way to me. The gentleman gives me five minutes. I ask this because I have to leave the House; and I desire an opportunity to make a few remarks on this question.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD] be allowed five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection; and after the gentleman from Nebraska shall have concluded his remarks the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Minnesota, who is to be permitted to address the committee for ten minutes.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to have fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman desires, if there be no objection, to be permitted to address the committee fifteen minutes.

Mr. DOCKERY. That was the period for which I asked unanimous consent for the gentleman from Minnesota.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that this is not a debate on the point of order; but the Chair will announce that he sustains the point of order and allow the debate to continue as by unanimous consent.

Mr. LAIRD. Mr. Chairman, the bill presented by the Appropriations Committee carries on its face $6,000,000. It provides, as is suggested in the report, for an expenditure, in certain contingencies, of nearly $19,000,000. I suppose no confidence is violated in saying to the House that the conferees of the House and of the Senate have agreed, practically at least, and I think entirely, upon the amendments made by the Senate to the House Army bill. So far as the expenditure of public money for armament is concerned, the bill as agreed upon by the conference will carry less than $5,000,000. The item which challenged discussion the other day of $5,000,000 for the expenditure for rough steel castings has been agreed to be reduced from five millions to three millions and a half, which it is supposed will meet the measure of preparation that is advisable, and also the desired measure of economy by permitting contractors to come in under the provision that they shall accompany their proposals to furnish the steel with the erection of a plant, and thus give us the benefit of competition in the furnishing of the material carrying the bulk of the cost.

I submit that the bill offered by the gentlemen of the Committee on Appropriations is defective, while no doubt it is intended to be economical. It is defective in this: On the four-million proposition of the Navy Department for the furnishing of rough steel castings for guns it is conceded that the Bethlehem Works were put to an outlay of about a million and a half of dollars for the plant, and that if the expenditure for steel had stopped at the four millions they would have pocketed a net loss of the value of the plant upon their contracts with the Government. I submit that the result of the adoption of the bill presented here, as between it and the same proposition carried in the Army bill, will be to exclude competition and to deliver this business over into the hands of manufacturers who already have the plant for furnishing the gun-steel that is required. It is good for the country, first, that the Government should have a check upon the avarice of manufacturers, and, in the second place, that it should have the advantage of competition.

It can hold in its hands a check upon the manufacturers at large only by the possession of a gun-plant, which is provided for in the Army bill, or in the Senate amendments to the Army bill; but it is not provided for in this bill. It can have the benefit of the check afforded by the competition of one manufacturer with another only by offering such a sum of money for rough steel castings as will bring into the field of competition more than one manufacturer, and your million and a half dollars will not do that.

Mr. RYAN. How many bidders were there upon the Navy Department proposals for steel?

Mr. LAIRD. There was one, at any rate.

Mr. RYAN. I think there were at least three, all large establishments.

Mr. LAIRD. There were three, but what was the result? I am not debating here for the advantage. I want this result, and so I suppose does the gentleman. I want it, and I believe it can be best accomplished in the way provided in the Army bill; and to be perfectly frank, I believe that the result of this measure will be the defeat of all legislation on this subject.

It is agreed by men who know, and who speak upon their honor, that the Bethlehem Works which got the contract from the Navy Department, had there not been in the future a continuous expenditure of money for the purchase of rough steel, would have pocketed a loss on that four-million transaction of over $2,000,000. So, I say, this proposition hands the matter over without a word of limitation to some of the steel establishments now existing, probably the Bethlehem Works, and excludes the cheek upon the avarice of manufacturers that would be furnished by competition.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Before my friend discusses the map——

Mr. LAIRD. I have said all I want to say.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I ask my friend from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] to let me say a word in reply to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD], and then I will yield to my friend from Minnesota, who, I know, is going to discuss another matter.

Mr. NELSON. I want to reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL]. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. This House must be astonished at the declaration which the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD] has just made, that the Military Committee has been especially anxious and earnest to provide for competition. If there is any one thing that we understood they steadfastly fought, it was the provision in the appropriation bill reported by the Fortifications Committee, or prepared by that committee, which provided for competition. As we tried to throw open the door for that kind of competition which in this country and everywhere else has been productive of good results, they braced themselves against it; and if it be true, as my friend suggests, that they now recognize the transcendent importance of competition in every field of production, we are exceedingly gratified. But my friend is clearly in error in saying that we have not provided for a plant. The exact contrary of that is true. And now I want to say once for all to the House and the country, that it is something more than a mere lack of amiability which induces gentlemen to persist in asserting that we have opposed the production of guns and have opposed providing for a plant equal to any supposed emergency.

The truth is—and I want to say it to the House and repeat it again and again to the country—that the Ordnance Corps decided for itself, and wrote in the bill what it wanted; and the provisions of the pending bill are in direct response to the demands of that bureau. Then the man who says we have not done so either labors in ignorance of the fact or is struggling under a pressure of moral obliquity.

Another thing: Do they require a plant by means of which the Government can assemble guns and complete them? Certainly; and we have recognized that demand. They wrote with their own hands what they required; and we gave them the last poor scruple that they asked; we gave it to them without scruple. Yet it is asserted here over and over again that we have refused to permit the Ordnance Corps to establish a plant and build guns for the Government; and it is intimated here that we hampered them about getting machinery and tools needful in the matter of producing guns. That asseveration is made either in ignorance or in disregard of the exact facts. There again they wrote what they wanted; and we did not curtail their demands to the extent of one ounce of steel or one farthing in money.

What do the critics on this floor complain of? Why, that instead of appropriating $1,500,000 for the Government, we do not appropriate $5,000,000. We have provided money to keep the Ordnance Bureau at work to the top bent of their ability for five or six years. We have met every demand and provided for every need, and we have done it in the exercise of the rightful jurisdiction conferred upon the committee by this House.

Now, there is one other matter to which I wish to call attention. I am aware that this House had its attention called to it before, but my apology for again adverting to the subject is we get exceedingly tired of this asseveration and iteration and reiteration—"damnable iteration," some one might say—that the committee having charge of the fortification bill has abridged the proper opportunities of the Ordnance Department of this Government to provide for coast defense. When the Ordnance Corps have with their own hands traced what they require, and formulated the provisions of law they desire to have enacted, shall we be told that we have either hesitated or stopped short of meeting the public requirements?

In only one thing have we offended, if that be an offense, and that is, we have provided that if the proprietors of the steel plants and the iron plants or other manufacturers of this country, under the inspiration of enterprise and genius, quickened by the desire for profit, which, after all, lies at the base of all business endeavor, shall come to the Government and offer a gun which is better than that fabricated by the Ordnance Corps, if these private manufacturers shall meet in well-rounded measure all that is demanded by the public, we shall buy of those men, thus meeting the public needs, providing for the coast defenses more speedily, while at the same time, as every other nation does, encouraging a great industry and private enterprise.

I was asked the other day on this floor, what nation does that? What nation does it! Every nation in Europe does it. Each one, possibly, has a plant of its own; but England buys of private manufacturers and encourages them; France buys of private manufacturers and encourages them; Germany buys of private manufacturers and encourages them; Russia does the same; Austria and Italy do the same. Our young Republic stands conspicuously alone—officer-ridden and afraid to go out among the people of the country and invite them to bring to the Government what it needs to defend its coast; and though we have given to the officers of this Government every opportunity that they have asked, we are denounced as unfriendly and illiberal because we have opened a wider door to supply our wants and have called into requisition a larger means of meeting the needs of the Government in the matter of coast defenses. Am I wrong?

Another thing we did, and one which is the subject of adverse criticism from certain quarters. We are told that there are in this Republic only a half dozen men competent to determine as between two guns whether the one or the other is the better. If that is so, what a deplorable condition we are in. Why, sir, if that is so, and war should break out between England and our country, or France and our country, and our foreign enemy should hire a half dozen assassins to destroy those few men, we would be defenseless indeed—all the available genius and resources of the public absolutely wiped out as with a sponge. Yet that contemptible announcement has been made here over and over again.

There is not a State in this Union, from the one that you can cover with a postage-stamp on the map up to the largest, that can not produce men who are as competent to judge of the character of metal, the range, accuracy, and endurance of a gun and all the characteristics needful in it as any gentleman within the corporate limits of Washington. But we do not propose to dispense with the ability and wisdom of these valuable officers. They will sit in judgment on both their own and others' guns, but not alone. All we ask is that when they come to judge as between a gun fabricated at the works of my honorable friend on my right [Mr. DALZELL] and one fabricated under the immediate direction of those officers (who are prejudiced, to say the least, in their own favor, although they are good men and I say nothing against them) that there shall be on the board that is to make the decision at least two impartial judges selected by the President of the United States or by the Secretary of War. They may be selected from the Army or the Navy, or from civilian engineers. Only let them not be competitors, sitting as sole judges in their own cause.

What is there unjust about that? What is there wrong about it? If there is anything wrong, in what does the wrong consist? The cry that we propose a new bureau is not only untrue, but foolish, if not something worse.

Why do we do this? Coming from every department of manufacture where guns are or may be fabricated, from the fabricators of steel and of iron, from the manufacturers of guns where these great plants are, there is a demand that such provision be made as a just and reasonable requirement; and to meet that fair demand we propose to create this board. That it is reasonable is sure, that it is a just provision is certain. It has at the base plain business sense and the love of fair play.

I have here—I will not detain the House to read it—the course pursued by countries across the water in the matter of procuring their guns. There individual enterprise and genius are left free to compete for the opportunity to provide the best. This is the only nation in which the whole subject is relegated to a few officers in a single bureau of the Government who are at once the Alpha and Omega, whose findings are not subject to review, and from whose judgment there is no appeal.

Strangely enough, in the United States alone does this anomalous condition of things exist. Mark you, we have not sought to check the patriotic efforts of this bureau in the important matter of the public defense, but permit that bureau to retain the control, opening the Treasury to them to take what they need; authorizing them to manufacture the kind and type of ordnance they choose; giving them just the plant they ask for; but for enlarging the field of resources from which they may draw, we have been subjected to this criticism. Because purchases from private manufacturers are authorized, when in the judgment of the officers of the Ordnance Corps and other competent judges the guns offered are the very best in the market, we are criticised and denounced.

That is not all; by some sort of "now you see it, and now you don't" between the committee of the House and the committee of the Senate, in order to avoid the just provisions of the fortification bill to which I have called attention, the military bill comes back from the Senate with provisions which, if adopted, would, it is supposed, oust the jurisdiction of the Appropriation Committee of this House from all control of the subject-matter in controversy. It is fair to say the Military Committee has been too honorable to cross the line which marks its jurisdiction in the preparation of the bill. But the Senate has assumed to confer jurisdiction upon the Military Committee of the House, which the rules of this body deny to it, and the committee meekly proceeds to exercise the jurisdiction so conferred, and has made some progress in its exercise.

I am informed, however, there was some hesitation in allowing these amendments to be attached to that bill when the House had conferred no such jurisdiction over the subject upon the House Committee. And we may well feel and express surprise that the business of the nation is brought to a standstill to afford one committee of this House an opportunity to ravish another of the rightful jurisdiction conferred upon it by the rules provided for the regulation and control of our legislative proceedings; and because we undertake to defend ourselves against this unjust assault and seek to maintain the right and dignity of the House, as well as the dignity of the committee, we are met by filibustering to impede and in fact stop the progress of the business of the House.

We stand here, Mr. Chairman, for the protection of the rights and privileges of the House of Representatives in a matter wherein the Senate attempts to transgress our rules and confer jurisdiction upon one committee which belongs to another. In our Federal system this House of Representatives is the only branch which is elective. Standing here for the maintenance of the rights and privileges of the House, I assert I have the same feeling toward the House that surrenders its privileges, that is regardless of its rights and true dignity, that I have for the father who refuses to protect or defend the virtue and honor of his household.

In the first place, it is admitted that this House has, under the authority of the Constitution, formulated rules for the conduct of its business and designated the committees to have charge of the several appropriation bills; and, secondly, after having formulated those rules it is our duty to maintain them inviolate and inviolable against the Senate, and also against members of the House, if any member or members shall seek to disregard them.

I did not expect to occupy a single moment, but I felt I would be derelict to my duty if I stood here and without protest permitted the Senate by indirection or by direction to violate any one of the privileges of this body.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is not simply the jurisdiction of the committee we are defending, it is the dignity of the House.

Now, I do not care to go further with this subject. I seek not to trespass on the jurisdiction of our friends, nor do I care whether the items in controversy appear in one bill or the other, so that they appear in conformity with the reasonable and just requirements of the rules of the House, and so they be not placed there by a co-ordinate branch of the legislative department of the Government acting in conscious and willful disregard of our rules, formulated not to suit the whims or caprices of any man or set of men, but with a view to the orderly and just dispatch of the public business.

Mr. Chairman, we believe we have in the pending bill met every reasonable requirement of the public service; we have kept the faith with the House, and have not sought to trespass upon the jurisdiction of any other committee.

But let me state one thing that I had forgotten. Complaint has been made that we did not bring this bill in earlier. It has been ready, as gentlemen know who have taken any pains to look into the subject, for quite awhile, but it was not reported to the House sooner for the reason that Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL was absent, sick. He desired to be here when the bill was brought in, but he has been sick, as the House knows, nigh unto death, and we delayed by reason of his indisposition——

Mr. MAISH. Will the gentleman permit a question just there?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. MAISH. The gentleman says this bill has been prepared for quite awhile. I ask him how long it has been prepared?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. In its general features it was prepared for quite two months before it was reported to the House, and it was a mere matter of putting the provisions into proper shape. As gentlemen know, this bill usually passes through the House in an hour or two.

Now, it was not to delay action upon the bill that it was not reported sooner, because to suggest that we do not desire to provide for the public defense would be to call in question our patriotism, and I do not believe that gentlemen will do that. At all events, the bill is here now, it meets the public requirements, and it is a question whether the House will stand on its dignity or insult its own committee for conforming to the rules of the House in the discharge of duty.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the gentleman from Ohio——

Mr. SAYERS. I believe the gentleman from Minnesota is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Permit me to answer one or two suggestions of the gentleman from Ohio, with the consent of the gentleman from Minnesota, before he proceeds.

Mr. NELSON. If I can be recognized afterwards.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent, then, that the gentleman from Illinois may now proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent was given that the gentleman from Minnesota should have an opportunity of addressing the committee.

Mr. SAYERS. With the understanding that he may proceed after the gentleman from Illinois concludes. I hope there will be no objection to allowing the gentleman from Illinois to proceed now.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

Mr. SAYERS. How much time does the gentleman from Illinois desire?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I should like to have fifteen minutes, though I may not occupy that much time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio occupied fifteen minutes. Is there objection to the gentleman from Illinois proceeding for the same length of time?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe I should have taken the floor to say anything on the pending proposition did I not feel that justice demands that some notice should be taken of the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH]. I think, sir, I may be permitted to say that it is unworthy of that gentleman to cast reflections upon any Senator who may have been on this floor on yesterday or to-day. I can say to him that so far as my action was concerned on yesterday, it was neither dictated nor suggested by any Senator or any member on this floor. I had no consultation with any one in reference to that question, as to the propriety of my action, or whether I should take the course I did or not. Therefore I say to the gentleman that I feel perfectly warranted, as I was the principal actor in the proceedings of yesterday, in saying that his statement is without any foundation whatever; and it is unworthy of him to stand here and traduce gentlemen who have not an opportunity of replying to him.

And I believe, sir, that the generous nature of the gentleman from Ohio himself will cause him, before this discussion ends, to take the floor and do justice to the Senators who happened to be in this Chamber at the time to which he refers by withdrawing his remarks.

My action on yesterday, as I have already stated to the House, was fixed by but one consideration, and that was that the conferees appointed by the House upon the Army appropriation bill should have an opportunity to present their report to the House and defend their attitude with reference to the amendments of the Senate before the fortifications bill was taken up for consideration. I had been importuning the Senate conferees to meet and determine the differences between the two Houses, but failed to secure a conclusion in that regard. On the day before yesterday, at the very moment we were going into conference, this bill was brought up here and we were deprived of the opportunity. On yesterday the conference was again broken up by this bill; and I felt then, as I feel now, that it was my duty to delay the action on this bill until the conferees appointed by the House should settle the questions in dispute between the two Houses. The action I took yesterday accomplished all I desired to accomplish, for that action enabled the two Houses to come together and settle the questions in dispute, and that report will soon be before the House.

Now, sir, a word or two further. The gentleman from Ohio is always brilliant in his speeches, but very often fails to be accurate. The other day he endeavored to prejudice the minds of the House in favor of the Committee on Appropriations and its jurisdiction by claiming that for sixty years the Committee on Appropriations had control of the question pending. Why, if the gentleman had been as well informed as he ought to be in reference to his committee he would know that the Committee on Appropriations was not even sixty years old, but that it was created in 1864, I believe, on the motion of my friend from New York [Mr. COX], who sits in front of me.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. If my friend will not deem it an interruption, I would state to him that the Ways and Means Committee had that before.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Yes.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. And the work was apportioned out.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. My friend will have to correct himself again before he settles all the inaccuracies that he has been guilty of. Now, the gentleman insisted that the House had never placed upon the Army appropriation bill appropriations for subjects of this kind. I read from my desk this morning appropriation bills for seven different years, I think, was the number, in which appropriations for the same identical purpose are found that are found in this fortification bill.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Certainly.

Mr. SAYERS. If that be the case, why did he not put the provisions contained in the Senate amendments upon the Army bill in the first instance, instead of reporting the separate bill which is now on the Calendar?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will answer the gentleman by stating that this amendment was not put upon the bill for the reason that we had already prepared and reported to this House the Tracey-Cutcheon bill embracing every one of these features. There was an opinion felt and expressed that early action could be had on this question, and the bill was prepared. It was prepared in the winter and reported long before we prepared the Army bill.

Mr. SAYERS. Let me ask the gentleman another question, and that is, was the reason that he did not have these amendments put upon the Army bill because he desired early action upon the bill known as the Cutcheon bill?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am speaking for the committee, because I was not present when the bill was reported.

Mr. SAYERS. Very well; does not the gentleman know that he could get earlier action by putting his provision upon the Army bill than by putting it in this bill that is now on the Calendar and may never be reached?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will say to my friend that we all differed very much as to which was the wisest as well as which was the best way to secure quick action upon the bill. It was prepared in the winter, it was reported before the Army bill was prepared, and it was believed and expected that early action could be had upon it; but it was crowded out by the tariff bill.

Mr. SAYERS. Then why did not the gentleman call up that bill which was so important and in which these provisions were embraced and pass it in preference to his Army bill?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. One reason I can assign for it is that the bill was in charge of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON], who has been sick at times. Another was because the tariff bill was under consideration, and we could not get time to discuss the Cutcheon bill. But I am diverted from what I desired to say. I want to call the attention of the House now to the real character of this bill; and I would ask, Mr. Chairman, how much time I have left?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. OUTHWAITE.) The gentleman has seven minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I want every member to know what he is voting upon. We all know how difficult it is for members to read all the reports and bills. There are members of this House who are ignorant on this subject and who believe it is a more economical measure than the amendments placed on the Senate bill.

There are gentlemen here who do not know what these Senate amendments amount to. This bill involves an appropriation of nearly $20,000,000. The Senate amendments do not amount to seven millions and a half, and in conference this has been cut down some two or three million dollars and will be less than $5,000,000. Now you are going to be called upon to draw upon the Treasury for an expenditure of nearly $20,000,000 by this bill, and the question is, whether you will sanction that or the action of the conference committee, under which the expenditure will not exceed about $5,000,000. I do not state the exact figures. Now, what is the language upon this question in the report which accompanies this bill? It says:

> The accompanying bill appropriates $6,202,670, and if the provisions of section 6 of the bill result in the procurement for the Government of the guns, mortars, and carriages therein described, a further appropriation will be necessary of not exceeding, in the aggregate, $13,215,438, and in sums of not more than $2,500,000 in any one fiscal year.

Some gentleman here say they will not vote for these Senate amendments because they are extravagant. But taking it altogether, this bill will involve an expenditure of about $20,000,000. What further does this bill do, sir? If this bill is adopted there will be but one steel manufacturer in this country that will get the appropriation. There will be no competition.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Will my friend permit me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If you will give me more time, I will.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I will give you an eternity of time.

Mr. HOOKER (to Mr. BUTTERWORTH). You will divide eternity of time between you.

Mr. SAYERS. You have said that this bill appropriates $20,000,000.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I say it involves an expenditure of between nineteen and twenty million dollars.

Mr. SAYERS. Do you not know that this bill specially provides that not more than $2,500,000 shall be expended in any one year during thirteen years? If you do not, then I commend you to a study of this bill before you begin to discuss it and inform the ignorant members of the House upon it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am aware that the gentleman has provided that the money shall be expended at the rate of two millions and a half a year; but the gentleman himself will confess, and I ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] to state whether or not this bill, if adopted as it stands now, does not involve between nineteen and twenty million dollars?

Mr. SAYERS. I say that it may not involve the appropriation of one dollar over $3,725,000; for this reason, because under the sixth section it is proposed to give to the private industries of this country an opportunity to manufacture guns, and that if these guns do not comply with the highest test, then that the Government shall not expend one dollar upon them. If they fail to manufacture proper guns, then it is at their own risk, at their own cost, and the Government is not out one dollar.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Now, I have given the gentleman full opportunity in my time to make his explanation, and I hope he will be as liberal with me when my time expires, so that I may have a chance to finish what I want to say.

Mr. SAYERS. I will give the gentleman all the time he wants.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] says that this bill involves an appropriation of not over three millions and a half of dollars. Do I understand him correctly?

Mr. SAYERS. Three million seven hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars is the actual expenditure provided for, exclusive of $20,000 additional for this board.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have given the gentleman full opportunity to make his explanation, and now I will condemn him from his own record. I will read from the report which the gentleman brought into this House when he reported this bill:

> The accompanying bill [the fortifications bill] appropriates $6,202,670, and if the provisions of section 6 of the bill result in the procurement for the Government of the guns, mortars, and carriages therein described, a further appropriation will be necessary of not exceeding in the aggregate $13,215,000.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is not stating what is in the bill. I state that the actual appropriation in the bill is $3,725,000, with $20,000 in addition to that; but if these manufacturers shall provide guns equal to the very best in the world of their caliber, guns which will be acceptable to the board, then the additional $2,275,000 may be available; otherwise it will not be.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] be allowed to proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. SAYERS. In further reply to the gentleman I wish this committee to thoroughly understand that unless these guns are manufactured and are of such quality as to stand the highest tests known to the ordnance officers of this Government, the Treasury of the United States will not incur the expenditure of one dollar.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I have the highest respect and the warmest personal regard for the gentleman from Texas, and I do not believe he would make any misstatement intentionally. I do, however, insist that, just as he has stated in his report, this bill if adopted may involve an appropriation in the aggregate of between twenty and thirty millions of dollars. And right on this point let me call attention to the danger of passing this bill. If this bill goes to the Senate, and the Senate abandons its amendment on the Army appropriation bill or the House forces it to abandon it, what will the Senate do? Already a Senator has introduced into that body a bill which carries an appropriation of $38,000,000, and there is another bill pending there which makes an appropriation of $126,000,000 for the purposes contemplated in this bill. Now, if you send this bill to the Senate you put it in the power of that body to substitute either of those two bills, and if the one appropriating $126,000,000 should finally become law it would be unnecessary to urge the revision of the tariff in order to reduce the surplus, because that bill alone would take care of the surplus.

As a matter of economy, I insist that the House will save money by taking the Senate at its word and limiting the appropriation to less than $5,000,000. If you want to economize, as it has been insisted by some gentlemen here should be done, by defeating the Senate amendment, why should you, in defeating an appropriation of only $5,000,000, forward a bill to the Senate which involves an appropriation of nearly $20,000,000 for the same purpose? Those who vote for this bill and vote down the Senate amendments upon the House bill, will vote to substitute an expenditure of $20,000,000 for an expenditure of less than $5,000,000.

And let me call attention to the character of this bill in another respect. In the third section of the bill we appropriate over $400,000 for what purpose? To test and to finish guns which the War Department declares have already been superseded.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, does not the gentleman know—and if he does not know he ought not to assume to talk about this matter—that the War Department has sent in estimates to this House which have been referred to the Committee on Appropriations, for the cost of finishing these very guns?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman from Illinois knows very well what he is talking about, and I expect to show the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] that he perhaps knows less about this matter than the gentleman from Illinois. Here is one of the provisions of the bill:

One 10-inch breech-loading steel gun, wire-wrapped, with longitudinal bars on Woodbridge plan, $20,000; for testing the same, $25,000.

Now what are the facts? I get them from the War Department. I read:

The manufacture of a steel wire-wrapped gun has been very much delayed by difficulties which had not been foreseen by the inventor, Dr. Woodbridge—

The inventor has not even completed his invention, and yet the Government is called upon to spend $45,000 upon it!

This statement continues—as so many others have been made, but not having been carefully worked out by the inventor, the delays referred to arose.

Now, listen to this:

And now there are so much better designs of wire-wrapped guns extant that it is not deemed of prime importance to build this gun.

Why, sir, these gentlemen here would force us to appropriate $45,000 for a gun the patterns for which have not yet been invented, and better guns than which have been devised before the inventor has been able to work out his own designs, so that the money if invested in this gun would be absolutely thrown away.

I only allude to this as one of the guns upon which money might be wasted. There are other old guns which have been rejected by officers of the Army as obsolete, or which have been so greatly improved upon that it would be an utter waste of money to devote it to their completion. Yet the Committee on Appropriations comes in with this bill, insisting that we shall take money out of the Treasury and put it into these obsolete, worthless guns, which would not be used perhaps if completed.

Now a further point: I still hold that if this bill be passed as draughted it will create a complete monopoly in the manufacture of steel forgings. The appropriation made in this bill for steel forgings amounts to one million and a half of dollars. There is but one factory in the country that can manufacture steel forgings under this provision, because it requires all the way from half a million to a million dollars to purchase the machinery and erect the plant to make steel forgings. There is but one establishment now in the country competent to do this work, the Bethlehem works. That establishment has a contract for furnishing steel forgings for the Navy. No new establishment will invest from half a million to a million dollars in the providing of the necessary plant when there is only one and a half million dollars' worth of work to be done, and when for that work there must be competition with an establishment in existence which has its plant already in operation.

In order to have competition you must furnish a demand for a large enough supply to encourage capitalists to build up this manufacture and compete with the only existing establishment in the country. This bill means virtually a million and a half of dollars to be put into the pockets of the owners of the Bethlehem Steel Works, at just such prices as they may demand for their product.

Mr. RYAN. Will the gentleman allow me a word?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Yes, sir.

Mr. RYAN. The Navy Department invited sealed proposals for steel forgings for 8, 10, and 12 inch guns. Does not the gentleman know that three establishments of this country bid for that work?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Yes; and only one got it.

Mr. RYAN. And the aggregate amount of the work to be done did not exceed $1,000,000.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Now I will answer the gentleman. It has been claimed that in order to build a proper establishment for the manufacture of steel forgings $1,000,000 would be required. Some make a less estimate; but the amount can not be less than half a million dollars. Now, what establishment in this country will make an expenditure of one million, or even half a million dollars, to enter into competition with an establishment already in existence when the demand is for only a million and a half dollars' worth of product.

Mr. RYAN. Three establishments offered to do this work.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But those other establishments have not the plant; they are not prepared to do this work.

Mr. RYAN. They offered to compete.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. A demand to the extent of a million and a half of dollars is not a sufficient inducement to capitalists to invest such large sums in plant.

I say again that the adoption of this bill will simply put into the pockets of the owners of the Bethlehem Steel Works a million and a half of dollars for steel forgings at just such price as they may choose to demand, for the reason that the bill compels the Secretary to buy the steel forgings from the manufacturing establishments of this country; and there being but one to do the work there would be no competition. If the sum were increased to two, three, or four million dollars there would come competition from an abundance of establishments in the country. There are two establishments in my own State, several in Pennsylvania, and others in other States of the Union that would procure the plant and enter into competition with the Bethlehem Steel Works for these steel forgings.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Certainly.

Mr. SAYERS. I do not like to make manifest that the gentleman is either entirely ignorant of this bill, or that he is making a misstatement of its purport to the committee. Yet the gentleman, when he says the bill puts the Government into the hands of a single manufacturing establishment, is not sustained by the bill at all. The committee was very particular in guarding the interests of the Government at every point, and I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the provision on page 4 of the bill:

Provided, That no money shall be expended except for steel accepted and delivered, and no contract shall be made hereunder for gun-steel at a greater average price per pound for each caliber than the lowest average price charged under contracts hitherto made by the Government for forgings of like caliber.

Now, the difference between the gentleman from Illinois and myself, each one assuming for the present to speak for his committee, is this: The gentleman from Illinois by reason of the amendments he offers to the House in the shape of Senate amendments, puts no limit on the price of steel. But, sir, the Committee on Appropriations limits the price of steel, and provides that the Government shall not pay a higher price than has been heretofore paid for a like character of steel.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. There is but one way by which the price of steel forges can be kept down if we shall attempt to build forges for guns provided for in this bill, and that is by competition. You can not in any other way put any limit upon the price of steel to be paid by the Government. If you fix it as provided in this bill, so far as the price of steel forgings is concerned, then the Bethlehem Steel Works will demand every dollar of it. You will, in fact, compel the Secretary to give every dollar within the limit we fix to the Bethlehem Steel Works. But if on the contrary you encourage the building of other factories, the establishment of other steel plants, competition will naturally spring up, and you will no doubt be able to obtain steel at a much lower rate than if you allow it to remain within the power of one steel works to manufacture all the steel. If instead of this clause for one million and a half of dollars the bill provided for four or five million of dollars and threw the whole subject open to competition, the result would be that competition would be established and we would be able to get forged steel at a price much lower than we are able to get it at this time. In my judgment there would then be competitors who would invest in steel forgings and compete for supplying this steel to the Government; and as I have already said, the result necessarily would be that the Government would obtain steel at a lower price than it would be able to do under this bill.

Mr. RYAN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Certainly. But let me say further that the price fixed in this bill is the price of the Bethlehem Steel Works, because under the provisions of the bill there is no other competitor and the name of the Bethlehem Steel Works might as well be mentioned in the bill itself.

Mr. RYAN. I wish to state right here what my friend from Illinois can not understand, and that is that two years ago last March, when the Navy Department wanted steel for 6, 8, 10, 10½, and 12 inch guns, they had competitors, as follows: The Cambria Company, of Johnstown, Pa., $851,513.90; the Midvale Steel Company, of Philadelphia, Pa., $1,397,240; and the Bethlehem Iron Company, South Bethlehem, Pa., $902,230.79, being three separate and distinct competitors at three separate and distinct sums, showing, I want to say to my friend, that only two years ago when we wanted steel forgings there were then three competitors bidding to supply the Navy at the prices which I have named.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If we appropriate some four or five million dollars for steel forgings for the Navy, we then call for an amount of steel which would induce investment in additional plants for the manufacture of steel, and thereby have a larger number of competitors for furnishing the needs of the Government, and naturally there would be a lowering of the price at which the steel would be offered.

Mr. RYAN. Only one of the three competitors which I have named bid for steel armor for vessels. All the rest of the bids were for steel for guns for the Government.

Mr. HERBERT. One million dollars included armor plates and bolts.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The same character of steel required by the Government for guns is required by the Government for armor for vessels.

Mr. RYAN. As I have said, there was only one bidder for steel armor for vessels, while there were three competitors for steel for guns.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The point I wish to make is this: That when these bids were made if the Government was then about to purchase four or five million dollars' worth of steel forgings instead of the amount which it did propose to purchase, then the amount for which bids were asked was sufficiently large to induce men of wealth to engage in the establishment of other steel plants for the manufacture of steel, and thereby by increasing competition have reduced the price which the Government would pay for the article. I say further that the small amount of steel called for will not produce any competition, and you might as well put in the name of Bethlehem Steel Company, for the result will be to give every dollar into the hands of that company. There will be no other competitor.

Mr. RYAN. Why do you say that in the face of the fact that two years ago there were three competitors in the field for the contract for the same steel forgings for the same kind of guns, which did not then exceed the amount which I have indicated?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That embraced armor for the ships and steel for the guns as well; and the amount of the appropriation aggregated about $4,000,000.

Mr. RYAN. But this related to steel forgings for the guns alone.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. And forgings for the armor of the ships.

Mr. RYAN. Oh, no; the contract referred exclusively to the guns.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Does the gentleman mean to say that the steel forgings for the guns could not also be used for the armor of the ships?

Mr. RYAN. But the proposal was for the guns alone; that is the only point.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But the establishment which had the contract for the guns certainly had facilities also to supply the forgings for the ships; so that in the aggregate the amount would have been something over $4,000,000.

Mr. RYAN. Well, a sufficient answer to that is that they did not bid for it. But it showed their willingness to enter into a contract to supply forgings for the guns, although the gentleman from Illinois seems to think that no firm, even for a million and a half of dollars, would erect the necessary plant.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not believe they would, unless there was a prospect of being able to secure other sales for their material in the way of armor.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have occupied more time than I intended because of these interruptions. I wish now to say a word in conclusion. If this bill shall be adopted by the House, and the Senate amendments to the Army bill are lost, there either will be no appropriation at all for coast defenses, or at most this bill will be the only one that will be adopted making provision for coast defenses, and will involve, as I have shown, an appropriation of nineteen or twenty millions of dollars, unless the Senate shall substitute one of the other bills that I have mentioned, involving the expenditure of a vast sum of money, and which may be eventually ratified by the House. Now, I believe we ought to commence the work of arming our coasts at once. The United States land forces have but one single modern gun to-day. It is at the proving-ground at Sandy Hook. There are two or three others in course of preparation, but this one at the proving-grounds at Sandy Hook is the only gun capable of meeting any of the civilized nations to-day; yea, we have not a gun to-day that could meet the small Government of Chili in case of trouble between these countries. She is armed with modern guns of heavy caliber, and the United States, with all its wealth and population, has but one gun.

What further fact stares us in the face? Although the Committee on Appropriations had jurisdiction over the appropriation for ordnance ever since 1864, there has not been a single dollar appropriated by Congress for building a modern gun in thirteen years. There has not been one single dollar to furnish a proper gun for the Government within all that period of time.

There has not been a dollar appropriated for two years even for fortifications. I do not know where the fault lies. I do not pretend to suggest where it is. It is for the Committee on Appropriations and the members of the committee to say where the fault is. I only know that the question has been left with them during all that time; and during the thirteen years to which I have referred they have failed to appropriate a single dollar for the armament of our coast. How much longer, gentlemen, do you want us to wait before you proceed to arm the coast? If you leave it to the Committee on Appropriations, I fear we may have to wait as long in the future as we have already waited in the past; for when they do attempt to bring in a bill on the subject they bring in such a monstrosity as ought not to be adopted by either House of Congress.

There are other provisions in this bill to which I have not yet called the attention of the committee. I shall not now occupy the time to do so more than to say a word or two in reference to the sixth section. A bare inspection of that section of this bill will convince any reasonably intelligent man that it should never be adopted by this House. That section proposes to take the entire control, practically, so far as the building of ordnance is concerned, from the hands of the Secretary of War and the officers of that Department and place it in the hands of a commission to be created, consisting of three civilians and three Army officers. What further? The bill I hold in my hand creates these three new officers at a salary of $5,000 a year each. God knows it strikes me that we have tax-eaters enough billeted on the national Treasury to-day, and there ought to be among the 2,000 or 3,000 young men who have been graduated from our West Point Academy and now holding commissions in the Army enough at least and skillful enough to know how to establish the gun factory and superintend the construction of the steel guns without going outside and employing three civilians at a salary of $5,000 a year each. Mark you, gentlemen, those who vote for the passage of this bill in its present shape vote in favor of the creation of three new offices, and vote to create a new bureau with all of its expenses and paraphernalia attendant upon it. The bill is extravagant and in my judgment impracticable. It ought not to be adopted by this House or by the Senate.

I simply wanted to call attention to the character of the bill, and have done what I conceive to be my duty.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to make a few remarks only in response to what has been said with regard to the pending bill.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. OUTHWAITE in the chair). How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. SAYERS. I do not wish to be limited, but shall occupy only a short time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from Texas will proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to answer as well and as fully as I may, within the brief time at my disposal, the statements made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] respecting the pending bill. At one moment he complains that the Committee on Appropriations has, for more than twenty years past, neglected to make provision for the defense of our seacoast territory, and his very next utterance is to condemn, without discrimination and in the very strongest terms, the measure under consideration, and especially does he find fault with the large expenditure which may be possibly involved should it become a law.

For weeks, and I might safely add for months, the Subcommittee on Fortifications, of which I have the honor to be the chairman, has had this matter under consideration. The door of the committee-room has been at all times widely open to all persons, whether they were officers of the Army and Navy or inventors or manufacturers. A hearing has been denied to no one, who desired to present his peculiar ideas and methods for providing for the defense of the country. Advice has been given by many, some of whom have expended almost a lifetime upon the study of this particular branch of the military service.

After much investigation and no little trouble a bill has been formulated and brought into this House, in which there are two distinctive and prominent features—one of which is the manufacture of guns to a reasonable extent by the Government, and the other is their construction by the private establishments of the country. In this, we follow the policy that is now maintained by England, France, Italy, Russia, Austria, and every other European nation, except Germany, who depends solely upon her private industries for the manufacture of her heavy ordnance.

We have avoided, on the one hand, the policy of Germany, which, to-day, is at the mercy of her Krupps, and on the other hand we have not committed ourselves to the policy of France anterior to the Franco-Prussian war.

To my mind, Mr. Chairman, the one is as objectionable as the other. If the policy of Germany should be adopted, then the Government would not possess that degree of independence which would enable it to successfully resist the extortionable demands of the private manufacturer whenever an emergency should arise requiring an immediate and a large purchase of such character of war material. In such a condition and in such a crisis it would not be able to deny any exaction, however unreasonable or extravagant. Having no establishment of its own, it would necessarily be forced by the pressure of circumstances to accede to any exaction, be it ever so unscrupulous or exorbitant. It is said, sir, that because of this dependence upon the citizen, Germany has greatly suffered and is still suffering from the extravagant demands of those who supply her with her armament.

But the experience of France in her ill-advised war with Prussia warns us against a reliance upon governmental establishments alone for the manufacture of guns and other munitions of war.

Immense sums of money had been for many years expended upon the erection of arsenals and foundries and in the construction of artillery of every kind. It was then believed that France was better equipped in this respect than any other nation in the world. But when the time came for the application of the highest and the best test as to her superiority in military equipment it was found, to her great misfortune, that imbecility and corruption had not only made sad havoc with the public funds, but also that such armament as she had was of the most inferior character.

This is a matter of history, the entire truth of which can not be controverted.

The gentleman from Illinois, however, would have us follow in the footsteps of France. He would establish government plants only, and would purchase, in advance of the slightest necessity therefor, large quantities of steel forgings for conversion into heavy ordnance. He approves the Senate amendments to the Army bill, one of which appropriates $5,000,000 for the purchase of these forgings.

Mr. Chairman, a greater or a more unnecessary extravagance could not be proposed in any matter affecting our military establishment.

We had before us one of the most practical, experienced, and intelligent officers of the Ordnance Bureau, and he informed us, in plain and unmistakable terms, that in its present condition the governmental arsenal could, with constant and effective work, use only about $100,000 worth of steel forgings in a single year.

True it is that the Senate amendments seek to enlarge the capacity of the arsenal, but, according to the testimony of this officer, these improvements could not entirely be completed under four years.

How long will it take to convert such a large amount of forgings into guns in these circumstances?

Sir, so large an appropriation, at this time and for such a purpose, would be utterly inexcusable. Congress is in session every year and can supply the needs of the arsenal as they may occur. There is no war pending, nor do we hear of any rumors of war. Our situation, our prestige as a military people, and our vast and unconquerable strength, are arguments which can not be controverted, against the probability of an early breach of the very peaceful relations which we enjoy with the nations of the world.

Why, then, such an unnecessary extravagance at this particular time? The art of gun-making and the inventions and discoveries, almost without number, in the matter of high explosives and in the method of their use and application, are becoming more efficient every year, necessitating modes of warfare altogether different to what has prevailed in the past. This of itself should admonish us to be very cautious lest the results of our present expenditures should be entirely inadequate to a future emergency.

But, Mr. Chairman, independent of these considerations, would it be in keeping with sound business principles to purchase so large a quantity of steel when the article itself is constantly becoming cheaper?

Steel is not so costly to-day as it was twelve months ago, and it will be less expensive twelve months hence than it is now. Upon this point there can be no difference of opinion. Not only a cheaper but a better quality of steel is being continually put upon the market. Why, then, so large an investment by the Government? Can the gentleman from Illinois tell us wherein the people are to derive any benefit from so large an expenditure of the public money as is contemplated by the Senate amendments? Will he tell us which is the wiser policy, the preservation of the surplus in the Treasury and its application to the payment of our bonded debt or its investment in an immense quantity of steel to lie unused for many years?

We should remember the extraordinary expenditures made, some years ago and under a previous administration, in the naval department, and by them we should be warned.

It is beyond the powers confided us to make such investments of the public funds.

Sir, the reasons which I have given, it occurs to me, should be more than sufficient to induce this House to reject the Senate amendments to the Army bill.

There is another objection to them which ought to be presented. It is one of a practical and economical character, and furnishes a strong argument against an extensive gun plant to be owned and operated by the Government.

The manufacture of heavy ordnance and of stores applicable to large guns is exceedingly expensive—far more so than one who is not familiar with the subject would suspect. In addition to their cost, the risk attending their successful completion is very great. If the gun be constructed by the Government it must of course be at the risk of the Government, and very frequently does it happen that the gun, when subjected to the usual test after it has been completed, shows itself to be utterly worthless.

This is one of the inevitable incidents of gun-manufacturing, and should always be taken into account when it is proposed that the Government should undertake the business upon a large scale.

To avoid as much as possible the difficulties to which I have called the attention of the committee, it was thought best, Mr. Chairman, to report to the House, in addition to what was deemed necessary for the proper equipment of a Government arsenal, a provision looking to the manufacture of some heavy guns by the private establishments of the country.

I believe this provision to be a prudent one. I am not one of those who think that there is any immediate danger of war, but I believe that wisdom demands that we should in an economical, practical, and gradual way proceed to the manufacture and purchase of such heavy guns as might be necessary for the defense of our seacoast.

Such guns should not be built rapidly. Did we possess every appliance necessary to their proper construction, it would nevertheless require years and years to provide ourselves even with a limited quantity. But there is no necessity whatever either for an undue haste or for an enormous appropriation. Our armament can be constructed quietly, leisurely but continuously, and economically. It should be of the best types—equal if not superior to the most approved in Europe. Above all, care should be exercised that the Government is well protected against loss so far as may be possible. In no way, sir, can these results be so easily and so well attained as through the method of the contract system. The sure effect of such a policy will be to stimulate competition, develop genius, employ labor, and create industries upon which the country may safely rely in times of great emergency.

But, Mr. Chairman, let us briefly examine the bill, about which the gentleman from Illinois talks so glibly and yet so ignorantly.

I feel persuaded that he has not given it a careful and a thorough examination.

Proceeding to criticise the bill, he first assaults section 3, which provides for the completion of certain guns now under fabrication. The gentleman forgets that the construction of these guns is under the direct and personal supervision and control of the Ordnance Department. If they are utterly valueless, as he insists, and further expenditure upon them would be a waste of money, then it becomes a strong and fatal argument against his policy, which is also enunciated by the Senate amendments to the Army bill, of confining the manufacture of heavy ordnance to the Government.

If his criticism is the expression of an honest and a candid opinion, which I am very ready to admit, then the proposition involved in the Senate amendments, and which has the unanimous and hearty support of the House Committee on Military Affairs, is unsound and should not receive the favorable consideration of the House. But his statements in reference to these guns are mere assumptions, and have no substantial foundation in point of fact. If I am not laboring under a very erroneous impression, the completion of these guns has been estimated for by the War Department, and the extracts which the gentleman has quoted are only the reasons which the Ordnance Bureau gives for the delay in their completion. I beg the permission of the committee to read, Mr. Chairman, a communication which was before the Committee on Appropriations upon this subject. It is as follows:

ORDNANCE OFFICE, WAR DEPARTMENT.
Washington, D. C., May 5, 1888.

SIR: In reply to your letter dated April 30, 1888, requesting items of information in regard to six guns and one mortar under fabrication by the Ordnance Department, I have the honor to submit the following, namely (naming the guns in the order given upon the printed slip "Section 5," inclosed with your letter):

1. One 10-inch breech-loading steel gun, wire-wrapped, with longitudinal bars, on Woodbridge plan:
   Cost to date $15,000
   Estimated additional cost to complete 20,000
   Estimated time required to complete, eighteen months.
2. One 10-inch breech-loading steel-hooped gun:
   Cost to date $26,395
   Estimated additional cost to complete 7,500
   Estimated time required to complete, ten months.
3. One 10-inch breech-loading rifle, cast-iron, wire-wrapped:
   Cost to date $24,000
   Estimated additional cost to complete 1,500
   Estimated time required to complete, three and a half months.
4. One 8-inch breech-loading steel-hooped gun:
   Cost to date $18,885
   Estimated additional cost to complete 5,000
   Estimated time required to complete, eight months.
5. One 12-inch breech-loading rifle, cast-iron, steel-tubed:
   Cost to date $29,250
   Additional cost to complete 10,000
   Estimated time required to complete, three months.

The $10,000 required to complete this gun is covered by contract with the South Boston Iron Works, extended by urgent deficiency bill approved March 30, 1888. No further appropriation is needed for completing the gun.

6. One 12-inch breech-loading rifle, cast-iron, hooped, and tubed with steel, on the French system:
Gun completed, cost $49,563

This gun has been accepted and paid for under contract with the South Boston Iron Works, extended by urgent deficiency bill approved March 30, 1888.

7. One 12-inch breech-loading mortar, cast-iron, hooped with steel:
Mortar completed, cost $13,456

In regard to carriages for these guns, the Department has on hand several of old type or such as have been constructed for proof purposes, and the test or proof-firing of all the guns can be made without purchasing additional carriages for that purpose. In order, however, to test improved types of carriages, a matter which the Department has been compelled to postpone in recent years owing to lack of appropriations, the following estimates for carriages to be purchased for use in connection with the proof of these guns are herewith submitted, namely:

8. For one 10-inch hydro-pneumatic disappearing gun-carriage $20,000
For one gun-carriage shield 8,000
For foundations for carriage 3,000
9. For one 16-inch hydraulic barbette gun-carriage 15,000
For foundations for carriage 2,500
10. For one 12-inch hydro-pneumatic mortar-carriage 9,000
For foundations for carriage 2,500

From the preceding it will be seen that the four guns first named are not yet completed, whilst for the two remaining guns and one 12-inch rifled mortar one of the guns and the mortar are completed, and the money is available for the completion of the other gun.

A summary of all the items gives:

Cost of six guns and one mortar to date, being the total amount expended or covered by outstanding contract $185,564

The estimates submitted for appropriations to be made are:

Estimated additional cost required to complete four unfinished guns 34,000
Estimated aggregate amount required for firing test of six guns and one mortar, as itemized upon the printed slip "Section 5," inclosed with the committee's letter dated April 30, 1888 124,000
Estimated cost of three carriages of improved type (items 8, 9, and 10) with foundations, etc 60,000

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHAS. S. SMITH,
Capt., Ord. Dept. U. S. Army, Acting Chief of Ordnance.

The CHAIRMAN SUBCOMMITTEE ON FORTIFICATION BILL,
Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

But, sir, it is upon section 6 of the bill which the gentleman animadverts most severely. When carefully considered I am clearly of the opinion it will meet with the approbation of every one who is at all willing that any steps whatever should be taken toward the armament of our seacoast. But as my time is limited I can not now do more than to submit to the committee an analysis of this section.

First. It provides for the construction of both iron and steel guns. As is well known, there has been for many years quite a controversy as to the relative merits of iron and steel for the construction of heavy artillery.

The advocates of the former metal contend that it is not only much cheaper, as regards as well the cost of material as that of construction, which is universally conceded, but also, when completed, that the iron gun is as valuable and serviceable as the one made of steel. If this assumption be correct, then it is clearly to the interest of the Government, from an economical standpoint, that the construction of steel guns should be immediately abandoned. The committee was anxious that this much disputed question should be finally and definitely settled, and it has therefore recommended the construction of a number of iron guns.

Second. The construction of steel guns is also provided for.

Third. As to the number and character of such guns, the prices therefor, the probable time of their completion, the annual expenditures which may be incurred, I can best inform this committee by reading from the report which accompanies this bill:

The bill contemplates that breech-loading steel guns of 12, 14, and 16 inch calibers, cast-iron breech-loading guns of 12-inch caliber, and 12-inch breech-loading cast-iron mortars will be presented to the board for test; and sufficient provision is made in the appropriation for the payment for at least two such types of each gun, mortar, and carriage, if successful, except for the 12-inch steel guns, for which sufficient is given to pay for five test guns; but the contracts are to be awarded only to the party presenting the best of such guns or carriages. It is required that the experimental guns shall equal in accuracy of fire, endurance, and power the best existing guns of a like caliber of whatever material made; that the 12-inch cast-iron mortar shall equal in the same respects the 12-inch breech-loading steel-hooped mortar now at the proving-ground at Sandy Hook. Subject to these conditions, the bill provides that the Secretary of War shall contract, at a price reasonable in the opinion of the board, for the following guns, namely:

For not less than fifty 12-inch breech-loading steel guns.
For not less than twenty 14-inch breech-loading steel guns.
For not less than twenty 16-inch breech-loading steel guns.
For not less than thirty 12-inch breech-loading cast-iron guns.
For not less than fifty 12-inch breech-loading cast-iron mortars, with carriages to correspond, subject to the proviso that the carriages contracted for shall not exceed in number the guns and mortars that at the time of the contract have been contracted for.

The estimated money value of these contracts may reach to $13,255,438, which is proportioned as follows:

For the purchase of steel guns $8,804,980
For the purchase of 12-inch cast-iron guns 750,000
For the purchase of 12-inch cast-iron mortars 300,000
For the gun-carriages 3,446,457
For the mortar-carriages 350,000

It is estimated that in order to complete and test the experimental guns and mortars named in the bill the time required will be approximately as follows:

For the 12-inch cast-iron mortars, sixteen months.
For the 12-inch cast-iron guns, twenty months.
For the 12-inch steel guns, four years.
For the 14-inch steel guns, four and one-half years.
For the 16-inch guns, five years.
The carriages to be tested with the guns.

And that fifty 12-inch cast-iron mortars can be completed ready for delivery in three years, thirty 12-inch cast-iron rifles in nine years, fifty 12-inch steel guns in ten years, twenty 14-inch steel guns in eleven years, and twenty 16-inch steel guns within thirteen years from the date of the act.

The prospective expenditures under the contracts to be made will be distributed approximately as follows:

Between the date of the act and June 30, 1892 ..... $1,165,000
Between June 30, 1892, and June 30, 1895 600,000
Between June 30, 1895, and June 30, 1898 7,500,000
Between June 30, 1898, and June 30, 1901 4,000,000

Or the guns and carriages may all be completed and delivered in about thirteen years from this date. These estimates are based upon the representations of the manufacturers of cast-iron guns, and on the supposition that the producers of steel guns will provide facilities for manufacture at least equal to those proposed for the Government by the Gun Foundry Board.

Fourth. It is expressly stipulated that no contract shall be made which will require an expenditure exceeding, in the aggregate, the sum of $13,215,438, nor an expenditure, in any one year, greater than $2,500,000.

Fifth. It requires that the President shall, at the beginning of each session, submit to Congress such reports as the board are required to make as to experiments, investigations, contracts which have been entered into, estimates of appropriations necessary under such contracts, and an itemized statement of all their expenditures.

Sixth. That all the materials used shall be of domestic manufacture.

Seventh. A present appropriation of $2,477,670 is made, which may or may not be used, leaving to Congress the discretion and the power to make future provision for the continuance of the construction of these guns, if it should see fit, being limited, however, to $13,215,438 in the aggregate.

Eighth. A board is to be appointed by the President to consist of three officers of the Army and three civilians, the latter to be engineers of experience and standing, and at least one of them to be experienced in the quality and working of steel. None of these shall be eligible who has any pecuniary interest, either directly, or indirectly, in the material, manufacture, or inventions to be employed in the construction or operation of the defenses which are provided for. The concurrence of at least five members must be had before any action whatever can be taken, and the continuance of the board will be subject to the pleasure of Congress.

These, Mr. Chairman, constitute all of the substantial provisions of this section, except the allowance of $5,000 per annum as a salary to each civilian member of the board, and when we take into consideration the character of the services to be rendered and the high degree of skill and experience required, it can not be thought that the salary is too large, especially as the board is only temporary and may be abolished at any time. But the gentleman from Illinois very seriously objects to the appointment of civilians. He would have all the members of the board taken from the Army.

Sir, I regard it as of the highest importance that the board should be constituted as recommended by the committee. I have every confidence in the integrity and skill and experience of the gentlemen to whom are intrusted the defense of our country, yet I feel that in the matter of gun construction it will be the part of wisdom to call to their assistance the genius, the ambition, the skill, the experience, and the inventive faculty of the people. It will be, so to speak, an addition of fresh blood to a long-established system, over which official life, pride of opinion, and exclusiveness of thought and action have exercised and continue to exercise an influence to such an extent as to impair that high efficiency which the progressiveness and activity of the present age so eminently demands. With such an organization and with the provisions already enumerated, the country is invited, in the following language, to participate in the construction of heavy guns:

Whenever any party shall present for test a completed single-charge breech-loading steel gun of 12, 14, or 16 inches caliber, or a completed single-charge breech-loading cast-iron gun of 12 inches caliber, with the proper supply of ammunition therefor, such gun shall, in the presence of the party presenting it, be subjected to such tests as the board shall prescribe; and should such gun be shown to the satisfaction of the board by such tests to be at least equal in accuracy, range, power, endurance, and general efficiency to the best existing guns of like caliber, exclusive of guns presented for competition under this section, the gun and ammunition shall be paid for at a fair valuation, including cost of transportation, and contract shall be made by the Secretary of War, at a price reasonable in the opinion of the board, with the party only presenting the best of such guns, for a further supply of similar guns, to be subjected to the usual service test before acceptance, as follows, namely:

For not less than fifty 12-inch steel guns; not less than twenty 14-inch guns; for not less than twenty 16-inch steel guns; for not less than thirty 12-inch cast-iron guns.

A like provision is made for furnishing the Government with not less than fifty iron mortars.

Sir, I challenge any gentleman upon this floor to show where in this section the interests of the Government are not most carefully guarded. Can any one truthfully say that the proposition is an extravagant one? It must be remembered that these guns and mortars can not be completed before the expiration of thirteen years. The Government takes not the slightest risk. The manufacturer must present guns and mortars which have successfully undergone the severest test before a single dollar is paid him, and where there are several competitors whose guns and mortars have been successfully tested, the party only who has presented the best of such guns shall be entitled to the contract.

Of the several provisions of this bill, Mr. Chairman, I regard those which are embraced in section 6 as by far the most important, in whatever light the entire measure may be considered.

They are in line with the experience of other governments. They should commend themselves to this House and to the country because of the economy in expenditure which they certainly preserve. They afford to the manufacturers the opportunity to compete with the Government, at their own risk, in the construction of such ordnance, and if the bill should become a law and the invitation thus tendered be accepted, our private establishments will soon be in a condition to supply the Government with every character of war material, in any emergency which may arise, whether it be soon or late. The arsenals of the Government will also be benefited by the competition, and a spirit of emulation will arise that must necessarily produce the very best results.

It is for Congress to choose between the policy advocated by the Committee on Military Affairs and that recommended by the Committee on Appropriations, and upon Congress must rest the responsibility of the decision.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, I crave the indulgence of the committee, not for the purpose of making any set speech, but to reply to some remarks which have been made on this floor this morning. A Canadian railroad scare has been started at the other end of the Capitol and has found its echo here, and it is in response to that echo that I propose to submit a few statements and considerations to the House. And while my remarks may not directly bear upon the question of how to build guns they do relate to the preservation of guns already built.

The farmers of the Northwest, of Minnesota and Dakota, and of all that belt of country reaching out to Puget Sound have armed and fortified themselves with guns and cannon in the way of cheaper transportation, and what they now ask is that these cannon with which they have fortified themselves you will leave in their hands undisturbed. Gentlemen, if you will glance at this map [a large map of Canada and the United States] you will see that the St. Lawrence water system at the upper end of Lake Huron divides itself into two branches, the Lake Superior system and the Lake Michigan system, the Lake Superior system ending at Duluth, and the Lake Michigan system ending at Chicago.

Now, this region of country (Minnesota and Dakota) is the great spring-wheat region of the Northwest. Ninety per cent. of all the spring wheat raised in the United States is raised there. You all know that wheat is a bulky and very expensive article to transport. That wheat must be marketed either in the Eastern States and on the seaboard of our own country or in Europe, because the intervening States raise more than enough wheat to supply their own wants. With the farmers of the Northwest the great question has been how to get cheap transportation, and this question we have now solved. We have reached out and connected our railroad system with the west end of Lake Superior, and when our wheat and our other agricultural products have reached that point—Duluth—it will be seen that they are as near the seaboard and as near the markets of the Atlantic coast and of Europe as they would be at Chicago. In other words, by our railroad system now existing in the far Northwest, together with our Lake system, we have entirely annihilated the distance of nearly 500 miles which intervenes between Duluth and Chicago. I repeat, therefore, that when our great food staple or any of our agricultural products are at Duluth they are for all practical purposes as near the seaboard and as near Europe and can be got to either market as cheaply as though they were at Chicago.

But, unfortunately, this water system of ours is frozen up nearly six months in the year, so we have had to do something else to supplement it, and for this purpose we have now secured two lines of railroad, one extending from Duluth over to Sault Ste. Marie and the other from St. Paul and Minneapolis out to the same point. Both of these roads have been built by American companies in the first instance. The Sault Ste. Marie road is still owned by Americans, but the Canadians have got control temporarily of the other. As I go along I will explain why inexorable necessity has compelled them to obtain that control. The committee will pardon me for breaking off from the direct line of my remarks to give the reasons why these railroad transportation routes have been acquired partly by the Canadians.

Right north of Minnesota and Dakota is the great Province of Manitoba, in British North America, having a population of about 300,000 or more. Under the charter which was given to the Canadiam Pacific Railroad Company no permission was to be given to build any line southward to connect with the American system. The road was to be a complete monopoly, entirely cut off from American connections west of Lake Superior. All the people along this line—the Manitoba border—were completely cut off from any railroad communication with the American system. As a result of this policy the Province of Manitoba, from about two years ago until a recent period, has been almost in a state of open rebellion against the Canadian Government. I might say here that the Dominion of Canada consists of a number of provinces. There is a Dominion Parliament, a Dominion Government, with a governor-general and a House of Commons, and all the paraphernalia of government as existing in England. Then, again, each of these little provinces has its local legislature and local government, with a lieutenant-governor representing the Crown. The Province of Manitoba, for instance, has its local parliament and a lieutenant-governor representing the Crown; and he has a prime minister. The struggle in Manitoba has been so persistent that finally, within the last six months, as we all remember, the Dominion Government was compelled to buy out this monopoly, the Canadian Pacific, in order to avert the danger of the Province of Manitoba going into a state of open revolt and rebellion. The franchise having been bought out, the people of the Province of Manitoba are now about to get direct railroad connection with St. Paul and Minneapolis.

On this railroad question the provincial government which existed a year ago was driven to the wall. A new parliament, a new government has been elected. The Dominion of Canada has been compelled, as I have stated, to buy up the Canadian Pacific by paying a big royalty or bonus; and thus the restriction which would prevent railroad connection with our American system was removed. A road is now being built from Winnipeg, the chief city west of Lake Superior in the Dominion of Canada, down along the right side of the river [illustrating] to connect with the Northern Pacific. If you look at this map, you will see that we are running a line which will tap that whole Canadian system from the West and connect it with this country. The Canadian Pacific Company sees this; that company realizes that unless it does something that whole traffic will come down through the city of St. Paul in this direction [illustrating]. In order to prevent this they are seeking to get a system through this country (by way of St. Vincent, Duluth, and Sault Ste. Marie), and thus they practically sacrifice to a large extent the traffic of their line along the north shore of Lake Superior.

Now, bear in mind that this Canadian Pacific road extends easterly from Winnipeg to Thunder Bay, and from there around the north shore of Lake Superior and around Georgian Bay, and there it branches out in the several systems connecting with the system of Northern New York and the New England system. Now, the Canadian Pacific has just got the control of one of these lines—from Sault Ste. Marie to Duluth—the Duluth, South Shore and Atlantic; but that only brings it to Duluth, and in order to make a connection with its Canadian system at St. Vincent which will be of any use, it must build from Duluth to St. Vincent, so as to compete with the Northern Pacific's Winnipeg connection. Thus, gentlemen, you can see that whatever may be the result, the traffic of Manitoba will either come on the Northern Pacific through its Winnipeg connection to Duluth or it will come on the Duluth, South Shore and Atlantic road just acquired by the Canadian Pacific and the line it must build to fill the gap between St. Vincent and Duluth. In other words, the Canadian Pacific, in order to get something from Manitoba, must practically abandon its whole line around the north shore of Lake Superior and take an American line from St. Vincent via Duluth to Sault Ste. Marie. That is to say, that the Manitoba and a part of the trans-continental trade of the Canadian Pacific, under the new policy to be inaugurated by reason of the American connections when it reaches the city of Winnipeg, instead of going around by the north shore of Lake Superior is more likely to go from St. Vincent via Duluth to Sault Ste. Marie, a distance of over a thousand miles through American territory. And is there any harm in that, in bringing Canadian business in transit through a thousand miles of American territory?

In this connection I wish to explain another matter, of which some may not be aware. The Northern Pacific extends across the center of Minnesota, and Dakota, Montana, and Washington Territories, and there is the Canadian Pacific right across the line a little way. Now, at St. Paul we have a company known as the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Company. It is a Minnesota company. Some of the main men in it are Minnesota men, although a part of the capital is Canadian capital. This road has been built and extends from St. Paul northwestwardly between the Northern Pacific and the Canadian Pacific, on the American side of the line, through that great reservation in Northern Montana just opened [illustrating]. This line is now within 450 miles or thereabouts of Puget Sound. This road, remember is being built without one dollar in money or one acre in land. You all know that the Southern Pacific had a subsidy; you all know what a great subsidy the Union Pacific and the Central Pacific Railroad Companies had; and we have not yet got rid of that question. You know what a great subsidy in lands the Northern Pacific Railroad Company received; but the greatest subsidy of all, perhaps, was that granted to the Canadian Pacific. Yet here, by the energy of Minnesota men, with capital furnished partly by Minnesota and partly by Canada, we are getting a road with the best grades and the best local traffic to the Pacific coast. We shall be there inside of two years, and shall tap this whole Canadian border.

Why, gentlemen, wipe out that customs barrier, wipe it all out, and Minnesota will take care of all of Canada west of Lake Superior. We will make it a suburb of Minneapolis and St. Paul. [Laughter.] You of the East may fear trade with Canada, but out in Minnesota we consider that country only as our suburb; and, mark what I say, we shall get most of the trade from there from this time onward.

As I was saying, we have these two roads, the Duluth, South Shore and Atlantic, and the Minneapolis and Sault Ste. Marie. One of these, the Duluth, South Shore and Atlantic, has recently passed under the control of the Canadian Pacific. I have attempted to show why the Canadian Pacific has acquired this road and for what purpose. I want to say, in this connection, to those who suffer from Anglophobia or Canadaphobia that this Canadian Pacific Railroad is the one of which Mr. Morton, our Republican candidate for Vice-President, was recently an officer; and I want to say, further, that recently a live Yankee—a man who graduated on the Minnesota railroads, Mr. Van Horne—has been elected president of the Canadian Pacific road, and a great deal of the stock of that road is owned by American parties.

Now, I explained to you a moment ago why the Canadian Pacific has sought this Duluth, South Shore and Atlantic line. One good result is to ultimately give us in the Northwest for our products another line. We will then have a line running through a country which now has no railroad from St. Vincent to Duluth. It will be building another line of railroad through a country which under other circumstances might not be built for thirty or forty years yet to come.

Now, as to the Sault Ste. Marie. By far the greater part of the stock of that is controlled in Minneapolis. To be sure some of it is held by Canadians, but the larger and controlling interest is held in Minneapolis, and of course it is controlled there.

The great problem we have had to solve in the Northwest is cheaper transportation to market for the products of our agriculture. In summer we have the water system of the Lakes, but in the winter we have nothing to rely upon but these great trunk lines just built to the Sault Ste. Marie. By these new lines we have in winter as well as in summer cheaper transportation than heretofore, which enables us to send our products to the markets of the world.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. NELSON. I trust I will be allowed a little more time.

Mr. SAYERS. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. NELSON. I want at least ten minutes.

Mr. SAYERS. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to proceed, and that when he has concluded his remarks the committee will then proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman from Minnesota will proceed.

Mr. NELSON. If the members of the committee have not failed to understand what I have attempted to explain, then it will be seen why it is this matter has assumed the importance which has been given to it. Our traffic in the far Northwest has been compelled heretofore to go by way of Chicago, and of course Chicago does not like the establishment of any system that would take it away from that city.

Mr. NUTTING. The gentleman has referred in his remarks to the Sault Ste. Marie road. Now, that railroad is connected with the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. NELSON. Yes, at the Sault.

Mr. NUTTING. Yes, it is connected with the Canadian Pacific at the Sault. As I understand it, that railroad is not subservient to the interstate-commerce law.

Mr. NELSON. Yes, it is as far as the Sault is concerned.

Mr. NUTTING. It is not for through freight. In that regard it is not subservient to our laws. For the last two years it has been in possession of the American system.

Mr. NELSON. That may be true, but it is a great blessing to the Northwest, as it enables them rapidly and cheaply to transport the products of agriculture to market.

Mr. NUTTING. It is, on the contrary, in opposition to the American railroad system and to the carriage of American freight by American railroads. The West paid more than a million of dollars to the Canadian Pacific in the way of freight, and it is just that much money taken out of the pockets of our people.

Mr. NELSON. That is your statement, not mine.

Mr. NUTTING. The gentleman admits what I have said.

Mr. NELSON. No; but you said that it was correct.

Mr. NUTTING. I understood the gentleman to say that the statement was correct.

Mr. NELSON. No; I said that is your statement, not mine.

Mr. NUTTING. But the gentleman knows it is so.

Mr. NELSON. No, I do not know anything of the sort. It is this new system which I have explained which we desire to have retained untrammeled. It is, of course, not in the interest of the great American trunk-lines east of Chicago, and they oppose it. The Pennsylvania Central Railroad and the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad and the other great trunk-lines are anxious to have the freight of the Northwest to come down by way of Chicago, so that they may get the advantage of this traffic. But we can not get transportation as cheaply in that way as by the means of the new routes which I have described. Now, after we have obtained cheap transportation for our spring wheat and other cereals there is an attempt to demoralize and destroy these new lines and to throw us back on to the old lines.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. NELSON. I will, though my time is very limited.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. My sole purpose is to call attention to the transportation of the commerce of the country.

Mr. NELSON. I have cast no reflection upon the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I do not wish to see the commerce of our country diverted from our own lines of railroad to the Canadian lines. I am in favor, on the contrary, of protecting our own lines.

Mr. NELSON. It is not diverted from them at all, but it is sent just where nature intended it should go, on nature's highway. Nature, Mr. Chairman, made this great water system the great outlet for the products of the Northwestern country, and when nature in the winter blocks up that system we have a right, and should be permitted to exercise it, to avail ourselves of the best and cheapest substitute—our two new lines of railroad. I appeal, therefore, to every friend of the masses of the people, I appeal to you men of New England who want protection on all of your products for all of your little manufacturing towns, to give us this little protection which we have secured for ourselves by reason of these new railroads. Are you not satisfied now with what you have gotten? You obtained a high tariff so as to fix prices on your products, while with us the price of our wheat, our principal product, is fixed by the markets of Liverpool; and having got what you demand we ask you simply to give to our people the little privilege that their own enterprise and ingenuity have secured for them. True, we have a route that crosses a little corner of Canada, but in the interest of the American railroads must you check us off and say, "No, you shall not use that line" even if it is much shorter and cheaper.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Let me interrupt the gentleman to say that we do not want protection, but do not want to be compelled to pay tribute to them.

Mr. STRUBLE. Oh, yes, you do; you want protection as against the wheat product of Canada.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, what we want is simply this: Give us what we have secured for ourselves by our own energy and enterprise, give us all the benefits of that new transportation system and let us alone, and by the Eternal we will take care of all that is left of Manitoba and Canada west of Lake Superior. [Laughter and applause.]

And in reference to this military scare. Why, what does it amount to? We could send out a couple of regiments of Scandinavian militia from Northern Minnesota to cut the bridge across the Red River of the North and to cut the bridge across the Winnepeg River at the Rat Portage, and the Dominion would be cut in two just as completely as you could cut a cake in two with a sharp knife.

Mr. DAVIS. But what is it the gentleman wants? What is it you ask? Do you not ask us to restrict our own roads so that you may have the full benefit of unrestricted service on the Canadian roads?

Mr. NELSON. No, sir; we do not. I have explained what we want. There is nothing in this railroad Canadian scare any more than there is in the military scare.

Mr. DAVIS. But is it not true that our roads are restricted by the interstate-commerce act?

Mr. NELSON. Now talk of this scare. What does it amount to? We will take care of Manitoba if you will just let us alone; all there is of it. We have had a good deal of discussion about the tariff on lumber here, and that question has made quite a figure in Congress. They said that Canada would destroy our lumber trade. Why, from the west end of Lake Superior almost to Puget Sound there is scarcely any merchantable pine lumber. The most of the pine used in the province of Manitoba itself comes from Minnesota, and to-day were it not for the customs barrier and if the railroad system were perfect as contemplated, all the trade of Manitoba would come to the cities of St. Paul and Minneapolis, and build up two of the grandest cities—without rival absolutely—on this continent. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS. Before the gentleman from Minnesota takes his seat I wish to ask him a question. I would inquire of the gentleman from Minnesota whether he does not ask that these railroads shall be exempted from the operation of the interstate-commerce law?

Mr. NELSON. I have not asked that.

Mr. COX. You want to reduce the tariff, do you not?

Mr. NELSON. I want our Northwest transportation system to be let alone. I do not want it throttled in the interest of a few trunk lines or a single great city.

Mr. DAVIS. Do you not want to exempt them from the operation of the law?

Mr. SEYMOUR. Let me answer the gentleman. We do not want any protection in the United States as far as the interstate-commerce law is concerned, or that these roads shall be exempted from it. All we ask is to be allowed to conduct our operations in our own way.

Mr. DAVIS. But as a through line you ask that these roads, to which you refer, shall be exempted, and therefore given a great advantage over all of the other roads.

Mr. SEYMOUR. Not as between any lines of roads within the United States.

Mr. CANNON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON. I want to know what this is all about, anyway. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. There is no question before the committee at this time.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I want to be heard for a few moments.

Mr. SAYERS. I must insist upon action on the bill. I have indulged gentlemen to speak on this question and on other matters entirely foreign to the bill. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] led off and started up a row, and now he wants to reply. I will submit that just as soon as I get through with the bill I will give him all the time the House will allow.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I only want a little while.

Mr. SAYERS. A minute or two?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Well, say a minute and a half. [Laughter.]

Mr. SAYERS. Very well.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I am obliged to the gentleman from Minnesota for his explanation of this railroad system, and am glad he made it. I congratulate the State of Minnesota or any other State whose citizens enter into such enterprises. I believe in progress.

But, sir, the point I raised, and it has not been touched upon by him, is that the Canadian Pacific Railroad and the Grand Trunk Railroad are not obliged to comply with the provisions of the interstate-commerce law. In other words, they can violate it whenever they please. They can make pools, they can allow rebates, they can charge more for a short haul than for a long haul. They not only carry from the Pacific coast to the Atlantic seaboard without breaking bulk, but they carry between points of the United States.

Now, I know that Minnesota and the Northwest and New York on the seaboard can take care of Canada. The gallant men there can take care of Canada. I have not a Canada scare now, and if I had it a little while ago I have got over it after hearing the statements made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR] [laughter]; but what I want this committee to think about is the fact that the Senate of the United States has appointed a committee to examine into the purchase of these railroads in Minnesota by the Canadian Pacific and the Grand Trunk, to know and to report to Congress whether the legitimate commerce of the United States is not diverted from our trunk-lines, in which we have billions of capital invested, for the benefit of the lines in Canada.

Mr. NELSON. What about the agricultural interests of the great Northwest?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. It does not affect that. It is not intended to affect that. While Mr. REAGAN (now Senator) was chairman of the Committee on Commerce, and while laboring for the completion of the interstate-commerce bill, which finally passed this House and became law, he always saw that in the future there would be considerable trouble growing out of this very question; and I hope the House, when we take up the bill amending the interstate-commerce law, will perfect legislation which will bring these trunk-lines under the operation of the interstate-commerce law

Mr. BAYNE. I propose an amendment to section 4 of the bill.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Is the committee now considering the first or the fourth section?

The CHAIRMAN. It is considering the fourth, and the Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is proposed to amend section 4, first clause, so as to read:

"SEC. 4. For the erection, purchase, or manufacture of the necessary buildings and other structures, machinery, tools, and fixtures for an army gun factory, for finishing and assembling heavy ordnance, to be erected at the Allegheny arsenal, Pittsburgh, Pa., $750,000."

Mr. SAYERS. I desire to raise the point of order upon that amendment, upon the ground that it proposes to erect an entirely new establishment where none now exists.

Mr. BAYNE. I beg the gentleman's pardon. There is an arsenal there, and a better one by far than that which you have at Watervliet.

Mr. SAYERS. From the gentleman's statement that there is one in existence at Pittsburgh at the present time, I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. BAYNE. Does the gentleman insist upon the point of order? I say that there is an arsenal at Pittsburgh; that they have a factory there and many implements which are used in the manufacture of guns.

Mr. SAYERS. Is that a Government factory?

Mr. BAYNE. It is a Government factory, worth twenty times as much as the factory at Watervliet.

Mr. SAYERS. Is it not a disused factory?

Mr. FARQUHAR. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] mean to say that the factory at Pittsburgh is twenty times greater in equipment?

Mr. BAYNE. I mean that the value of the property is twenty times what it is in New York.

Mr. SAYERS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if the factory that he speaks of is a Government establishment now in operation?

Mr. BAYNE. It is.

Mr. TRACEY. Are they making guns there?

Mr. BAYNE. I do not know whether they are making guns there, but they have the machinery.

Mr. MILLIKEN. When was the last gun made there?

Mr. BAYNE. I do not know; but it was a number of years ago. They manufactured nearly everything during the late war.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Have they made anything there since the war?

Mr. BAYNE. I do not know whether they have or not; but they did during the war manufacture considerable ordnance.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Did they not abandon that for another place?

Mr. BAYNE. They would not have to stop for anything.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Then why did they stop?

Mr. BAYNE. I am not questioning the right of the United States to stop the work there; I am only stating the advantages of that place for an arsenal.

Mr. FARQUHAR. But the main fact is that they did abandon it.

Mr. BAYNE. The main fact is that they never did. They have manufactured there quite as much as they have elsewhere. I hope the gentleman from Texas will withdraw his point of order.

Mr. SAYERS. No, sir; I can not withdraw the point of order.

Mr. COX. Will my friend from Pennsylvania show us the law establishing this Government arsenal at Pittsburgh?

Mr. BAYNE. I do not know that I can. It has been there so long that I can not at this moment put my hand upon the law authorizing its establishment.

Mr. DALZELL. It has been there almost since the beginning of the Government.

Mr. BAYNE. I trust the gentleman from Texas will withdraw his point of order. I do not want to waste time upon a point of order. The point of order does not lie. I desire to be heard for fifteen minutes on the merits of this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The question of order must be first disposed of before the merits can be discussed.

Mr. BAYNE. Will the Chair please state what the point of order is?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] has raised the point of order and will restate it.

Mr. SAYERS. The point of order is this: that there is no present existing operating work at Pittsburgh authorized by law, and that therefore the amendment is not in order.

Mr. BAYNE. What authorized existing work is there at Watervliet, N. Y., which justifies an appropriation?

Mr. SAYERS. They have been making guns there for years.

Mr. COX. They are making two large guns there now.

Mr. BAYNE. They have made guns at Pittsburgh for years.

Mr. COX. Years past.

Mr. BAYNE. Yes, sir; years past.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, do I understand that there is an arsenal at Pittsburgh owned by the Government?

Mr. BAYNE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. And the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is to have this plant located at that arsenal rather than at Watervliet?

Mr. BAYNE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. In 1862 the Government manufactured some large guns which were brought to this city. I wish to inquire whether those guns were not manufactured at the Government arsenal at Watervliet?

Mr. BAYNE. Yes, sir; they were.

Mr. COX. And there has been no work done there since that.

Mr. BAYNE. I have not inspected the arsenal and shops at Pittsburgh recently, but I went through them at one time with a committee of the House of Representatives. If I remember correctly, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] was there, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. RANDALL], was there, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] was there. Those gentlemen were all there and saw the establishment, and I am sure they were satisfied that it presented advantages infinitely greater than any that West Troy can present, and I do not think that any business man having a particle of sense would go to Watervliet to locate the Government gun foundry when he could locate one at Pittsburgh. [Laughter.]

Mr. SOWDEN. Did they not manufacture at the Pittsburgh arsenal the largest guns that were manufactured during the war?

Mr. BAYNE. The largest guns that we made during the war were made there. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] has been through the arsenal and can testify to its capacity. I supposed that the committees of the House would know where these Government arsenals are, and that to furnish information upon such a subject would be a work of supererogation on the part of myself or any other member of the House.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, before the Chair decides the point of order, I wish to inquire whether it is not rather a shadowy line of distinction which the gentleman from Texas draws when he argues that we can appropriate $750,000 to erect new buildings and engage in a new work at one arsenal, while we can not make an appropriation for another because the manufacture of guns there may have ceased?

Mr. SAYERS. My friend does not state the facts correctly. The work at Watervliet is not a new one. It has been in operation for years.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. This is an amendment to a provision of the bill reported by the committee, which bill has been discussed and is now before us and not subject to any point of order. So that you have before the committee this proposition "for the erection, purchase, or manufacture of the necessary buildings and other structures, machinery, tools, and fixtures for an army gun factory for finishing and assembling heavy ordnance, to be erected at the Watervliet arsenal, West Troy, N. Y., in accordance with the recommendation of the Gun Foundry Board of February 16, 1884, $750,000."

Now, practically this $750,000 is to be used for new operations at the Watervliet arsenal.

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me to make a suggestion in aid of what he is saying? It is expressly provided in the bill that not more than a certain amount shall be used "for the erection of two sets of officers' quarters"—evidently new buildings.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Yes. The gentleman has anticipated a suggestion which I was about to make, that the provisions of the bill show that this is a new work, and that practically we are going into a new operation at Watervliet, at a cost of three-quarters of a million of dollars, for the purpose of manufacturing heavy ordnance.

Now, I am not opposing that proposition at all; but it seems to me that we may be driven into a very narrow corner upon the point of order, if it shall be held that we can only go into new operations of this character at some place which, by some sort of fortunate accident, has had the manufacture of guns continued; and I do not like the idea that the American Congress is to be limited in its selection of a proper place for this work to some place or places where there happens to have been a continuance of this kind of work.

It seems to me that the third clause of Rule XXI does not fairly apply:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill or be in order as an amendment thereto for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriation for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

I do not think this comes under the head of an appropriation for a public work already in progress. There is no public work in progress at Watervliet, and no public work, in the sense in which I think the phrase is used here, is contemplated. Does it, then, come under the term "objects," as used in the clause, "for such public works and objects as are already in progress?" What is the object of this appropriation? It is not merely to erect works at Watervliet; that is simply the mode of accomplishing some other object.

This is not like erecting a public building in which to hold a court. It is the creation of a tool with which to carry on a different business altogether—the business of manufacturing heavy ordnance. That is the object of this appropriation; and that object, in a certain sense, has been in existence ever since we established an armory. I think the fair construction is that the Government of the United States has the power to erect new buildings to carry on these operations anywhere in America; that this is precisely analogous to the establishment of a fortification or the location of an encampment or a drill-ground for its Army.

I confess that the view of this provision adopted by my friend from Texas appears to me a narrow one. I am not particularly interested in either the Allegheny arsenal or the Watervliet arsenal. If it be in order hereafter to insert a new place I say very frankly I wish to strike out both Watervliet and Allegheny and put in Lexington, Ky.; for since I have heard the discussion which has gone on here I think we ought to put this arsenal at some entirely safe place. We are such a defenseless country, our shores are so entirely destitute of any means of defense, we are so much at the mercy of any foreign power that in thinking of this question it has struck me that Lexington would be an excellent place at which to make these guns. It is on the other side of the Allegheny Mountains; it is on this side of the Rocky Mountains. It is about the center of population. It has a stream too small for anything but a dug-out to navigate. It is an entirely safe place.

A MEMBER. What State is it in?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. A gentleman asks me what State it is in. That question evidently comes from a gentleman entirely free from any taste for good whisky. [Laughter.] Any gentleman having the bonhomie to enjoy a good drink of whisky would not ask where Lexington is. It is in a State "flowing with milk and honey;" and for any gentleman who will come and see the foundation of this arsenal laid there will be added to these a little "Old Bourbon."

A MEMBER. And peach brandy?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. No, we do not have peach brandy; that comes from the mountain country represented by my friend from North Carolina.

It seems to me we ought not to cut off Lexington from her chance of having this arsenal, for if located there it will be in a place absolutely safe, where it can not be shelled by the guns of a war vessel from Venezuela or be subjected to danger of attack on the part of any of these countries which, according to the remarks of gentlemen on this floor, may at any time levy tribute upon our seaboard cities, put our institutions in danger, and render the civilization of America a thing of the past. [Laughter.] Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I hope you will not cut off the possibility of locating this arsenal in a perfectly safe part of the country by sustaining the point of order raised by my friend from Texas.

Seriously, Mr. Chairman, a work of this magnitude ought to be founded with a view to the future. Neither Pittsburgh nor Watervliet is rightly located; to each are grave if not insuperable objections. Kentucky is about the center of population; her mountains are full of iron, coal, and timber; and all the material needed for heavy ordnance can be obtained there in exhaustless quantities and within extremely short distances. Lexington is now a railroad center; there the three Southern systems—the Cincinnati Southern, the Louisville and Nashville, and the Huntington systems—meet; and new railroads are in progress of construction. It has a population of perhaps 25,000, situated in the finest agricultural country in the world, equal to that of any city of equal size in the country.

Frankfort, on the Kentucky River, which will soon be locked and dammed from its source, in the very center of unsurpassed mineral wealth, Louisville, on the Ohio, really are more advantageously located for these works, so far as the future is concerned, than is that of Pittsburgh or Watervliet. The constant neglect of that splendid empire west of Pennsylvania and watered by the Mississippi and its tributaries, when the expenditure of the revenues is made, must soon come to an end. This committee will not to-day heed these observations and will treat them as lightly made. But it will not be many years when such utterances will command attention and be followed by substantial results.

I will not on this question of order detain the committee with any remarks on the main question, the wisdom of inaugurating large expenditures on seacoast fortifications and heavy ordnance. New and additional fortifications necessitate an increased standing army, and the rivalry of seacoast and lake and gulf cities will cause first contention and then combination as to expenditures; and under the certain combination the fortification appropriation bill will largely exceed the annual river and harbor bill.

And as the fortifications and Army increase, we will be compelled to construct more ordnance, manufacture more guns, erect new quarters, enlarge our military stores, and in numerous ways add to our annual expenditures. Greater power will grow in the hands of the Executive. Larger income will be needed, taxation must be increased; that increase will be in the interest of the strong and united. For one I do not see my way clear to start in that direction, and the pretense of danger from abroad is to me only a pretense.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Chairman, with respect to the point of order, it appears to me that the appropriation now under discussion is in order under the third clause of Rule XXI, which simply prohibits in any appropriation bill "any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriation for such public works and objects as are already in progress."

So far as regards myself and the district which I have the honor to represent, it is a matter of very little concern whether the point of order is sustained or not. We have no desire to have this work continued at the Watervliet arsenal if the Congress of the United States does not wish it. This matter has been under consideration for some years. Under an act of Congress of March 3, 1883, a board of Army and Navy officers was appointed—

For the purpose of examining and reporting to Congress which of the navy-yards or arsenals owned by the Government has the best location and is best adapted for the establishment of a Government foundry, or what other method, if any, should be adopted for the manufacture of heavy ordnance adapted to modern warfare, for the use of the Army and Navy of the United States; the cost of all buildings, tools, and implements necessary to be used in the manufacture thereof, including the cost of a steam-hammer or apparatus of sufficient size for the manufacture of the heaviest guns.

This board, which was called the Gun Foundry Board, visited all the gun foundries of Europe as well as all the arsenals in the United States. It visited Pittsburgh, Watervliet, Frankford, and Rock Island. I have here the report of that board showing that on the 31st of May, 1883, it held a meeting at Pittsburgh, Pa. As a result of its investigation this board recommended the establishment of two gun factories under the control of the Government, and selected the Watervliet arsenal, West Troy, N. Y., as the location of the gun factory for the Army, and the Washington navy-yard as the place for the gun factory for the Navy. Among the arsenals which were considered by the board with reference to their suitability for this work were the Allegheny arsenal, the Frankford arsenal, and the Watervliet arsenal. The Allegheny arsenal having been dropped by the board as not well suited for the purpose, the question as finally presented was between the Watervliet arsenal and the Frankford arsenal.

Last year the War Department anticipated legislation on this matter and determined to settle the question. It appointed a board consisting of the commandant of the Frankford arsenal, an officer from Watervliet, and an officer stationed at neither point. That board reported unanimously in favor of Watervliet as the best adapted for the work.

In consequence of the report of that board the War Department went to work and assembled at Watervliet arsenal the machinery useful in the manufacture of guns. They are now engaged at that arsenal in making one 10-inch, one 8-inch, and some field pieces. It will take them about a year to complete these two guns.

Of course if the appropriation provided for in this bill is agreed to the work can go on, and fifty guns can be made, if necessary, as it will depend entirely upon the amount of steel forging placed within their disposition.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, a piece of folly for the gentleman from Pennsylvania to rise now in this House and attempt to disturb this legislation. As far as I am concerned I have had nothing to do with it. So far as I know the authorities interested in the establishment of this arsenal for the manufacture of guns were allowed to do so without interference from the outside. It was my intention to submit some remarks on the subject when the bill was pending in the House, but I did not get the opportunity to do so. The question has been determined on the report of the board of officers after careful examination, and so far as my people are concerned they made no effort to influence the action of that board. Watervliet has been designated simply and solely because it is the best point for the purposes for which it is designed.

Mr. ADAMS. The words "finishing and assembling" are essential words under the rule as to the point of order. They are essential words indicating the character and object of the work provided for in this section 4. These words "finishing and assembling," Mr. Chairman, are technical words. They do not apply to any old-fashioned ordnance. They only apply to modern field guns of high power. They are new work in this country.

Now, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is no more obnoxious to the point of order than the section which he proposes to amend. Having proposed in this section to make cast-iron guns—and it having been the habit of the Government to make cast-iron guns at Watervliet—do you propose to claim this is not a new work and a subject within the meaning of the rules? But for three years we have gone on to manufacture a new sort of gun. It is not cast-iron or a cast-steel gun. It is a gun of wrought steel which is assembled, and the words "finishing and assembling" have reference distinctly to the kind of public work or object for which section 4 has been inserted in the bill. Therefore section 4 is as much for a new work as the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I doubt very much whether any committee can put into the bill a section subject to the point of order and yet preclude members of the House from moving to amend that provision.

Mr. DOCKERY. I move to amend the bill by striking out, in the fourth line of section 4, the words "Watervliet arsenal, West Troy, N. Y.," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "for the establishment of an arsenal at Liberty, Clay County, Missouri."

Mr. SAYERS. I reserve the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. SOWDEN. I move at this time, so the amendment may be pending, to strike out, in line 4, section 4, the words "Watervliet arsenal, West Troy, N. Y.," and insert in lieu thereof "South Bethlehem, Pa."

Mr. SAYERS. I reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to decide the point of order.

Mr. SAYERS. Very well, let us have the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to section 4 of this bill simply strikes out the words "Watervliet arsenal, West Troy, N. Y.," as designated in accordance with the recommendation of the Gun Foundry Board, and inserts the words which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Allegheny arsenal, Pittsburgh, Pa.

The CHAIRMAN. This arsenal at Allegheny being one of the established arsenals of the United States, and it seems to be conceded by the statement of the gentleman from New York, the Chair is of the opinion the question as to whether the work should be continued at Watervliet or transferred to Pittsburgh is one for the committee and not for the Chair to determine. It is not within the province of the Chair to suppress the amendment as being out of order. The Chair will, therefore, entertain the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and overrules the point of order.

Mr. BAYNE. I ask now, Mr. Chairman, to be heard for fifteen minutes on this amendment.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent that the debate be limited to fifteen minutes on each side, thirty minutes in all.

Mr. BAYNE. My colleague [Mr. DALZELL] wants to be heard for five minutes.

Mr. SAYERS. I do not propose to take any part in this discussion as to the question whether the appropriation shall be made for Watervliet or Pittsburgh.

Mr. COX. Or Liberty, Mo. [Laughter.]

Mr. SAYERS. No; or Liberty, Mo.; I will include that.

Mr. SOWDEN. Nor South Bethlehem.

Mr. SAYERS. Nor South Bethlehem; I will throw that in also for good measure. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAYNE. I think that perhaps twenty minutes on a side might be satisfactory.

Mr. SAYERS. Very well; say twenty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit that request to the House. Is there objection to closing the debate on this paragraph of the bill, and all amendments thereto, at the expiration of forty minutes, twenty on each side?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. What is meant by twenty minutes on a side? Some of us are against both of these provisions.

Mr. HOOKER. I suppose the gentleman is for Lexington. [Laughter.]

Mr. SAYERS. In order to meet the views of gentlemen around me, I will suggest that at a quarter past 4 o'clock a vote be taken upon all the amendments. This will give nearly three-quarters of an hour.

Mr. HOOKER. I suggest to the gentleman he had better make it one hour.

Mr. FORNEY. That is nearly an hour.

Mr. SAYERS. I will say an hour, then.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. To be equally divided?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. How to be divided?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will endeavor to recognize gentlemen fairly as between the several pending propositions.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed in one hour?

There was no objection.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I desire now to be heard for fifteen minutes.

It often occurs in the experience of gentlemen upon the floor of this House that amendments are offered because they desire to favor their particular districts. I think with my knowledge of the location of the arsenal at Pittsburgh and its condition, as well as its surroundings and capabilities, with the great advantage of its position, that I should offer this amendment to this bill were I a resident of any other State in the Union or situated most remotely from this point.

Mr. HOOKER. Will the gentleman allow a question——

Mr. BAYNE. Later on I will permit an inquiry; not now.

Mr. HOOKER. It is very pertinent just now, if the gentleman would allow it.

Mr. BAYNE. Not at present.

By orders issued in March, 1887, a board was appointed and directed to examine two of the arsenals of the country with a view to locate a national foundry at one of them. That board was directed to examine the arsenals at Frankford, Philadelphia, and at West Troy, N. Y. They made a diligent, faithful examination of the two arsenals specified and reported their judgment respecting them.

Mr. HOOKER. Is that the board of which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] was a member?

Mr. BAYNE. No, sir.

That board was constituted of the following members: Lieut. Col. Edward W. Flagler, Lieut. Col. Albert Mordecai, Lieut. Col. Francis H. Parker, and Capt. Rogers Birnie.

Mr. HOOKER. In what year was that?

Mr. BAYNE. In March, 1887.

They were instructed to examine these two arsenals, which indicates to my mind that the propositions here of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] and my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN], showing a personal preference for certain locations, had run into the minds of the persons who framed that provision, and had thereby limited this board to the consideration of the two arsenals to the exclusion of all the others.

I have no fault to find with the gentlemen who thus secured, either by law or order of the Department, the location of this arsenal on recommendation showing the personal preference which the board itself had. That is the way things are done to a large extent in these days. One of these gentlemen represented that side of the House and the other this side of the House, so that if there be fault to find in any direction the fault lies clearly on each side.

That board reported that the essentials to the proper location of the permanent foundry were facilities for and possibility of extension; facilities for foundations of buildings; for proving butts, and facilities for firing; facilities for railroad communication, and facilities for water communication; facilities for transporting and receiving guns and materials; for transporting and receiving coal; facilities for transporting and receiving manufactures and supplies of all kinds; facilities for shipping and transporting guns to the required points; convenience of proximity of gun factory to the establishments for the manufacture of forgings; facilities for labor; safety from hostile operations; climate and health. Of these requirements there are some which are more important than others, and among those commanding importance, those which strike me as being the most important, is the convenience of proximity of gun factory to establishments for manufacturing forgings, and the item of transportation to and from your national gun factory is of equal importance.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BAYNE. Not now.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Just one question.

Mr. BAYNE. No, not now.

Another question which rises to importance is the facility for shipping and transporting guns to required points.

That is another matter of great importance. Another is the presence of skilled labor. Another, and a primary one, is the safety from hostile operations.

Now, I undertake to say that if this committee will judge these places on these characteristics that there is not a gentleman on this floor who will not cast his vote for the Allegheny arsenal, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BAYNE. Not now. Later I will give you an opportunity.

With reference to the facilities for shipping and transporting guns to the required points, there are at Pittsburgh four trunk-railway lines, and the competition between them will protect the Government against unjust charges. There is water transportation that is equal to any demands that may be made upon them. At Watervliet arsenal, New York, there is but one railroad line, which would have a monopoly of the business and could charge the Government whatever it saw fit to charge for the transportation of guns to and from that place.

Mr. FARQUHAR. It can go there by water or by rail.

Mr. BAYNE. There is a water way to Watervliet, and there there would be competition; but first let me speak as to the fitness and proximity of a gun factory to a factory that manufactures forgings. Forgings are made at Pittsburgh, and you will have to take forgings to Watervliet arsenal, at West Troy, N. Y., to manufacture guns.

Mr. FARQUHAR. We will take care of that.

Mr. BAYNE. Of course you will take care of that when the Government is to pay for it, but if you were an individual you would not.

Mr. FARQUHAR. In my own time I will answer that.

Mr. BAYNE. That is all right.

The forgings are made at Pittsburgh, and they can be transported from the mills into the arsenal at an insignificant cost, the waste material can be returned to the mills and used over again, and the Government can economize in every way. As to the labor, there is no place in the United States where there are so many skilled artisans concentrated as at Pittsburgh. It represents almost every phase of skilled industry. It represents men specially skilled in the manufacture of steel and iron and all their products. It is therefore the place with reference to labor, one of those things which the commission say should be a controlling matter in deciding upon the locality.

As to safety from hostile operations, Pittsburgh is surrounded by mountains. Whenever a hostile force reaches Pittsburgh it will have taken the whole country; and when it has taken Pittsburgh it will have taken the best part of the United States. [Laughter.] Now, with reference to the security of Watervliet arsenal, at West Troy, N. Y., which is the place indicated in this bill, this commission says:

> Frankford arsenal is not now safe from hostile fleets, or even from a single powerful armored raiding vessel; but it could be so defended by fortification, torpedoes, and the Navy as to make it practically safe.
> In case of war with Great Britain, Watervliet is on the probable line of hostile operations and would be in greater danger of capture by a land force than the arsenal at Philadelphia.
> A proper system of national defense would so protect these arsenals as to render either a sufficiently safe location for a large gun factory.

In other words, according to the report of the commission, if you locate it at either Frankford, Philadelphia, or Watervliet, West Troy, N. Y., the first thing to do will be to manufacture guns and surround the national factory with them in order to protect it from hostile invasion.

Mr. SAWYER. No enemy will ever reach Troy from either the north or the south.

Mr. BAYNE. This is the report of the Army officers, who probably have as much skill as my able friend from New York. I do not know how much of a general he was during the war, but these gentlemen say it will be in the line of hostile operations. It is only about 200 miles across to the Canadian line and it is open country, and there is nothing to prevent anybody or any hostile force going there, and, as was suggested to me by a gentleman on the other side when looking at the map, Napoleon or Phil. Sheridan with any force could have gone down there in a very short time and destroyed the national foundry and leave the Government without that which it wants in time of war.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I think Pittsburgh was not a very safe place when it was held by a mob for days only a few years ago.

Mr. BAYNE. Now, Mr. Chairman, what about this ground at Watervliet. They have got 109 acres there, and the water annually passes over it. One half of it is subject to perennial overflows of water, and the other half of it is on a somewhat elevated site which is not in danger of an overflow of water, but upon which the shops would have to be constructed if they were placed in the best position for security. The shops, however, are constructed upon this lower portion of the ground which is subject to perennial overflows of water.

This board, Mr. Chairman, after having gone all the way through and compared in detail the advantages and disadvantages of Frankford at Philadelphia and Watervliet at West Troy, crediting one with the advantage in one respect and the other with the advantage in another respect, winds up by this suggestion:

> The board is of the opinion that Watervliet arsenal is better adapted than Frankford for the concentration and installation of the present gun plant of the Department and for the establishment of a fully equipped gun factory.

But the facts which the board cites and the argument which the board makes are against Watervliet as a proper location for a national gun foundry. It is open to a foreign enemy; it would require special protection; it has not got skilled labor; it has not got materials; and as to fuel, the fuel would have to be taken there and would cost more than twice as much—I would be quite safe in saying three times as much—as fuel would cost at Pittsburgh. I do not know at what price per ton coke sells at West Troy, N. Y., but I do know that it sells in Pittsburgh at $1.25 a ton, and, as my colleague [Mr. DALZELL] suggests, it is now down to $1 a ton. I venture to say, on the other hand, that coke will cost at Watervliet $3 a ton, although I do not profess to have exact knowledge on that point, and certainly coal or any other fuel that may be used will cost a proportionately high price.

Now, if this Government did business on business principles and according to business methods, would it overlook a place like the Allegheny arsenal at Pittsburgh, where there is the labor, where there are in close proximity all the requirements for the construction of ordnance, where there is transportation, where there is cheap fuel, where every advantage and facility exists—would the Government, I ask, overlook a place like that, and prefer to it a place like West Troy, N. Y., which is open to all the objections that are urged against it even by this very commission which reported in favor of it under the compulsion of the orders which were given? For, mark you, gentlemen, the duty assigned to this commission was not to give their judgment as to whether or not either of these places should be chosen at all for such a purpose. That was not the inquiry. The business assigned to the commission was to say which one of these two places was the better, and they said that Watervliet at West Troy was rather the better of the two. If the commission had had that enlarged liberty of action which it should have had, if it had been permitted to go to Pittsburgh, to Cincinnati, to Bethlehem, to the point in Missouri that has been named, and to various other points in the country, and had had an opportunity to examine fully the facilities and advantages of each place, it is very certain that it never would have chosen Watervliet as the location for a national gun factory, because that place has not got a single requisite for the purpose. Everything has to be taken there. The machinery has got to be taken there; the fuel has got to be taken there; the labor has got to be taken there; everything has got to be taken there. At Pittsburgh, on the contrary, you find everything concentrated right at hand for use in your gun factory. And, as I said a little while ago, if the question were left to a business man it could be decided only in one way. I would not fear to leave the decision to any business man in this House, to any man without prejudice in favor of either locality. I do not think there is a single member of this body who, if it were left to his unbiased decision, would not locate this gun factory at Pittsburgh rather than at West Troy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FARQUHAR was recognized.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, there are thirty minutes allowed on each side.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. BAYNE. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR] is on the side of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS].

Mr. SAYERS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will endeavor to divide the time equally between both sides.

Mr. SAYERS. We do not want any misunderstanding about this matter of time. How much time has the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] occupied?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty minutes.

Mr. SAYERS. How much time does the gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR] expect to take?

Mr. FARQUHAR. About ten minutes; I can not tell exactly.

Mr. SAYERS. I will state for the information of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] that there are other persons who desire to speak in behalf of their special localities.

Mr. BAYNE. Yes; but we are to have thirty minutes in favor of the location for this arsenal at Pittsburgh.

Mr. SAYERS. Was that your understanding?

Mr. BAYNE. Oh, yes; that was my understanding.

Mr. SAYERS. Very well.

Mr. BAYNE. And I propose to yield the remaining ten minutes to my colleague [Mr. DALZELL], who represents the Pittsburgh district.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR] desire?

Mr. FARQUHAR. I presume that that matter rests with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS]. I think I can get through in seven or eight minutes.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania called attention to the proceedings of a board which met at Watertown arsenal, Massachusetts, on the 29th of March, 1887, under instructions to proceed to Frankford arsenal, and also to Watervliet, and make a selection between the two. He also called attention to the various features which were to be considered by this board—some fourteen in number. I now send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] took very good care should not be read to this House—that is, the findings of this same board. I am not questioning the ability of the members of this board. They were Colonel Flagler, Colonel Mordecai, Colonel Parker, and Captain Birnie. But I want to say, in plain, blunt language, that not one assertion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania had a particle of influence or effect, or even had any consideration, with any Army officer who has ever considered this question.

Now, we are left to the wisdom of the friends of this Allegheny arsenal to tell us something later than the report of this board of officers, who made full examination of this subject.

I have no time to enter into details as to the location of the Watervliet arsenal, or its facilities for this class of work. I am satisfied that Army officers who have grown gray in the service know more about the requirements for an arsenal than does the gentleman from Pennsylvania, or any one from that end of his State.

I now desire to have read the paragraph which closes the finding of this board—a recommendation on which I believe Congress ought to take action.

The Clerk read as follows:

After careful consideration of all the points discussed the board finds that in all matters except the following there is no decided superiority in one of these arsenals over the other. Watervliet provides excellent foundations, whereas Frankford does not. Firing facilities can be obtained at Watervliet, but not at Frankford. The former has better facilities for labor, and its water connection with the northern frontier is of importance; but its great and important advantages over Frankford are that the immediate concentration of the Department gun plant can be there effected more cheaply, that it has larger and better buildings and more ground for immediate expansion, and that unoccupied adjacent lands furnish the possibility of extension in the distant future into so great an establishment as the future wants of the country may demand.

What these future wants may be is indicated by the magnitude of the armaments that will be required as stated in the report of the Gun Foundry Board, 1884; the report of the House Committee on Ordnance, first session Forty-ninth Congress, 1886; the report of the Board on Fortifications, 1886, and the fact that history shows that these armaments will change and require renewal.

The board is of the opinion that Watervliet arsenal is better adapted than Frankford for the concentration and installation of the present gun plant of the Department, and for the establishment of a fully equipped gun factory.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Now, Mr. Chairman, following the recommendations of this board, the Government has already transferred from the other arsenals all the machinery and appliances suited to the establishment of a gun foundry for the Army. Everything at the Allegheny arsenal which could be of utility in this regard, all the machinery of the South Boston Iron Works, all the necessary appliances at other points were, after the making of this report, transferred under the directions of the Secretary of War to Watervliet, so that to-day, according to the official report of the ordnance officer, there is at Watervliet, N. Y., the most perfectly equipped gun foundry to be found in the United States.

At this time, when we are discussing the merits of Allegheny, Pa., Liberty, Mo., and Lexington, Ky., it may be appropriate to read the following from the last report of the Chief of Ordnance.

The report of the board having been approved by the Secretary of War, steps were at once taken to prepare the shops at the Watervliet arsenal for the contemplated work, and the necessary instructions were issued to the various points for the shipment to Watervliet of the machinery designated by the board. The work has now progressed so far that it is confidently expected that the shops will be in working operation by the middle of November. The Department will then begin the work of manufacturing one 10-inch B. L. steel gun, one 8-inch B. L. steel gun, and twenty-five 3.2-inch B. L. steel field guns.

In the annual estimates for the next fiscal year I have asked for a small appropriation to supply some necessary adjuncts to the plant now collected at this arsenal, such as railway-track facilities within the grounds, a suitable bridge across the canal, additional water-power facilities, a loading-crane, etc. These additions will complete the present plant and enable the Department to make small guns in limited quantity and experimental or type guns of large size, probably up to 12 inches caliber.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that after this board of officers, consisting of men specially chosen for the purpose, have selected Watervliet arsenal as the proper location for this gun foundry, after the Government has expended tens of thousands of dollars in transferring the material and machinery from other points to this arsenal, it is certainly strange if an unsubstantiated assertion—and there have been many such—by the gentleman from Pennsylvania should have any influence in determining the judgment of this House in opposition to the finding of this board. The Committee on Appropriations has very properly reported in favor of this location at Watervliet; and I submit that it is now impossible for this House to reopen this question and propose another location unless upon the judgment of a board similar to that which has already examined this subject and made its official report.

I reserve what time I may have remaining.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, on the 16th of February, 1884, the board of officers known as the Gun Foundry Board made to the President of the United States a report in which they answered specifically certain interrogatories which had been propounded. The first interrogatory was:

Which of the navy-yards or arsenals owned by the Government is the best location and is best adapted for the establishment of a Government foundry?

This interrogatory was answered in the following terms:

The board does not recommend the establishment of a Government foundry, properly so called, which shall provide for the manufacture of steel and the fabrication of cannon. It considers that every inducement should be offered to attract the private industries of the country to the aid of the Government in providing ordnance for the Army and Navy, and that the steel manufacturers should be called upon to provide the material.

In answering the second interrogatory the board said:

With Government gun factories established for both the Army and the Navy there will be still needed the hearty co-operation of the private industries of the country. This can not be aroused unless there is held out to them a fair prospect of remuneration.

It is apparent, therefore, that the industry intended to be established, so far as the Government is concerned, is simply that which shall be supplemental to private individual enterprise; in other words, the Government is to finish and assemble these guns after private enterprise shall have performed its task. If that be so, then the proper place to establish the gun factory—mark you, not the gun foundry—depends upon two things: it depends upon situation with respect to possibilities of defense and possibilities of access, and it depends upon the industrial character of the place. Now, in both these particulars—and I do not propose to go into detail as my colleague has done—both as to local situation and as to industrial character, I venture the assertion that there is no place on the American continent which can compare in either respect with the city of Pittsburgh.

Mr. COX. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Has any officer of the Government ever recommended Allegheny as a suitable location for a gun factory?

Mr. DALZELL. I do not know that any officer has done so; and I do not care whether he has or not.

Mr. COX. If you do not care, then I am indifferent also. [Laughter.]

Mr. DALZELL. I am appealing to the judgment of this House upon the merits of the case, and not upon the recommendation of any Government board or of any Army officer.

A MEMBER. They do not recommend Watervliet, either.

Mr. DALZELL. I would rather trust to the honest conscientiousness of the members of this House, intelligently exercised, than to the judgment or recommendation of any officer or any board, procured I do not know how, and you do not know how.

So far as concerns security from danger in time of war Pittsburgh is surrounded upon all sides with hills. Between the eastern coast and Pittsburgh intervene the Alleghany Mountains. Now, with respect to accessibility. Situated at the headwaters of the Ohio, Pittsburgh commands the entire Mississippi system of water way. By its trunk lines it reaches the West; it reaches tide water—Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York; and by its lines of railway it stretches up and touches the Great Lakes. So that you have here the facilities for gathering material. So far as industrial characteristics are concerned, I no not propose to stultify myself or to stultify the House by describing Pittsburgh, the characteristic manufacturing city of the continent.

With respect to economy of manufacture, permit me to say that at the time the first foundry board was constituted—a board which, by the way, visited Pittsburgh—and at the time this recommendation was made, no such thing was known as now exists in the city of Pittsburgh. Since that time Providence, with lavish hand, has turned on a supply of fuel, which makes it possible to manufacture there cheaper and better than at any other place in the world. Therefore, without occupying further the time of the committee, I say that in respect to every characteristic requirement of an industry which is simply to be supplemented by the Government industry, there is no comparison between Pittsburgh and any other place upon the continent.

Mr. BAYNE. I reserve the remainder of the time.

Mr. SOWDEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] very aptly stated the case when he remarked that this was an entirely new proposition, and as such was amendable. We have presented to us in this bill a proposition to appropriate $750,000 for the purchase and erection of a national foundry for the manufacture of guns, and a contest has sprung up as to where the plant should be located. My amendment provides for the establishment of this gun foundry at South Bethlehem, Pa.

It is the most suitable place in the country for its location, since it would be in close proximity to the Bethlehem Iron Company's works, where, presumably, all the steel will be made for the manufacture of these guns.

The advantages of this place are simply superb. Its facilities for railroad communication, for receiving coal, for transporting and receiving manufacturers' supplies of all kinds, for shipping and transporting guns to required points, and its convenient and close proximity to the establishment where this gun metal or steel forgings are to be manufactured, makes it the most desirable of all the places named.

In respect to safety from hostile operations, as well as in regard to climate and health, South Bethlehem is unexcelled.

It is 55 miles due north from Philadelphia and about 85 miles due west from the city of New York. It is located in the center of the great iron and coal region of Pennsylvania. The Bethlehem Iron Company's works are located at this point, where there is in the course of construction one of the most extensive and costly plants in the world for the manufacture of steel forgings for the production of guns.

This establishment has a contract with the United States now for the supply of nearly $5,000,000 worth of steel forgings and steel armor, and it would largely save in the transportation of this steel metal if the Government should provide for the erection of a national foundry for the manufacture of guns at South Bethlehem.

Watervliet, Pittsburgh, and Liberty are simply incomparable with South Bethlehem in their facilities for the manufacture of guns, and I hope therefore that my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. COX. I wish to occupy only one minute in calling attention to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], who seems to think very lightly of the recommendation of the officers selected for the purpose of reporting upon this subject. The report of the Gun Foundry Board was published in 1884. I read from a part of the minutes of that board:

GUN FOUNDRY BOARD, 1727 PINE STREET,
Philadelphia, Pa., Wednesday, November 21, 1883.

* * * * * * * *

The board then proceeded to consider the selection of two sites to be recommended for Government gun factories, and decided upon the Watervliet arsenal, West Troy, N. Y., for the purposes of the Army, and the Washington navy-yard, D. C., for the purposes of the Navy.

I submit that this ought to be conclusive with gentlemen who desire fair, just, and intelligent legislation.

I know gentlemen on this side as well as on the other side of the House have offered amendments here in an amusing way.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I wish to say to the gentleman from New York that his remark does not apply to the amendment providing for the establishment of an arsenal at Lexington, Ky.

Mr. COX. Perhaps it may not apply to Lexington, but when the gentleman from Kentucky offered his amendment, and when the gentleman from Missouri offered his in favor of Liberty, and when the amendment was offered to replace the arsenal at Watervliet by one in Pennsylvania, it was all done in a sort of amusing way, but whether it was or not I wish to say that I stand by New York because the board to whom this matter was intrusted for investigation, composed of Army officers, has designated unmistakably the proper place for the establishment of this gun factory is Watervliet, N. Y. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I invite the attention of the committee to the amendment I have submitted providing for the establishment of the Army gun factory at Liberty, Clay County, Missouri, on the site of the old Liberty arsenal. The Government of the United States, prior to 1861, authorized and established an arsenal at Liberty, Mo., which continued in operation until the commencement of the civil war, since which time it has fallen into a condition of "innocuous desuetude," I imagine something similar to the condition of the arsenal at Pittsburgh. [Laughter.] In view of the fact, however, that this bill provides an appropriation "for the erection, purchase, or manufacture of the necessary buildings and other structures, machinery, tools, and fixtures for an Army gun factory for finishing and assembling heavy ordnance," virtually authorizing a new arsenal, I can see no good reason why such gun factory should not be located at Liberty. It is an eligible point, located midway between the oceans, about 1,300 miles from the Atlantic sea board, and of course perfectly safe from attack. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. No gun boat could get up to reach it.

Mr. DOCKERY. Of course not, as it is about 3 miles from any navigable stream. The old arsenal was located a little more than 1 mile from the "square."

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. Was it on the "level?"

Mr. DOCKERY. No, but on a considerable elevation, commanding a splendid view of the surrounding country for 20 miles or more. Mr. Chairman, Liberty is the capital city of Clay County, and has a population perhaps in excess of 3,000. Its people are enterprising, progressive, moral, and patriotic, while its facilities for transportation are very superior, as three trunk-lines of railway pass through her corporate limits.

I may also add, by way of further inducement, that Clay County is the banner Democratic county of my Congressional district, usually rolling up about 3,000 majority for the "whole ticket." [Laughter.]

Again, Mr. Chairman, the Missouri River washes the southern border of the county, and the magnificent city of Kansas is only 15 miles from its capital city. Liberty, in fact, is but a suburb of Kansas City. All the advantages that Kansas City has by reason of her sixteen lines of trunk railways, by reason of 4,000 miles of cable railways, and every other advantage incident to this great and growing city, Liberty possesses by virtue of her proximity. Mr. Chairman, I trust the amendment I have offered will receive the approval of the House.

A MEMBER. Will the gentleman find it necessary during the construction of the work to employ Pinkerton detectives?

Mr. DOCKERY. No, sir; in that respect the city of Pittsburgh will have the advantage.

Mr. KILGORE. I want to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question.

Mr. DOCKERY. Very well; be quick, I have but a moment remaining.

Mr. KILGORE. Can you beat your man without getting this appropriation? [Great laughter.]

Mr. DOCKERY. To be entirely candid, I must say that I incline to the opinion that I can. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield now to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, if a foreign war shall come upon this country it will come like a stroke of lightning from whence, or striking nowhere, we can not now form even an idea, much less a reasonable judgment as a basis for works of defense. It is just as likely to come against our Southern as against our Northern border; against our Western as against our Eastern shores. Therefore, independent of every consideration of safety in the location of a public work like this, it seems to me exceedingly important that such an establishment should be located at a place from which easy access may be had in every direction, not only for the manufactured articles to be produced therein, but for a like ingress of the materials of which they are to be composed.

Mr. SOWDEN. And Bethlehem is just the place.

Mr. BURNES. I love the name you give, but it is one signifying peace and mercy rather than tumult or guns of war.

At Pittsburgh you have everything in the way of communication and transportation that can be demanded. If you wish to go southward to the Gulf coast, to the city of New Orleans, a place where Americans once made a memorable and victorious stand, you can go by a half dozen different lines of railway and by a continuous line of navigable water way. If you wish to go to the great Northwest a dozen lines of railroad, the greatest and most powerful in the country, are at your command. If you should wish to enter Canada in the far West, the Ohio and Missouri Rivers—through without change—are ever-ready servants of your transportation. The Upper Mississippi too is alike ready to carry your guns to the northward if your lines of railway should be destroyed, as might be the case. I am speaking with reference to a proper location of the proposed works. I look at it alone as a business proposition, in connection with which you propose to spend vast sums of the public money. I do not favor the expenditure. I am for private enterprise—free competition and open doors for American genius and free American labor. Sir, the great center of population in this country has been too long ignored and defied, not only in national works of industry, but in general appropriations, and as well in general legislation and governing policies.

Sir, the center of population will soon be in the very district now so ably represented by my colleague [Mr. DOCKERY] or in that represented by myself. It is not now upon this border, upon this eastern fringe of the Republic. But up and down this eastern coast, and mainly up, the power of government, the power of appropriation, the power of legislation, the power of politics, the power of finance, and the power in almost everything of a national character, except that of honest toil on the farm or in the shops, have been too long held with an iron grip, to the detriment of the great and growing power of the masses, which will some day assert itself, and the great central heart will refuse to permit itself to be used at will by the extremities, whose unreasonable greed is insatiate. That great heart will, sooner than you think, demand equality, demand perhaps the permanent seat of government. Then power of legislation and government, the fair play which, sooner or later, every American will have, will be found where the power of the people is, and that is certainly west of the Alleghany Mountains.

Mr. Chairman, a word as to Watervliet. Will you transport your raw material for great public works, national works, works for the public defense, to Watervliet, located, they tell us, on a single line of railroad, up the Hudson River, beyond Albany, near the Canadian border, or I might say too near to it for safety? Will you thus sequester the enterprise, away off in an obscure village, over mountains and rivers, and transport everything for hundreds of miles to and from it? Or will you establish your works at the point where God placed the material right at your door ready for the skilled hands and sturdy brain of trained and veteran workmen? Will you accept the wisdom of the great Creator and take this raw material where it lies in the bowels of the earth, and there, by the light and heat of His gas, manufacture it into what you want or have some poor fears you may want; or will you by adopting Watervliet take all this material over the mountains and up a single line of railway to an obscure and unnatural place of manufacture merely to be transported back in its manufactured form?

But it is said the military authorities have recommended Watervliet. Shall the American Congress, because a few military gentlemen who, by some inscrutable dispensation of Divine Providence, find themselves housed in the city of Washington in convenient and comfortable places rather than upon the broad fields of the whole country where their services may be of some possible use, have said that the little town of West Troy was a proper place, abandon its judgment, its business sense, and ignore all the deposits and works of nature and of men?

Mr. Chairman, the amendment proposes Pittsburgh as the place for these works. It is proposed to expend an immense sum of money to fortify. One bill proposes in the course of a few years to expend fifteen to twenty millions, another proposes fifty millions, and still another $126,000,000. What for? For any public purpose? For any good that can come out of it? In the name of justice and fair dealing, if this money is to be expended let it be for public purposes, for the good of all and in a wise, economical, and business-like manner. If it is to be expended for a public purpose, let the public purposes be taken into consideration, and let the expenditure be dictated by common sense and by common reason, by the economies of business and the economies which come to us by experience. Do not, I pray you, let us be actuated by other considerations than would prompt the action of business men in the ordinary affairs of life.

Stay your gavel, Mr. Chairman, only a moment longer. If you are unwilling to locate this establishment at Pittsburgh, then give it to Liberty. Liberty is all my colleague has described, and it is near the center of our country, on the banks of a grand old river dividing the Republic in two parts.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Oh, no; not exactly.

Mr. BURNES. Perhaps not precisely, but it is about midway between New Orleans and the Canadian border and near the center of the country, on a great water way that enables transportation in both directions, whilst railroads from Liberty run in every direction, very much unlike Watervliet.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. You have got too many of them.

Mr. BURNES. By no means. We want more and are getting them rapidly. Again I say if you do not give it to Pittsburgh, then give it to Liberty. [Applause.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, rose.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask for a vote, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HOOKER. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will be allowed some time.

The CHAIRMAN. Seven minutes yet remain to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SAYERS. I hope the gentleman will not insist on taking further time.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. My understanding was that we outside fellows were to have twenty minutes—Watervliet twenty minutes, Pittsburgh twenty minutes, and we on the outside, like Mr. DOCKERY, Mr. SOWDEN, and myself were to have the other twenty, but it looks like we have been chiseled out of the twenty minutes as well as the arsenal. [Laughter.]

Mr. SAYERS. I call for a vote on the amendments, unless the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] is serious in his desire to speak on the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment to the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] to strike from the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] the words "Allegheny arsenal" and insert "Liberty, Mo."

The question was put; and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SOWDEN. I now move to amend the amendment by striking out "Watervliet arsenal, West Troy, N. Y.," and inserting in lieu thereof "South Bethlehem, Pa."

Mr. TOWNSHEND. There is no arsenal at South Bethlehem, Pa.

Mr. SOWDEN. This is a new proposition.

The amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. SOWDEN was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE].

The question was put; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BAYNE. I call for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 46, noes 56.

Mr. BAYNE. I raise the point of no quorum, so as to have tellers.

The CHAIRMAN appointed as tellers Mr. BAYNE, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. SAYERS, of Texas.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 42, noes 58.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is debate exhausted upon this proposition?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to submit a motion to strike out the pending paragraph.

Mr. SAYERS. What paragraph?

Mr. HOLMAN. The first paragraph of section 4.

Mr. SAYERS. I submit the point of order that we have passed that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. It is still subject to amendment, but not for debate.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire to know what has been done to prevent debate on the proposition?

The CHAIRMAN. All debate has been closed by order of the committee. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] now moves to strike out the first paragraph of the fourth section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. For the erection, purchase, or manufacture of the necessary buildings and other structures, machinery, tools, and fixtures for an Army gun factory for finishing and assembling heavy ordnance, to be erected at the Watervliet arsenal, West Troy, N. Y., in accordance with the recommendation of the Gun Foundry Board of February 16, 1884, $750,000: Provided, That not exceeding $20,000 of this sum may be used for the erection and completion of two sets of officers' quarters.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CHEADLE. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

After the word "manufacturers," in line 21, page 4, insert the words "who shall be resident citizens of the United States."

Mr. SAYERS. I accept that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. In line 11, I move to strike out "$500,000," so as to leave it an appropriation of $1,000,000.

Mr. SAYERS. I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that $1,500,000 is, we believe, as low as we should go.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

In line 11, after the words "one million," strike out the words "five hundred thousand dollars;" so that it will read:

"All parts of each caliber $1,000,000."

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read section 5, as follows:

SEC. 5. For the purchase of the material for, and the manufacture of, 12-inch breech-loading rifled mortars of cast-iron, hooped with steel, of about 32,000 pounds weight, similar to, and equal in range, power, and accuracy of fire to the 12-inch breech-loading mortar, cast-iron, steel-hooped, now at the Ordnance proving-ground, Sandy Hook, N. J., $500,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War in accordance with existing laws.

That the sums of money appropriated in this section and in section 4 of this act shall remain available for expenditure until and including the fiscal year 1893.

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve the point of order on that section.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to reserve the point of order, but the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] desires to be heard on that section.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order that it is new legislation.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What section had the Clerk reported?

The CHAIRMAN. The fifth section.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I want to reserve the point of order on section 5, but the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] desires to make some remarks and I will reserve it until he shall have opportunity to do so. The point of order is this, that the last paragraph of that section changes existing law:

That the sums of money appropriated in this section and in section 4 of this act shall remain available for expenditure until and including the fiscal year 1893.

Now, under the general law this would lapse into the Treasury at the end of two years. This changes existing law on that subject, and therefore it is subject to the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is right. That is a good point of order.

Mr. SAYERS. Let the point of order be sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order is well taken, and line 21 to 24 is therefore ruled out.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] is entitled to speak to the remainder of the section.

Mr. HOOKER. I will omit what I wanted to say, Mr. Chairman, in reference to the point which has been made. I am very glad to see that the House has voted down the proposition of my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], which proposed to strike out $500,000 from the appropriation of one million and a half. The gentleman having the bill in charge says that a million and a half is the smallest possible amount with which the purposes and objects of the bill can be accomplished.

Now, sir, relative to the proposition which was made under the bills which were originally reported to this House and pending here at this time making larger appropriations for the purpose of encouraging the institution or the establishment of gun factories: It is evidenced by the testimony of the gentleman who is said to be one of the finest ordnance officers of the Government, in his statement as taken before the board and before the Subcommittee on Fortifications last year, that the larger amount appropriated would reduce the price of steel.

Now, the argument has been made that the Government will only take such an amount of steel and such an amount of guns made out of steel of such a character as shall bear the tests which are to be applied, and that the Government shall only pay for them at that time and upon those terms. This gentleman was examined by the board with reference to the question of what was the requisite amount of steel to be purchased by the Government. He is conceded to be a man of very great ability and learning upon this subject, and I have been governed by his statements in the view which I have taken with regard to the propriety of making the appropriation designated in the bill which is known as the Tracey and Cutcheon bill, and which has been virtually adopted by the Senate in an amendment to the appropriation bill for the support of the Army.

I read now from the evidence of this gentleman with reference to the question of whether the policy of the Government should be to purchase a larger rather than a smaller amount of steel. I read from page 90 of this report:

Capt. C. S. Smith, of the Ordnance Department, next appeared before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your profession?

Captain SMITH. I am a captain in the Ordnance Department, on duty in the Chief of Ordnance's office.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the Army Department any gun factory?

Captain SMITH. It has to this extent: that it has collected at one of the arsenals its available gun plant and begun work there. That is, at the Watervliet arsenal.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it in pursuance of the recommendation of the board?

Captain SMITH. Yes; of the Gun Foundry Board.

The CHAIRMAN. The Navy Department has also an establishment?

Captain SMITH. They have a gun factory at the Washington navy-yard.

The CHAIRMAN. What size gun are you manufacturing now at Watervliet arsenal?

Captain SMITH. One 8-inch gun, steel built up, and one 10-inch gun of steel, also built up; besides a number of field-guns.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the capacity of that arsenal worked to its full power, say for two years?

Captain SMITH. About fifty field-guns and about two 8-inch and two 10-inch guns.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the size of a field-gun?

Captain SMITH. Three and two-tenths inches caliber, about 800 pounds in weight.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the largest gun you are capable of manufacturing there?

Captain SMITH. We can probably make a 12-inch steel gun, which would take about a year and a half to make, with the present facilities; I mean just the finishing and assembling.

The CHAIRMAN. What would be the necessary expenditure to put that arsenal in an efficient condition for manufacturing up to 12-inch guns?

Captain SMITH. It would take about $750,000, according to the estimates of the foundry board as revised by the experience of the Navy Department.

The CHAIRMAN. Suppose you were given $750,000, and steel sufficient, how many guns, say of 8, 10, and 12 inch, could you manufacture in two years?

Captain SMITH. I should say about ten 12-inch, about fourteen 10-inch, and probably twenty-four 8-inch. That is as near as my memory serves me, and I think that is roughly correct.

The CHAIRMAN. How much steel, in point of value, would it require to manufacture that number of guns?

Captain SMITH. For two years, about 1,700 tons.

The CHAIRMAN. I mean in point of value.

Captain SMITH. I should say a million and a quarter dollars. I think I estimated that two and one-half millions would last four years.

The CHAIRMAN. And that would enable you to run efficiently?

Captain SMITH. The only question is whether a steel contract for a million and a half would be as advantageous to the Government, in point of economy, as two and a half millions. Many manufacturers who have not yet embarked in the business would say it was hardly big enough to bid on. The million and a half would probably shut the door to competition.

I have read that for the purpose of showing that the amount in the bill, so far from being too great, is in fact too small.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] has made a point of order on section 6 of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Section 6 involves a good many propositions, but I wish to make the point of order upon it all.

Mr. BURNES. I suggest that the section need not be read. The gentleman having made the point of order, it is bound to be sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems to be conceded that if the point of order is made on section 6 it must be sustained.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I make the point of order upon the whole section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order upon the whole section.

Mr. SAYERS. I wish to state that the Committee on Appropriations and also the subcommittee and myself knew that this section was subject to the point of order, but we wished to present the matter to the House so that if it chose it might avail itself of the policy of calling on private manufacturers to do this work.

I now move that the committee rise and report this bill as amended to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Chairman, do I understand the motion to be to report the bill to the House?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, as amended.

Mr. ADAMS. I was not aware that section 6 had been read.

The CHAIRMAN. Section 6 has been struck out on a point of order.

The motion of Mr. SAYERS was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10998) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, and had instructed him to report the same to the House with an amendment, and with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to, and that the bill as amended be passed.

Mr. SAYERS. I call for the previous question on the adoption of the amendment and on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not wish to obstruct the action of the House on this measure; but I would like to have an understanding that the final vote on the passage of the bill be reserved until to-morrow, so that we may have a fuller House and a vote by yeas and nays.

Mr. SAYERS. I will not agree to a vote by yeas and nays, because there may not be a quorum.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. At any rate, let it be understood that the final vote shall go over until to-morrow. The question whether yeas and nays shall be taken can be determined then.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] can be arranged later. The present proposition is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The following amendment, reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, was read:

After the word "manufacturers," in line 21, on page 4, insert "who shall be resident citizens of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. SAYERS. I now move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is now on the passage of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Now, I ask the gentleman from Texas to allow the bill to go over.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I can not consent that the final vote be taken now. It was my clear understanding from the gentleman from Texas that if I would not obstruct the passage of the bill this evening, this question should go over; and he agreed with me that he would not ask a final vote until to-morrow.

Mr. SAYERS. If the gentleman insists on that as the understanding between us, I will not undertake to gainsay it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not want to obstruct the passage of the bill, but only wish to secure the vote of a full House.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent that the vote be taken on the passage of this bill immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The previous question having been ordered on the passage of the bill, it will come up as unfinished business to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal.

MARGARET DOYLE.

Mr. MACDONALD. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill which I send to the desk, and that it be now considered.

The bill (H. R. 9233) to pay Margaret Doyle, administratrix of James Doyle, for certain captured cotton was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $2,566.33 be paid to Margaret Doyle, administratrix of James Doyle, deceased, out of the captured and abandoned property fund now held in the United States Treasury, being one-half the net proceeds of 31 bales of cotton, the property of said James Doyle and Ralph Meldrim, seized in Savannah, Ga., in 1865, by the officers of the United States Government, in compliance with the act of March 12, 1863.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. RYAN. Let the report be read.

The report was read.

Mr. MORGAN. I would like to ask a question in regard to this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. I object.

BOUNDARY LINES BETWEEN RHODE ISLAND AND CONNECTICUT.

Mr. ARNOLD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 11182) concerning the settlement of boundary lines between Rhode Island and Connecticut; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PENSIONS.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 11183) to increase the pensions of persons who have lost a hand or arm, or both, or foot or leg; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the House stands adjourned until to-morrow.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rules private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below:

By Mr. BUTLER: A bill (H. R. 11180) for the relief of William D. O'Brien—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. MATSON: A bill (H. R. 11181) to appropriate the sum of $50,000 to aid in the ornamentation of the soldiers and sailors' monument now being constructed at Indianapolis, Ind., under the authority of said State—to the Committee on the Library.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CHIPMAN: Petition of Margaret J. Bolio, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GROUT: Petition of Mary B. Peck, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HEARD: Petition of citizens of the sixth district of Missouri, in favor of certain amendments to the interstate-commerce law—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. HOLMAN: Petition for the relief of Robert P. Porter, Third Regiment Indiana Cavalry—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, memorial of St. Croix County, Wisconsin, showing that more lands have been patented to the corporation now claiming the St. Croix and Lake Superior land grant, Bayfield branch, than were authorized by Congress—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. ROWLAND: Petition of William S. Fowlkes, of Rockingham, N. C., for relief—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

The following petitions, indorsing the per diem rated service-pension bill, based on the principle of paying all soldiers, sailors, and marines of the late war a monthly pension of 1 cent a day for each day they were in the service, were severally referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

By Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL: Of citizens of Brooklyn, N. Y.

By Mr. KETCHAM: Of citizens of Poughkeepsie, N. Y.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, August 16, 1888.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

OVERHEAD ELECTRIC WIRES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following communication from the commissioners of the District of Columbia; which was read:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, August 15, 1888.

SIR: The commissioners of the District of Columbia have the honor to submit the following reply to the resolution of the Senate of the United States of the 13th instant, directing them to inform the Senate, as soon as may be, whether, since the 1st day of January, 1888, they have granted any permit or given any other authority for the erection of overhead electric wires of any kind in any of the avenues, streets, or alleys of Washington or Georgetown, and if so, in what instances, for what purposes, and under what authority.

Since the date above mentioned the commissioners have granted one permit for the erection of overhead wires for the use of the Western Union Telegraph Company and two permits for the erection of overhead wires for the use of the Chesapeake and Potomac Telephone Company.

They have also granted a permit to the United States Electric Light Company for the erection of overhead wires on Pennsylvania avenue and Bridge street, from Washington Circle to the Free bridge, and on High street from Bridge to Stoddard, and Ninth street from Pennsylvania avenue to Massachusetts avenue northwest, to maintain electric arc lights, in accordance with the provisions of the act making appropriations for the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889.

They have further granted a permit to the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway Company to erect and maintain overhead wires for the operation of its cars by electricity along its route, part of which lies within the city of Washington. This permit was granted in order to enable the company to exercise the power conferred by its charter, by electricity, in the manner considered by the commissioners to be most advantageous to the public.

All the permits above mentioned are revocable at the pleasure of the commissioners, and all were granted under their general power to exercise control over the public streets. Such authority has been continuously exercised by the commissioners since the establishment of the present form of government in the District and is recognized by Congress in the act making appropriations for the District of Columbia for the year ending June 30, 1889, which prohibits the exercise of such authority after September 15, 1888.

Very respectfully,

S. E. WHEATLEY,
Acting President Board Commissioners District of Columbia.

Hon. JOHN J. INGALLS,
President pro tempore, United States Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I must confess my surprise, and I presume other Senators who have listened to the reading of that document probably feel a surprise, that the commissioners of this District, the servants of the law, having, as all such bodies of men must have, a latitude of limited and reasonable discretion, having ascertained from the declared will of Congress in both Houses that it was against the policy of the lawmaking power of this District to allow any more overhead wires to be constructed through the streets and avenues of this city and of Georgetown, and put an absolute end to it, to take effect on the 15th of September, if I am not mistaken, should have proceeded immediately after the passage of such a law, apparently under a kind of stimulation or aggressive energy, to give permits for spreading out extensively the overhead system before the time runs out, as if they were importers of foreign goods and the tariff was to be raised on the 15th of September, to hustle in all that they can before that time.

I can not doubt that the motives of these gentlemen are very good, but I think their action is very much mistaken, and against the expressed will and policy and intention of Congress. I am very sorry for it.

I move that the communication be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia with instructions to report, as soon as may be, a resolution to be passed by the Senate, if it meets the approval of the Senate—it will take too long to get it through both Houses, I suppose—requesting these gentlemen to stop the overhead electric-wire business and to revoke any permits they have recently granted, so as to leave the matter as it stood when the act of Congress passed stopping this sort of business.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I think it would be very wrong for the Senate of the United States to instruct the commissioners what to do in the matter, especially to instruct them as proposed by the Senator from Vermont. I think the commissioners acted in strict accordance with the law passed at the present session of Congress, and only exercised a power that was plainly given to them. I assure the Senator from Vermont that the construction of the proposed railroad on the electric plan will render him great satisfaction if he will allow it to be accomplished according to existing law.

I passed through the same experience that he seems to be passing through, by opposing very actively the construction of one of these electric railroads in the city in which I live. I thought the sight of the poles, and of the suspended braces, and the imaginary dangers would be unpleasant and probably dangerous at times; but the actual experiment went on, the road was completed as such roads have been in several cities of the United States, and it is now in complete and successful execution. It may be that hereafter it will be better to require these wires to be put under-ground, but as yet no plan has been discovered by which the electric force can be communicated by wires under-ground and at the same time applied to the purpose of running a car. That is the difficulty. Instead of doing that, they run the electric wires above from 15 to 20 feet, suspended on poles; and if the wire braces were constructed in a line between the tracks they would not look very badly.

Mr. HARRIS. That is the exact plan contemplated on the road to which the Senator refers.

Mr. SHERMAN. The road I speak of has posts on opposite sides of the street, connecting with lines of wire, holding a support for the wire. That looks awkward, but as I understand they propose to build this road by putting up iron pipes in the center of the tracks. Is not that the plan?

Mr. HARRIS. Yes. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. That is the plan of the contemplated road. Indeed, the road to which the Senator refers is now constructed along New York avenue.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not know that.

Mr. HARRIS. I understand it is.

Mr. SHERMAN. I had not seen it.

Mr. HARRIS. It is a double track.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Where does it begin?

Mr. HARRIS. On Seventh street; and it runs out northeast.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not happen to go along there, and did not see it.

Mr. HARRIS. The iron pipes are in the center. In that space between the two tracks every hundred yards an iron pole is planted with arms, and electric lights every hundred yards will be established upon each pole. There is a very broad space on either side of the railroad tracks.

Mr. SHERMAN. And the wire runs right along the center?

Mr. HARRIS. The wire, or the cable, runs right along the center of the avenue.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from Vermont had ever had experience and had seen such a line in operation, his opinion would be entitled to great weight. I hope he will look at it. It is one of the most beautiful applications of power that I have ever seen in the world. It is no wonder that a horse is sometimes frightened at it, because a horse naturally looks to see what power moves the machine. To any individual seeing such a car propelled along by electricity, without perceiving the motive power or force, it is a beautiful sight, and it is very safe because it can be checked in a moment. In that respect it is unlike a cable road. The cable car has a propelling force that sometimes can not be arrested by a brake at once. Electric power is used in arresting these cars, and they can be arrested in a moment, much more quickly than a railroad car by the most powerful brakes that have yet been discovered.

I think that it is entirely within the power of Congress to regulate the mode and manner of burying these wires, and probably it would be some time or other better for all kinds of wires to be buried under-ground. I have no doubt of that, especially with the ordinary electric wires. However, it seems to me that this experiment had better be tried. Congress so regarded it, and expressly made a law which allowed this company to build its line before postponing the time of the taking effect of the prohibition to the 15th of September; and it would be a denial of a right conferred by Congress upon this corporation to now deprive them of it.

I must say that I do not know a single member of this corporation; I do not know anything about it, but I know that the experiment is a very interesting one, and it ought to be tried, and it ought not to be arrested by hasty action.

Mr. GORMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio a question. I think the statement the Senator makes is that electric roads can not be run without the overhead wires. I think he must be mistaken in that.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not say that. I say that so far as I know no successful experiment with under-ground wires has been tried yet, and it would involve an enormously increased expense. This is a mere suburban road——

Mr. GORMAN. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that he is mistaken. The most successful electric road in this country to-day is at Baltimore, within 40 miles of this city, where the authorities would not grant the right to erect overhead wires because of their very great danger. The experiment of conducting the wires under-ground has been tried successfully, and more successfully than any other experiment of the kind in the Union. It has also been tried in the city of New York, but the line in Baltimore, running out to the suburbs 5 or 6 miles, is propelled with as much regularity as a steam road, and there is not a wire above ground. I wanted to give the Senator that information because I happened to know about the operation of such a line in Baltimore.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to know why this information was not communicated at the time the bill passed through Congress, because those parties have gone on to build the road in exact pursuance of law. So the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] tells me. I did not even know that it had been built. At any rate they had the right to carry these wires overhead under the law.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Ohio with allow me, I will state that I did not mean that the cable was already established, but the tracks have been constructed. The contracts, as I am informed, have been made for the erection of the iron poles, and the poles have been bought, and all that, but I do not think the cable has been stretched as yet.

Mr. CHANDLER. No doubt the electric railway of which the Senator from Ohio speaks so favorably is a wonderful contrivance. There is no doubt that the result it accomplishes is marvelous. But I ask the Senator from Ohio whether there is not in this overhead wire the death-dealing current; whether if by any possibility the covering comes off the wire and it comes in contact with a human being it is not certain death to him?

I understand, though I am willing to be corrected, that there is not one of these currents but which, if a connection is made between it and a man's body and then again with any iron substance or any other conductor, would kill the person instantly. It was for this reason that I objected, when the District appropriation bill was pending here, to the striking out by the Senate of a provision which contemplated putting all these wires under-ground. The Senate then were, as I understood it, almost if not quite unanimous in favor of requiring these wires to be put under-ground; but it was said that the time had not then come for issuing the sweeping declaration that they must go under-ground.

The subject went to a conference committee, and when that committee reported the appropriation bill contained a clause with which I was quite satisfied, for I understood by virtue of that clause and by virtue of an assurance which had been given by the District commissioners in accordance with a report made by their engineer that however much delay there might be in putting existing electric-light wires under-ground in the city of Washington, no new wires were to be allowed to be erected. I ask the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], who reported that bill and who gave that assurance to the Senate, whether or not that was the understanding of the committee?

It seems, however, that we now have an electric railway authorized, which the Senator from Tennessee says has been already partly constructed. I certainly hope that before that railway is completed the Congress of the United States will find out whether one of these deadly and destructive wires is under that authority to be erected within the city of Washington, and if it is I hope that by appropriate legislation the movement may be stopped.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire is, I think, rather mistaken as to the assurance given at the time the conference report on the District of Columbia appropriation bill was made to the Senate. I do not remember precisely what occurred then, but the fact is, and I think must have been stated—certainly it was privately stated—that no more wires were to be erected in the streets of Washington after the notice given, which would be after the 15th day of September, a time which has not yet elapsed.

The discussion in the conference committee, which I think I may mention without impropriety, took about this shape: There was the same desire on both sides to secure the putting of the wires under-ground at the earliest possible moment that a proper plan could be devised for that purpose which would protect the public and the owners of the wires alike, and which at the same time should result in giving the service the public required from these wires; but it was stated, and with force, that the buildings had been erected, that contracts had been made for the supply of light by means of electricity, and that a probable extension had been projected in a portion of the city, to arrest which absolutely would be doing the public a disservice, and not accomplishing anything in the direction of putting the wires under-ground, the policy in that case being one simply of inaction with no good result following.

Therefore it was that the committee agreed that there should be this leeway until the 15th day of September. It will be noticed also that the inhibition after that date did not apply to the alleys, it being stated, and with general acquiescence, that the presence of these wires was more applicable to the streets than to the alleys, and consequently the alleys were left open. But the commissioners expressed no dissent; all of them united in saying that it was their desire to put the wires underground at the earliest possible moment. However, in all that discussion no mention was made of this electric railway. I did not know it had been incorporated.

Mr. TELLER. Where is it to run?

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Colorado asks me where it is to run. I do not know.

Mr. CHANDLER. Was the committee entirely ignorant of it?

Mr. PLUMB. The committee was wholly ignorant of the fact that the electric railway company had been incorporated. Nothing was said about it by the commissioners; nothing was said about it by any member of the conference committee.

Mr. DAWES. Was it incorporated before that time?

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Massachusetts asks me a very pertinent question, whether it was actually incorporated before that date. That I do not know.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The act to incorporate the company was approved on the 19th of June. I have it here.

Mr. PLUMB. Then it occurred before the date of the final conference. But the debate in the Senate was with reference to overhead wires and underground wires for lighting purposes, and not for purposes of power, not for purposes of propelling cars. I did not know anything about the matter then, and no member of the Committee on the District of Columbia said anything about it. I suppose, of course, I knew that bills had been passed for the incorporation of street railway companies, but I paid no attention whatever to the motive power which was required or permitted by the various acts of incorporation.

So far as this discussion relates to the erection of wires for the purpose of an electric railway, it is entirely apart from anything that was considered by the Committee on Appropriations or by the conference committee on the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and also equally apart from any discussion we have had in the Senate in my presence; but the general purpose and idea that we were not to have, within definite extensions, the wires overhead for purposes of lighting or for purposes of telephone or telegraphic communication, not only received the assent of this body in the discussion, but was the subject of entire assent on the part of the conferees of the two Houses on the District of Columbia appropriation bill. There was to be a leeway to accommodate possibly existing contracts and reasonable extension of the lighting process, etc., and it was agreed that the alleys might for the time-being, without legislative prohibition, be used for the purposes of perhaps still further extension, but it was not designed that anything should be done which looked to an indefinite continuation of the system of overhead lighting or of communication by overhead wires, and the commissioners were to address themselves to a plan, as required by the act, whereby all these wires might be submerged, that plan to be presented at the next session of Congress, and, of course, it was not expected that anything would occur between now and then which would in any way prove a barrier to the action of Congress upon the subject.

Mr. HARRIS. The question is one of sufficient importance, in my opinion, to justify a thorough investigation of the whole subject. I hope it will meet the views of the Senator from Vermont to refer this communication to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and if he chooses, with instructions that they report at the earliest day practicable. But if it is his purpose to further instruct the committee exactly as to what it shall report, for one, as a member of that committee, I do not see any necessity to refer the matter at all. If the question is to be prejudiced by the Senate and sent to the committee with instructions simply to formulate a resolution of a given character, there is nothing for the committee to consider, nothing for it to investigate, nothing for it to do, except to formulate a resolution in accordance with the instructions of the Senate.

I hope the communication will be referred to the committee, and as a member of the committee I will say that I am ready to enter upon a thorough investigation of the question with a view to responding to the necessities of the case, such as will be most promotive of the safety and convenience of the entire public, without regard to individual interests of any company or any private individual. But I do not propose to undertake simply to formulate a resolution referred to the committee with instructions prejudging every question that is involved in the controversy.

Mr. DAWES. I was upon the subcommittee that had charge of the District appropriation bill, and was also upon the committee of conference, but unfortunately for me I was not able to be present in conference, and therefore I do not know what was understood there. However, I do not know what were the considerations presented to the subcommittee and reported to the full committee, and by the committee to the Senate. As the bill came from the other House it was a peremptory requirement to put all these wires under-ground. The commissioners came before the committee——

Mr. SHERMAN. You are speaking now of the District of Columbia appropriation bill?

Mr. DAWES. I am speaking of the District of Columbia appropriation bill. I am not speaking of the railroad bill.

The commissioners came before the subcommittee and the full committee, and it was stated distinctly here in the Senate that there was a necessity for modifying that provision which required the putting of all these wires under-ground. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] resisted the amendment which was reported, and the committee prevailed upon the Senate to adopt that amendment by stating distinctly (I stated it as I understood it to be) that the modification was solely for the purpose of giving the commissioners an opportunity to satisfy themselves as to what was the best method of putting the wires under-ground. I understood it to be the purpose of the commissioners from that time forth to do nothing but ascertain the best method of putting the wires under-ground.

If it had been intimated before the subcommittee or the committee or here in the Senate that the purpose of extending the time to the 15th of September was to give an opportunity for putting up more wires in the air, there would not have been a member of the committee standing here in favor of that amendment. I committed myself. I stated to the Senate that that was the purpose of the amendment. I stated it upon what I understood to be the desire of the commissioners. I did not know anything about this railway, but I understood the commissioners to be as anxious as the committee or as the Senator from New Hampshire to put every one of these wires under-ground; and if by any means this extension to the 15th of September was for the purpose of putting as many wires into the air as possible in that time the Committee on Appropriations were misled.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, I know nothing of the projected railway now under construction in this city designed to be operated by electricity. Of one thing, however, I am well assured. There should be no unnecessary barriers placed in the way of any company having the energy sufficient to better the public service as to street railways in the city of Washington. The present service, composed entirely of horse-cars, is inadequate for the purpose for which it is designed. The cars much overcrowded, progress at such a rate—I do not think you can call it a rate of speed—as to be deplorable. The poor horses that draw them at infinite suffering suffer but little more than those who witness their misery.

I doubt if there is another city in the United States of the size of Washington but has either the electric railway service or a service by the cable-tramway system, both of which are infinitely better than the horse-car system, and anything that can be done by Congress in the way of encouragement of private enterprise to remedy the existing evil certainly should be done.

I agree, however, with the Senator from Vermont that our desire for rapid transit over the streets of this city should not permit Congress or the District commissioners to countenance a system of railways that shall be either unsightly or dangerous.

In connection with a railroad enterprise in the town in which I live it became my duty a short time ago to look up the system of electric tramways. I found that there were three systems in vogue to a greater or less degree. The system most in use is that wherein the current of electricity, which is the power that propels the car, is transmitted to the car by overhead wires supported upon poles. The almost uniform testimony as to this class of electric railways is that they are objectionable; that the poles and the wires are unsightly, and the wires themselves are a constant threatening danger to the lives of passers-by.

Another system is where the current of electricity is transmitted to the car by the use of the railway iron, and sometimes by a wire placed under-ground. This is less objectionable than the other, but does not seem to have been so successful for the running of cars.

A third system, destined, I believe, in a very short time to do away with all others, is that known as the storage-battery principle, where the electric motor or the electricity is stored in batteries within the car, and the car itself becomes an electric engine or machine. Experiments have been made in this direction which have been quite satisfactory, and I believe the time is close at hand when this method will supersede all others and will be a very great advantage over any other system of street-railway cars or their conducting that we now have.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from Nebraska indulge me just a moment while I make a statement about overhead electric wires?

Mr. MANDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. In the city of Montgomery, Ala., the capital of that State, a city of 40,000 population, a system of electric street cars has been conducted for about two years by means of overhead wires. They are a very great incumbrance to the streets, and they are exceedingly dangerous. A number of animals have been killed there, and men have been stricken almost to death by the falling of the wires. The governor of Alabama recently was coming down from the capitol to his lodgings, driving his buggy. One of the wires had been stricken down by a slight wind storm, or else it had fallen from some accidental cause. His horse stepped upon it. It killed his horse instantly, and would have killed him in the buggy if it had happened to touch the tire of his wheel. Since then the people of that city have been very gingerly in their patronage of that establishment. Finally the battery-house, the house where the electricity was developed, caught on fire, I suppose from some machinery, and burnt up; and now they are trying to get a dummy line or a horse line or something else there in place of it.

Mr. MANDERSON. The Senator from Alabama simply corroborates the statement I have made, and adds additional force to some matter which is already in the possession of the Senate and which is now before me. I hold in my hand Miscellaneous Document No. 84, which is a "Letter of the board of commissioners of the District of Columbia in response to Senate resolution of March 13, 1888, calling for information on the subject of electricity as a motive power for street-cars." This report of the commissioners of the District contains a report from Capt. Eugene Griffin, a captain of engineers of the United States Army, who has published here through this medium a most valuable article upon the whole subject of electric railways. He gives the different systems that are now in force, and attaches to his exhibit some letters which are very interesting reading in connection with this proposed use of the streets of the city of Washington for electric railway purposes.

Here are two letters from Montgomery, Ala., with reference to the railway referred to by the Senator from Alabama. One is a letter from the mayor of that city, dated February 26, 1888. He addresses Capt. Eugene Griffin, engineer, Washington, as follows:

MAYOR'S OFFICE, Montgomery, Ala., February 26, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Yours 23d received. The Van Depoele electric railroad is operated in this city. For the first six months it did not work satisfactorily, but for the past two months has been doing very nicely. The objection to it is the overhead wires.

Respectfully,

W. S. REEN, Mayor.

Capt. EUGENE GRIFFIN,
Engineer, Washington.

That is from the mayor of Montgomery. The city engineer of Montgomery writes at greater length on February 27, 1888, and I read this extract from his letter:

The most serious objection I know of is that of the wires supporting the central wire and the central wire itself being overhead. This arrangement is disfiguring to the streets and in case of the wires breaking is dangerous. One horse and one or two mules have been killed here in that way.

There are letters here also from Port Huron, Mich., St. Catharine's, Canada, and Mansfield, Ohio. Here is a letter from the home of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], in which there seems to be no objection to the system there in use. There are letters also from Detroit. There is one from Richmond, Va., which I shall read, as it refers to this same matter. It is from the city engineer, and is as follows:

CITY ENGINEER'S OFFICE, Richmond, Va., February 27, 1888.

MY DEAR SIR: The application of electrical power to the street railway here, as far as we can understand, is a success. There have been difficulties in details of working which have caused delays, but for several weeks now the cars have been running on schedule time, giving satisfaction to the traveling public.

With the exception of the unsightly appearance of poles and wires, the line has a neater appearance and moves with more comfort to passengers than either a horse-car or cable line.

I believe it would be well worth your while to visit our city to make a personal inspection of this line.

Very respectfully,

W. E. CUTCHAW, City Engineer.

Capt. EUGENE GRIFFIN,
United States Engineer, Washington, D. C.

I commend this document to those who are interested in this subject-matter and have not perused it, as containing a mine of information upon this very important subject.

Mr. CHANDLER. What is the document?

Mr. MANDERSON. It is Senate Miscellaneous Document No. 84. It would be extremely regrettable to see the handsome streets of this beautiful city disfigured by the presence of these electric poles. Captain Griffin, in his article, makes this recommendation to the commissioners:

I have the honor to submit the following suggestions:

1. That no overhead electrical conductors be permitted in the city, but such conductors, with due precautions to insure safety, may be allowed on suburban lines.

If this be a line outside of the streets of the city and the electric wires are placed with proper care, and are always carefully guarded and watched, there perhaps is no particular objection to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It starts in the heart of the city, at Seventh street.

Mr. MANDERSON. If it starts in the heart of the city and proposes to use its public streets for the purpose of overhead electric wires, there should certainly be a very speedy stop placed on its further construction.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to say to the Senator from Nebraska that this very document was called for after the statement made by the commissioners to the Committee on Appropriations upon the question of putting these wires under-ground, and they stated that the proposition met their entire approval. I introduced the resolution which brought it out, and in order to make it appear that the purpose of the commissioners was to put an end to the overhead wires everywhere, and to put them under-ground the moment they found the best method. That is the way this document came before the Senate, upon my call.

Mr. MANDERSON. Does the Senator say that the District commissioners after this document came to their possession recommended the building of a railway with overhead wires?

Mr. DAWES. I do not know that, but I do know that the company was chartered some time in June. The Senator from Vermont gave the date.

Mr. EDMUNDS. June 19.

Mr. DAWES. The resolution which called for this report bears date March 16. There is no doubt that this matter was before the commissioners long before the railroad company was chartered.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to ask the Senator from Nebraska whether in the course of the investigations which he made into electric railways he found that any current could be used for the propulsion of cars that was not dangerous to life.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think investigation would show the fact that the most dangerous electric railway is the overhead-wire system, and the least dangerous is the under-ground system, where the tracks are used as the conductors of electricity.

Mr. CHANDLER. But is not the current of the same strength and as destructive to life in all cases?

Mr. MANDERSON. It is of exactly the same strength, and where there is a broken connection in rails horses and in some instances persons have been shocked and killed by treading upon the track.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator, without reference to the method of insulation, whether there can be an electric current strong enough to propel a street car that will not kill?

Mr. MANDERSON. It will kill unquestionably any one who is exposed to it, if not very carefully guarded. I think the only safe plan is that wherein the electric power is within the car itself, and it yet remains as an unsolved question whether there are not elements of danger in that system also.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Nebraska will yield I will state what within the last day or two I was informed by an electrician. Whether true or not I do not know, for I am practically uninformed upon the subject except so far as his statement may go. He stated to me that five hundred units of electrical power are amply sufficient for the purpose of propelling cars, and that that amount of electrical force was not dangerous to human life even if you come in contact with the wire; that it took from eight hundred to one thousand units of electrical power to endanger human life. Whether that is true or not of course I have no information except his statement, but I think it a question very well worthy of investigation and accurate and reliable ascertainment, and it is one of the questions which I think ought to be thoroughly investigated before any final decision is reached in respect to this matter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The commissioners say that "they have granted one permit for the construction of overhead wires for the use of the Western Union Telegraph Company." How extensive that line was they do not state, or where. They have granted "two permits for the erection of overhead wires for the use of the Chesapeake and Potomac Telephone Company;" where that location is and the extent is not stated.

They have also granted a permit to the United States Electric Light Company for the erection of overhead wires on Pennsylvania avenue and Bridge street, from Washington Circle to the Free bridge, and on High street from Bridge to Stoddard, and Ninth street from Pennsylvania avenue to Massachusetts avenue northwest—to maintain electric arc lights, in accordance with the provisions of the act making appropriations for the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889.

So they say that was done under the authority of the very bill the committee told us, the conferees told us, and that everybody in both Houses understood alike to be a stoppage of overhead wire business.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I think I can explain that, perhaps. In the bill of which he speaks, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, there was a provision authorizing the use of electric lighting for public purposes to an extent, I think, $10,000 greater than has been heretofore enjoyed. I have no doubt the commissioners referred to that extension, that is to say, that Congress authorized them (and about that there is no question or controversy whatever) to expend $30,000 in place of $20,000, as heretofore, for public electric lighting. That, I presume, is what they refer to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Undoubtedly, because Congress in a bill which provided for public electric lighting to a certain extent of the appropriation, and in the same bill commanded that there should be no more overhead wires—that was the substance of it, as everybody understood it—and that the delay was merely in order to allow the existing system to keep up until the 15th or 25th of September, whatever the time was, when it was all to stop and to allow probably a little latitude of discretion for the setting up of a pole in some place where it would not do any harm to merely maintain an existing line, these commissioners have undertaken to establish extensive new overhead electric lighting operations, which we all know are extremely dangerous to human life, and extremely dangerous in case of a fire when the firemen have to put up their ladders and do things in a great hurry, and extremely unsightly, though I confess I am one of those who believe that where beauty and utility come in conflict utility ought to have the right of way. That is what they have done, and then to crown their magnanimity—

They have further granted a permit to the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway Company to erect and maintain overhead wires for the operation of its cars by electricity along its route, part of which lies within the city of Washington. This permit was granted in order to enable the company to exercise the power conferred by its charter, by electricity, in the manner considered by the commissioners to be most advantageous to the public.

Now comes a part to which I wish to call special attention, and it is why I desire the Senate to act now for the benefit of this company itself, so that it need not go to a useless expenditure of money in going on with its overhead wire business—

All the permits above mentioned are revocable at the pleasure of the commissioners, and all were granted under their general power to exercise control over the public streets.

Let us see what the power of the railway company was by its charter. It seems that corporations will get or try to get or obtain in some way grants which they construe, and get executive officers to construe, exactly as they want them, but they have not quite got it in this charter. The part in regard to using electricity is simply this:

With authority to construct, etc., and lay tracks and other mechanical devices, etc., to operate the same by horse, cable, or electric power, in the District of Columbia, through and along the following avenues, streets, and highways: Commencing on New York avenue at its intersection with Seventh street northwest—

The great north and south thoroughfare, probably the greatest one now in the city. There is Ninth street, which is also a great thoroughfare, which they have also provided for by overhead wires given by their permits, and Fourteenth street—

Commencing on New York avenue at its intersection with Seventh street northwest, thence eastwardly along said avenue to its intersection with Third street northeast.

Going above eleven blocks east along New York avenue in this city, and then turning north and finally going out of the city limits and up in the suburbs.

The next section provides—I will not read it literally, but that is its plain meaning; but I do not read it merely to save time—in respect of this whole construction, that it is all to be approved by the commissioners of the District.

So by the charter itself in respect of the mode of exercising this power and executing this grant, they having the right to use electricity or horse power or cable power, the way it was to be done and the contrivances by which it was to be exercised are subject to the approval of the commissioners. Under that authority and under the authority of the commissioners they have obtained from the commissioners a revocable permit to erect overhead electrical wires in the center of that avenue.

That avenue is parked, as we all know, in a different way from the other avenues that I now remember in this town. The parking is in the center, with two lines of shade trees, one on either side of the park, and between which rows of shade trees go the double tracks of the present New York Avenue Railroad as far as it follows that avenue, but the line of trees goes on, as I believe. Those trees are a great ornament as well as of use to the health and comfort of the people of the city, and they are growing now large enough to make the avenue an object beautiful to the eye and wholesome and agreeable to the people who live along and pass along that noble avenue.

When you erect your overhead electric wires between that double row of trees at the height of 20 feet, the trees will be destroyed because the limbs will have to be cut now to do it; they have got so large in many places, if they have grown as fast up east as they have along that part of it I see every day. The end of it will be, so far as those trees are concerned, that they are gone, and a corporation for the mere economy of putting its electric wires overhead as distinguished from putting them underground, which is the least dangerous of all places for the use of electricity for motive power, is to be allowed to destroy that avenue.

I do not think it ought to be allowed for a single moment. It is now within the power of the commissioners to stop it, for they have reserved the right to revoke these permits at their pleasure. The poles, the frames, the wires are not erected. If the track is laid, that is one thing that would be useful if they put their electric force underground in just the same way.

It is due, therefore, not only to the public interests and the public safety, but to the interests of the corporation itself, that if the Senate is of opinion that this thing ought not to be done in this way, to say so and request the commissioners, and that is all that I propose. To-morrow I think I shall introduce a joint resolution to be passed by both Houses to see if we can not pull up on this business, but I have no doubt the commissioners would heed a request from the Senate, which we often address to the Departments in similar cases. If we request the commissioners to stop it, I have no doubt they will do it, and I hope the Senate will vote so, and then no money will be wasted by this corporation in expenditures for overhead contrivances that will have to be torn down.

Now, as to sending it to the committee, on which my friend from Tennessee——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (at 12 o'clock m.) The Senate ordered yesterday that at this hour the vote should be taken on the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to postpone the further consideration of the fisheries treaty until Wednesday after the first Monday in December next.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the Senator from Vermont may conclude his remarks.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to reply to the Senator from Vermont, and this matter will take time. I think we had better stand to what was the unanimous agreement.

Mr. EDMUNDS. All right.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pursuant to the order adopted yesterday, the Chair announces that the Senate is now in open executive session. The Executive Clerk will report the treaty by title.

The EXECUTIVE CLERK. Treaty between the United States and Great Britain concerning the interpretation of the convention of October 20, 1818, signed at Washington February 15, 1888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the last open executive session will be dispensed with. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the roll will be called on the motion to postpone.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMERON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. BATE (when the name of Mr. FAULKNER was called). The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. I would vote "yea" if the Senator from Vermont was present.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And my colleague [Mr. MORRILL] would vote "nay."

Mr. BERRY (when the name of Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, was called). My colleague [Mr. JONES, of Arkansas] is absent to-day, and, as I understand from him, is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] is paired generally with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER]. We have agreed on a transfer of these pairs. I announce the pair between the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], who would vote "yea," and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER], who would vote "nay." I vote "nay."

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS]. If he were present, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. VANCE (when his name was called). I was paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER], but the pair has been transferred to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. I vote "yea." My colleague [Mr. RANSOM] is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CULLOM. On the call of my name I voted "nay." Since that I am informed that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] has been called away, and I am asked to pair with him. I therefore withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois withdraws his vote.

Mr. FRYE. My colleague [Mr. HALE] is absent from the city, and when absent is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK]. The Senator from Kentucky voted, and I heard something said about a transfer of the pair.

Mr. BECK (after having voted in the affirmative). The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] came in after the announcement of the transfer of the pair and voted. I desire to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who is necessarily absent to-day. He would vote "nay" and I would vote "yea."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky withdraws his vote.

Mr. SABIN. I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA], but I am authorized to transfer that pair to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER].

Mr. MANDERSON. My colleague [Mr. PADDOCK] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. My colleague, if present, would vote "nay" and the Senator from Louisiana "yea."

Mr. HARRIS. I am informed by the Senator from Delaware that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BLODGETT], who is absent, desired a pair upon this question. That being true, I will transfer my pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to the Senator from New Jersey, and will record my vote. I vote "yea," being informed that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BLODGETT] would vote "yea," if here, and desired to be paired on the question.

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—24.

Bate,	Colquitt,	Hampton,	Turpie,
Berry,	Daniel,	Harris,	Vance,
Brown,	George,	Payne,	Vest,
Call,	Gibson,	Pugh,	Voorhees,

ABSENT—25.

Beck,	Evarts,	Kenna,	Quay,
Blackburn,	Farwell,	McPherson,	Ransom,
Blodgett,	Faulkner,	Morgan,	Riddleberger,
Butler,	Hale,	Morrill,	Stanford.
Cameron,	Hearst,	Paddock,
Cullom,	Hiscock,	Palmer,
Eustis,	Jones of Arkansas,	Pasco,

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order of the Senate having been executed, the Senate resumes the consideration of legislative business. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to make a report.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont was interrupted in speaking on a motion to refer a communication of the commissioners of the District of Columbia to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and is entitled to the floor.

OVERHEAD ELECTRIC WIRES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I merely desire to say now, as my friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] wishes to debate the matter further—I should have finished in one minute—and as my friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] has given notice of his desire to submit some remarks this morning, I ask unanimous consent that this matter stand over until to-morrow morning with the same rights it has now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered if there be no objection. The Chair will now call for morning business, which has not yet been called for under the different heads.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not understand that the vote on the motion to postpone the treaty took it out of the executive session. I suppose the treaty is still pending and is now the order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair announced that the order of the Senate having been executed at 12 o'clock, the vote upon the motion to postpone, the Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business. It is entirely in order to move to proceed in open executive session to the consideration of the treaty.

Mr. SHERMAN. I submit that motion, because I think we ought to proceed with the consideration of the treaty.

Mr. BECK. I hope the Senator from Ohio will give way for regular morning business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will withdraw my motion until the regular morning business is over, and then I shall insist on going on with the treaty.

Mr. REAGAN. I would be very much obliged if the Senate would allow me, when the morning business is through, to occupy the floor a short time, as I gave notice yesterday that I wished to address the Senate this morning.

Mr. ALLISON. I also desire the Senator from Ohio to allow me to call up the conference report on the Army appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A conference report is privileged and can be moved at any time.

Mr. ALLISON. So I understand, but I desire to accommodate myself to the convenience of Senators, and if the Senator from Texas desires to go on now, of course I will yield the floor to him now.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the memorial of Francis E. Willard and others, officers of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Chicago, Ill., in favor of the appropriation of $75,000 for the Industrial Home for Mormon Women in Salt Lake City, Utah; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. TURPIE. I present the petition of Charles Willsey and other citizens of Elkhart County, Indiana, praying for the passage of the following additional amendments to the interstate-commerce law:

First, by adding at the end of section 3: "Provided, That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier, subject to the provisions of this act, to carry or transport any commodity for any shipper in a car or vehicle owned, leased, or in any way controlled by such shipper: And provided further, That it shall be unlawful for any shipper to make any contract with any carrier to convey the property of such shipper in cars or vehicles owned or controlled by such shipper."

Secondly, add at the end of section 10: "That in all prosecutions under this section, on complaint of a citizen of the United States, such citizen shall be entitled to have and receive, for his own benefit, all fines that may be imposed and collected for any violations of said act in any and all prosecutions in which he may be such complainant."

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL presented resolutions of the Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Washington Territory, praying an appropriation of $200,000 to be used in furnishing head-stones to mark the graves of ex-soldiers and sailors.

Mr. PLUMB. Let me say, for the benefit of the Senator and his constituents, that an appropriation is contained in the sundry civil bill for that very purpose, and I have no doubt in a very short time headstones will be ready for delivery to all proper applicants.

Mr. MITCHELL. If that is so let the resolutions lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BATE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 514) for the relief of Dr. A. Sidney Tebbs, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon; which were agreed to, and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 3270) to amend the military record of Valentine Hitchcock; and

A bill (H. R. 3604) granting an honorable discharge to A. R. Hartzell, and for other purposes.

Mr. TURPIE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 9653) granting a pension to Henry Alward, dependent father of Henry M. Alward;

A bill (H. R. 10356) granting a pension to John T. Vincent; and

A bill (H. R. 9684) granting a pension to William J. Brown.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 165) for the relief of H. C. Markham, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2579) authorizing the President to appoint and retire Andrew J. Smith, late colonel of the Seventh United States Cavalry and a major-general of volunteers, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1839) for the relief of Daniel C. Rodman and others, sureties on the bond of Ozias Morgan, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3427) to amend section 4474 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SAULSBURY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3447) amendatory of "An act relating to postal crimes and amendatory of the statutes therein mentioned," approved June 18, 1888, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 14th instant approved and signed the following act and joint resolutions:

An act (S. 1082) to authorize the issuance of patent to certain land in Arkansas;

Joint resolution (S. R. 99) providing for the printing of the portion of the annual report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics on Commerce and Navigation for the year ending June 30, 1887, entitled "Annual report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics in regard to imported merchandise entered for consumption in the United States, with amounts of duty and rates of duty collected;" and Joint resolution (S. R. 100) directing the Secretary of War to investigate and report the amount due to the State of South Carolina for the rent of the Citadel Academy.

The message also announced that the following bills, having been presented to the President on August 2, 1888, and not having been returned by him to the House of Congress in which they originated within the ten days prescribed by the Constitution, have become laws without his signature:

An act (S. 2656) granting a pension to the widow and minor children of Patrick Frawley; and

An act (S. 2830) granting increase of pension to Elvira M. Dorman.

The message further announced that the bill (S. 1914) for the relief of Mary E. Hopkins, having been presented to the President on August 3, 1888, and not having been returned by him to the House of Congress in which it originated within the ten days prescribed by the Constitution, has become a law without his signature.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DAVIS introduced a bill (S. 3450) granting a pension to Carl J. Chindblom; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, introduced a bill (S. 3451) granting a pension to Frank D. Worcester; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 3452) granting a pension to Mrs. M. A. Hooper; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3453) granting an increase of pension to Alfred T. McKinsey; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HARRIS introduced a bill (S. 3454) for the relief of W. J. Smith and D. M. Wisdom; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 104) to print additional copies of the United States map of the edition of 1887, prepared by the Commissioner of Public Lands; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. PLUMB. Before the resolution is referred, I wish to say that early in the session I introduced a similar resolution providing for the printing of the edition of the map of 1886. The President has vetoed the resolution upon the ground among others that the Land Office has material for a map of a later date, brought down, as he claims, to 1887. I only wish to say that at the time I introduced the resolution there was no scrap of information in possession of the Land Office collated or made with reference to this map for a later period than 1886. I am advised that such is the case now, the opinion of the President to the contrary notwithstanding. He is mistaken. But in order that there may be no delay in printing this useful document I have corrected the resolution and provided therein for the printing of an edition for 1887, so that if the office has or can have by the time this resolution gets through, after it has run the gauntlet of legislative and executive opposition to it, any new material, we may have some of the maps printed for public distribution.

Mr. MANDERSON. I rise for the purpose of making one or two suggestions concerning the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Kansas. When the joint resolution, to which he refers, which has received the disapproval and the veto of the President, came to the Committee on Printing, the committee made investigation that satisfied it that the map therein proposed to be printed for the use of Congress, and to a limited extent for sale, should be the map of 1886, prepared under the direction of the Interior Department.

Maps are prepared for publication for the Government, as for private individuals, at very great original expense in the way of lithographic material, and, as I understand it—although I am seeking further light on this subject so as to more fully understand it—the plate from which these maps are to be printed, even if this resolution just introduced by the Senator from Kansas shall become a law, is a plate that was made for the Government in the year 1886 and for the map prepared for that year, and the only change there will be will be a change of the date from 1886 to 1887. I think it might just as well be called a map of the edition of 1886 as a map of the edition of 1887.

The principal grounds, however, for the veto of the resolution as suggested by the President are those which I will read. He says:

The propriety and expediency of this appropriation, to be applied so largely by the two branches of Congress, should be left to legislative discretion.

And then he goes on to say:

The map of 1886 was published at a cost of $1.25 per copy.

The map of 1887 will very soon be issued at a cost of $1 per copy, and the publishers have offered to print an enlarged edition at the rate of 95 cents for each map. This map will be later, more correct, more valuable in every way, and cheaper than that issued the previous year.

Of course, it will be very desirable if it can be printed for less than the $1.35 that was ascertained, after full investigation by the Printing Committee, to be the cost of publishing the map ordered by law and vetoed. It does not follow, however, as one might suppose, from the Executive communication, that the Government will be compelled to pay $1.35 for the making of each one of these maps. The language of the law is that the maps shall be printed at a rate not exceeding $1.35 each; that being the maximum price which shall not be exceeded. If they can be printed for 95 cents each it will be 40 cents less for each map than we provided in the law, and is, of course, a saving to be desired.

The other objection is:

Upon these facts I return the joint resolution without approval, in the belief that the Congress will prefer to correct the same by directing the publication of the latest, best, and cheapest map, and reducing the amount appropriated therefor.

The same reasoning that I have suggested as to the cost of each map applies to the gross amount. The amount of appropriation in the resolution vetoed is "$10,125, or so much thereof as may be necessary." If they can be published for $7,500, or a dollar for each map, it will not be necessary to expend $10,125; and there is no merit whatever in the pretense of economy suggested in the veto message.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator ought to say that it is the constant prayer of this Administration that it shall not be led into temptation, and that this objection is in the line of the objection made by the Postmaster-General to the appropriation of $500,000 for an improved ocean mail service, because that was more than he thought ought to be expended, although the law said he should only expend so much thereof as he might deem necessary; but he was dreadfully afraid that in some way he might be overcome.

Mr. MANDERSON. The Senator from Kansas may point the moral or adorn the tale; I am simply seeking to give the facts in connection with this joint resolution thus vetoed by the President. The matter is receiving the attention of the Committee on Printing, and will be reported upon later when we shall be able to ascertain from the Secretary of the Interior the full facts connected with the proposed publication. I do not think, however, that the Senate or the House has acted hastily or without due knowledge on the resolution referred to that has received the Executive disapproval.

AMENDMENT TO DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5863) authorizing the Richmond and Danville Railroad Company to lay tracks, etc., in the District of Columbia, and agreed to the same.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (H. R. 10998) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

CLAIMS OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. PLUMB. I offer a resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be directed to report to the Senate at the next session, so far as such claims have already been computed upon applications presented under the act of March 3, 1883, the amounts due postmasters and their representatives, in the several States and Territories, for services rendered the United States between July 1, 1864, and July 1, 1874, the gross amount of earnings for each biennial term of service to be stated on the basis of the act of 1854, and the amount of compensation paid for the same term of service to be deducted therefrom, showing the actual difference in each case between the salary paid and the compensation computed on the basis of the act of 1854 for each biennial term of service, such report to be limited to cases in which the compensation paid is 10 per cent. or more less than the compensation already computed on the basis of the act of 1854, and to be made to the Senate from time to time as the statement covering the claims from each State shall be completed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be printed and lie over under the rule.

FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], and coming over from yesterday, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and it hereby is, instructed to inquire into the matter of deposits in the late Freedman's Savings and Trust Company of Washington, and report how many white depositors of said company there are who were in no way connected with the alleged mismanagement and failure of said company, and the amount of deposits due to them respectively.

Mr. BECK. I said on yesterday that I thought I could give good reasons why this resolution of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] should not be adopted. I can do so now in a very few minutes, I think.

The act creating the Freedman's Bank, which passed Congress on the 3d of March, 1865, limited the right of deposit therein to colored depositors, and there never has been, so far as I know, though there may be in some of the amendments which were passed afterwards when it fell into the hands of the people who used it for speculation—there never was any right for white depositors to make deposits in the Freedman's Bank. The fifth section of the original act reads thus:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the general business and object of the corporation hereby created shall be to receive on deposit such sums of money as may from time to time be offered therefor by or on behalf of persons heretofore held in slavery in the United States, or their descendants, and investing the same in the stocks, bonds, Treasury notes, or other securities of the United States.

Under that provision the colored people made their deposits; they were induced to believe that it was a Government institution, gotten up for the purpose of taking possession of and holding safely and paying interest on their earnings, therefore they made their deposits. Everything was done to induce them to believe that the Government of the United States guarantied the repayment of their money, and because of that belief their deposits mere so made. Afterwards, on May 6, 1870, the act was changed, of course without the knowledge or consent of the colored depositors, making this provision:

That the fifth section of the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company," approved March 3, 1865, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto at the end thereof the words following: "And to the extent of one-half in bonds or notes, secured by mortgage on real estate in double the value of the loan; and the corporation is also authorized hereby to hold and improve the real estate now owned by it in the city of Washington, to wit, the west half of lot No. 3; all of the lots 4, 5, 6, 7, and the south half of lot No. 8, in square No. 221, as laid out and recorded in the original plats or plan of said city: Provided, That said corporation shall not use the principal of any deposits made with it for the purpose of such improvement."

There has been no law authorizing the purchase of the property set forth in this amendment, or to use the freedmen's money, which they deposited, for investment in United States bonds and securities for that purpose at the time this real estate was bought, as recited in the amendment. Afterwards, June 20, 1874, the bank act was amended again. About this time, or very soon afterwards, the concern became bankrupt. This amendment was made in reckless disregard of the restrictions made in section 5 of the original act. It reads:

That the act of Congress approved March 3, 1865, entitled "An act to incorporate the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company," be, and the same is hereby, so amended that hereafter it shall be the duty of the trustees and officers of said company to make loans, to the extent of one-half the deposits by them received, upon bonds or notes secured by first mortgages or deeds of trust upon unincumbered real estate, situate in the vicinity of the agency or branch of said company from which such deposits are received, worth, upon cash appraisement, at least double the amount of money loaned thereon. And the borrower shall, at his own expense, or the bank shall, at the expense of the borrower, keep the buildings upon said property insured in some good and solvent company, to the amount of one-half of their cash value for the benefit of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company. The other half they shall invest in United States bonds, or keep on deposit in some national bank such sums as may be necessary to meet current payments.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of said trustees and officers of said company to collect, as speedily as may be done without prejudice to the interests of the depositors, all sums of money by them loaned upon real estate outside of the States from which received; and as the same may be collected, they shall loan such funds as directed in the first section of this act.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 4. That said trustees and officers of said company shall not loan to any person or company at any one time more than $10,000 of the funds of said trust company.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 6. That hereafter the officers or agents of said trust company shall not pay interest on the deposits exceeding 5 per cent.

As soon as that authority was given the property of these poor people disappeared to such an extent that they have only been able to obtain some 62 per cent. of their original deposits. Trustees or receivers were appointed by Congress. They made various reports or settlements. I have them before me. Finally the Comptroller of the Currency was made the general trustee to wind up this business. Mr. Knox, when Comptroller, made an elaborate report. Mr. Cannon followed him with another report. The conclusion of Mr. Cannon's report states the case of the freedmen well. It reads thus:

In conclusion, permit me once more to renew my former recommendation and that of my predecessor for the relief by Congress of the unfortunate creditors of this institution. The great majority of them are of the poorest and most illiterate of our people. Many of them have grown old and decrepit. It seems impossible for these people to realize that they are to be deprived or have lost a portion of their earnings, which years ago they labored so hard to acquire and save. Thousands of them to this day believe that the dividends paid them by the commissioner are but the interest on or earnings of their deposit, and that sooner or later their original deposits will be returned to them. No explanation seems to convince them to the contrary, and calls are made daily both orally and in writing for "their money." Nor ought it to be considered strange or unreasonable, in view of all the circumstances, for these people to look to the Government for reimbursement of their losses.

The company was chartered by Congress for their special benefit, to encourage industry and thrift, and most of its branches were presided over by the commissioned and uniformed officers of the Government. It was but natural, therefore, for them to assume that the Government would see to the proper management of the institution and would protect them from loss.

Objection has been made to the granting of this relief, on the ground of its dangerous tendency as a precedent. This apprehension is, I think, groundless. There never was but one Freedman's Bank. There never will be another.

From the gradual diminution of the amount called for on account of the several dividends declared it is estimated that the sum of $950,000 would cover the deficiency between the amount paid (62 per cent.) and the amount to which the creditors likely to call for the same were entitled at the time of the failure of the company.

He then proceeds to show by tabulated statements how much has been paid and how much the loss has been, and why the freedmen ought to have the money refunded to them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask my friend from Kentucky whether in the payment of dividends so far to the depositors any discrimination has been made against a few poor whites?

Mr. BECK. None; nor against rich white people either. All the funds of the bank have been paid out the same as those of any other insolvent bank would be paid. All depositors of any class and color will get every dollar that the assets of the bank can pay. The passage of the bills for the relief of the colored men did not in any way injure white depositors; and if the white depositors, many of whom were speculators who broke up the bank and stole or squandered the money of the colored people—not all of them, because they imposed upon some white people too, but they must suffer, under the old rule that he who trusts most suffers most—made deposits without authority of law, why should Congress make good their loss? The original purpose of the bank was to limit it solely to colored people, the security to be exclusively the bonds of the United States. All white depositors, rich and poor, were interlopers, and Congress is under no obligations, legal or equitable, to make their losses good.

Mr. Trenholm, as Comptroller, took the case up; he gives a full history of its origin and the inducements held out to the freedmen. I will read only a part of his report, and ask the Reporter to insert the portion I have marked. When his statement is read the Senate will see at once that every one of those colored people believed the Government was responsible. Let me read what Mr. Trenholm says:

It seems plain that the honor of the Government became engaged in this undertaking when, in 1865, Congress, in the act of incorporation, held out to the lately emancipated slaves inducements to intrust their earnings to this institution by selecting as trustees the distinguished gentlemen whose names were incorporated in the charter, by requiring the deposits to be invested in securities of the United States, and by subjecting the books to Congressional examination.

This last provision was especially significant and bound Congress to provide for adequate examinations from time to time, since none of the fifty trustees lived in Washington, and only nine constituted a quorum.

Then he gives the names of the distinguished gentlemen who were trustees, headed by Peter Cooper. The list is as follows:

The names of the trustees are as follows: Peter Cooper, William C. Bryant, A. A. Low, S. B. Chittenden, Charles H. Marshall, William A. Booth, Gerritt Smith, William A. Hall, William Allen, John Jay, Abraham Baldwin, A. S. Barnes, Hiram Barney, Seth B. Hunt, Samuel Holmes, Charles Collins, R. R. Graves, Walter S. Griffith, A. H. Wallis, D. S. Gregory, J. W. Alvord, George Whipple, A. S. Hatch, Walter T. Hatch, E. A. Lambert, W. G. Lambert, Roe Lockwood, R. H. Manning, R. W. Ropes, Albert Woodruff, and Thomas Dewey, of New York; John M. Forbes, William Claflin, S. G. Howe, George L. Stearnes, Edward Atkinson, A. A. Lawrence, and John M. S. Williams, of Massachusetts; Edward Harris and Thomas Davis, of Rhode Island; Stephen Colwell, J. Wheaton Smith, Francis E. Cope, Thomas Webster, B. S. Hunt, and Henry Samuel, of Pennsylvania; Edward Harwood, Adam Poe, Levi Coffin, and J. M. Waldon, of Ohio.

Under the sanction of the Government and in the name of the philanthropists, statesmen, and financiers, thus united in a laudable purpose to secure the safe and profitable investment of the pay and bounty money of the colored troops and of the savings of other classes among the newly emancipated negroes, Army officers on duty in the South and the officials and agents of the Freedmen's Bureau were induced to urge the freedmen to bring their savings to be taken care of by these their friends and protectors.

Anson M. Sperry, in his examination before the Senate investigating committee, testified that he was employed in September, 1865, as general field agent to operate in the Twenty-fifth Army Corps, that he was commended by the Secretary of War to the commanders of the colored troops, and received from General Brice authority to be present at the pay tables in order there to persuade the men as they were paid off to confide their money to the safe-keeping of this institution. Similar efforts were no doubt made everywhere.

The company had previously been promised the deposits already accumulated in the savings banks established at Norfolk by General Butler, and at Beaufort, S. C., by General Saxton, so that these officers must be presumed to have accepted it as a safe depository.

The pass-books issued to depositors in the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company bore on the covers likenesses of President Lincoln, and of Generals Grant and Howard, and others whom the freedmen had learned to reverence as special benefactors of their race; the flag of the Union was depicted as sheltering and binding together the persons thus portrayed, while the remaining space was occupied with other pictorial devices adapted to the comprehension of those whose savings were sought after, and manifestly designed to assure them that the Government sanctioned the enterprise and would protect their interests.

The following citations are taken from a little pamphlet which appears to have been given to depositors, and otherwise widely circulated at the South:

"I consider the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company to be greatly needed by the colored people, and have welcomed it as an auxiliary to the Freedman's Bureau.—Maj. Gen. O. O. Howard.

"The whole institution is under the charter of Congress, and received the commendation and countenance of the President, Abraham Lincoln. One of the last official acts of his valued life was the signing of the bill which gave legal existence to this bank.

"Principal office, Washington, D. C., opposite the Treasury of the United States.

"This savings bank is established by act of Congress, approved March 3, 1865, by Abraham Lincoln.

"It is under the direction of a board of fifty trustees, who serve without pay. The branch offices are also under the supervision of local committees, chosen from the best men in the vicinity of each branch.

"The bank can not loan its deposits nor use them in any way except to invest them, according to the act of Congress, in the bonds of the United States, and in real-estate securities worth double the amount so invested.

"The profits of the bank are all returned to the depositors as interest, necessary expenses alone excepted. The income from deposits not called for goes to the 'educational fund' for the sole use of the freedmen and their descendants.

"The bank is obliged to keep its books open at all times to the inspection of such committees as Congress may from time to time appoint."

It was under these inducements and assurances that the colored people made their deposits. The Comptroller goes on to say:

Everything done had the inevitable effect of impressing upon those whose savings were solicited the assurance that the Government of the United States had undertaken to secure their safe-keeping, and unless the good faith of the original promoters of the bank is doubted, this was probably distinctly stated over and over again.

While there may have been some unprincipled persons engaged in the enterprise, it would be unjust to question the good faith of the many disinterested benefactors of the freedmen, such, for example, as Frederick Douglass, Charles Sumner, and others, who were among its promoters, and therefore they must be presumed to have depended upon the terms of the charter and the character of the trustees to justify the earnestness and the energy which they threw into their efforts to gather in deposits.

The fruits of these efforts were commensurate with their intensity, and with the authority sustaining them. Sperry testifies that the aggregate deposits amounted to $55,600,000. The Senate committee reports that more than $57,000,000 was obtained from upwards of 70,000 depositors. These 70,000 trustful and helpless men and women may fairly be presumed to have believed that their money was invested, as the charter required, in the securities of the United States, and that the Government that thus invited their confidence would protect them to the extent at least of enforcing by appropriate supervision the restrictions laid upon the management as to investments.

The commissioner next sets forth the change so carelessly made by Congress and its effect, as follows:

In 1870 the sum due to depositors appears to have amounted to at least $2,000,000, and if the charter had been complied with, the face value of the United States securities held by the bank should have exceeded this sum by a very large percentage. Their market value would have been much greater.

This was the time selected by Congress for amending the charter, not in the interest of the depositors, not according to any conceivable principle of justice, good faith, or public policy, but for some reason, with some purpose neither avowed at the time nor since satisfactorily explained. No examination had ever been made into the affairs of the bank, no report had been asked from the trustees, while the amending act contains neither a preamble nor an intimation of the object sought. It seems to have passed the House of Representatives without debate, and in the Senate to have met with but little notice, except from Senators Cameron and Williams, who earnestly opposed it. From the remarks of the former, as reported in the Congressional Globe of April 28, 1870, I quote as follows, to show that attention was at that time called to one probable effect of the contemplated legislation, although without avail in arresting action or suggesting inquiry:

General Simon Cameron, of Pennsylvania, well known, of course, as one of the ablest and most careful men who ever occupied a seat in this Senate, with his sagacious eye saw what would be the effect of the amendment, and in his forcible way he told the Senate what I now read:

I think it will in the end probably destroy the institution. * * *

That was when it was proposed to give the trustees the right to loan money on real estate; in other words, to do as they pleased—

It is a principle which ought not to go into any banking institution at all. It is endangering the depositors of the funds, the small depositors especially. They are in the hands of persons entirely irresponsible, except the responsibility given by their character. They will be led probably into speculation; and if this money is once invested in real estate it will be very difficult to get it back. My experience has been that whenever institutions of this kind have invested their money in real estate they have gone to destruction. I shall vote against the bill.

And he did, but he could not stop it. The commissioner adds:

As foretold by Senator Cameron, the effect of the amendment was to remove the limitation which the charter had placed upon investments, and thus to expose to the depredations of speculators funds which Congress was bound to surround with safeguards.

To make this plain it is only necessary to refer to the fact that the act of incorporation specified the business of the company to be to receive deposits from or on account of the lately emancipated slaves, or their descendants, and to invest in securities of the United States the amounts so received, except so much as might be necessary, upon business principles, to be retained in what was at that time considered a more readily convertible form, not, however, exceeding one-third of the total amount on deposit.

This exception seems to have been rendered necessary because the company had no capital stock, and it was no doubt considered safe to allow this latitude to the managers, because of the high character of the trustees, and the distinguished position which many of them occupied in the estimation of the public, besides which, Congress reserved the right to examine the books at any time, and might thus guard against abuse of this privilege.

The act approved 6th of May, 1870, so amended section 5 of the act of incorporation as to allow half the deposits to be invested in bonds or notes secured by mortgage on real estate "in double the value loaned;" and the corporation was further authorized to hold and improve the real estate then owned by it in the city of Washington, attaching to this latter authority, however, the futile proviso that the corporation should not use for the purpose of such improvement the principal of any deposit made with it.

As before said, there does not appear to have been any reason assigned for this departure from the original limitation placed upon investments by the charter, and the clause authorizing the holding of certain real estate already acquired indicates that it had been acquired without authority of law, and could only be retained by a fresh grant of power.

Since the original provision as to one-third the deposits being invested as the trustees should think fit was retained, it is not surprising that the passage of this amendment should have been accepted by the managers of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company as a license to evade and trangress, at their discretion, all the restrictions imposed by the charter; and from that time, according to the evidence already referred to, the funds of the institution became rapidly absorbed in loans and investments more or less connected with the personal business or speculations of the active managers of the concern, both at Washington and at the branches. Only $400 in United States securities were found among the assets in 1874, when the bank failed.

A few extracts more will give the whole history of this institution that the Senate needs to know in connection with the resolution of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS]. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] I observe is watching with some impatience, as though he wished me to sit down; but I have to give this history I said yesterday I would, and I am not wasting any time, except to read what was said by the officials. I hope he will bear with me a few minutes longer. The President of the United States, Mr. Cleveland, when his attention was called to the matter, sent a message to Congress, in which he said:

I desire to call the attention of Congress to a plain duty which the Government owes to the depositors in the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company.

This company was chartered by the Congress for the benefit of the most illiterate and humble of our people, and with the intention of encouraging in them industry and thrift. Most of its branches were presided over by officers holding the commissions and clothed in the uniform of the United States. These and other circumstances reasonably, I think, led these people to suppose that the invitation to deposit their hard-earned savings in this institution implied an undertaking on the part of their Government that their money should be safely kept for them.

When this company failed it was liable in the sum of $2,939,925.22 to 61,131 depositors. Dividends amounting in the aggregate to 62 per cent. have been declared, and the sum called for paid of such dividends seems to be $1,648,181.72. This sum deducted from the entire amount of deposits leaves $1,291,744.50 still unpaid. Past experience has shown that quite a large part of this sum will not be called for. There are assets still on hand amounting to the estimated sum of $16,000.

I think the remaining 38 per cent. of such of these deposits as have claimants should be paid by the Government, upon principles of equity and fairness.

Carrying out the views of the President and the Comptroller securing the rights of these poor people, as shown by the bank charter, believing they had been imposed upon by reckless men, who controlled it, managed it, bankrupted it—I do not care to go into the character or conduct of the men who did it—Congress failed to do its duty by failing to cause examinations and reports to be made and by making improper amendments to the charter.

This Congress, acting through the Finance Committee of the Senate, passed a bill which the House committee has substantially agreed to—I have it before me—limiting the payment to those colored people who were the sufferers; the only amendment of the House committee adds some provisions to take care that the payments are fairly accounted for. The white depositors of course made their complaints to the Comptroller that they were not embraced in the bill, and on the 25th of July Mr. Trenholm wrote this circular, which was sent to me this morning:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER OF THE FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.
Washington, D. C., July 25, 1888.

SIR: Your letter of the —— is received, and in reply you are respectfully informed that the bill recently passed by the Senate does not in any way alter, impair, or otherwise affect the rights of any depositor in the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company.

This is a proper answer to the question asked by the Senator from Vermont.

Each retains a right to his full share of the proceeds of the assets of that institution. The corporation is in liquidation and that liquidation will proceed, and whatever is ultimately realized will be divided among all depositors who have proved their claims in accordance with existing laws.

If the bill passed by the Senate becomes a law the effect will be simply to make good to those, for whose benefit exclusively the institution was originally designed, the difference between their share of the assets of the corporation and the amount of their deposits.

This may be regarded as a pure gratuity from Congress to these people, the distinction in their favor resting upon the unquestionable fact that none but persons of African descent had any right to make use of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company in any manner or to acquire by any means any interest whatever in its assets; or it may be regarded as an act of justice to the colored depositors demanded by the unquestionable facts (1) that Congress undertook the supervision of the institution and failed to carry out the undertaking, and (2) that the depositors lost their money because, without adequate notice to them, Congress so changed the charter of the bank as to remove the proper restrictions originally imposed upon its investments.

Neither you nor any other white depositor have any claim upon either the bounty or justice of Congress. You were bound to know the limitations of the charter of the corporation with which you dealt and therefore to know that its officers could not lawfully take your deposits. You can not claim to have known of the restraints upon investments and of the obligation as to supervision and at the same time say you did not know that you had no right to become a depositor.

It is not intended in any way to inflict now upon white depositors any loss, any injury, or even any censure. Up to this time they have been treated precisely like those depositors who could alone lawfully make use of this institution, and I know of no reason why they should not continue to be treated in the same way, so far as the assets of the corporation are concerned, and this is all they can reasonably expect.

Very respectfully,

W. L. TRENHOLM, Commissioner.

Mr. President, that is the whole case. I have briefly given the reasons why the Committee on Finance acted as they did in limiting this bounty, or act of justice as I think it is, to the colored depositors: first, because it was a bank established solely for their benefit; second, because these poor people were induced to make their deposits by representatives of the United States, who assured them that it had the guaranty of the Government in every possible form; third, because the officers of the United States, many of them in the uniform of the United States, were controlling and managing this institution, in which under the law they could deal in nothing but bonds of the United States, which were as safe as any securities could possibly be, and as Congress was from time to time bound to take supervision of it and to protect the depositors, and failed to do so, I think a moral obligation is created to pay the loss. Instead of doing what it agreed to do, Congress failed to make any examination, failed to require any reports, and worse than all, after the bank had obtained more than $50,000,000, much of it from seventy-odd thousand of the poorest people in America, formerly slaves, who were induced to make deposits under the provisions of the original act and under the circumstances Mr. Trenholm has stated, Congress changed the charter, against the protest of General Cameron and of other careful men, and placed everything these people had in the hands of speculators who ruined the bank. Under these circumstances and because of the neglect of Congress to comply with its obligations, on the recommendation of the Comptroller of the Currency and upon the recommendation of the President of the United States, and, I believe, by the unanimous vote of the Committee on Finance, it was thought Congress was under obligations to these colored people to pay them the difference between 62 and 100 per cent., and not to allow the white people, rich or poor, to have anything to do with it, for the reasons I have stated. That was what I said on yesterday I would show this morning.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ALLISON. I move now to proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the Army bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa, from the Committee on Appropriations, moves that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the Army bill. [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope the Senator will allow me to proceed with my remarks this morning. I gave notice yesterday of a desire to do so, and I should like very much to be allowed to proceed.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not desire to appear to be discourteous in any way to the Senator from Texas, but this Army bill is a matter of great moment and it ought to be considered. I am quite sure the Senator from Texas will have time during the day to make his remarks after this matter is disposed of.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, during seven or eight months of this session——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is compelled to state that under the rules this motion is not open to debate. This motion must be decided without debate, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. REAGAN. I simply desire to appeal to the courtesy of the Senator from Iowa to allow me to proceed now. There will be more time now than after awhile.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course I do not wish to interfere with the Senator from Texas, but I wish to say one word as respects the situation of the appropriation bills.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from Iowa proceeding to debate the motion to proceed with the consideration of this conference report? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ALLISON. This bill is for the support of the Army for the current fiscal year. We have already by two separate and distinct resolutions extended from month to month the appropriations of last year to take care of the Army this year. This is the 16th day of August, and on the 31st day of August the appropriations for the Army will have expired again, and I think that it is the duty of the Senate, without respect to party or without respect to what our views may be respecting other things, to see to it that these appropriation bills are disposed of as rapidly as we can dispose of them in this body.

Now, it is no fault of ours or of Senators on either side of this Chamber that the Army bill is in the situation that it is in to-day. I do not know how many conferences may be required upon this bill; I do not know what impediments may yet be thrown in its pathway; but I want to appeal to Senators on both sides of the Chamber to allow the conference reports upon the appropriation bills as they come in to be considered.

I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Texas at any time, and I will yield to him now if he persists in his request and says he wants to go on with his remarks to-day upon a subject which can not be considered to-day; but I appeal to Senators to allow the appropriation bills to go through as rapidly as we can consider them and use and occupy the intervening space for the consideration of other subjects which are not so pressing. That is all there is about it. I want to discharge my duty as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations having in charge this business in the Senate, by showing to the Senate that we are now here six weeks in this fiscal year without an appropriation for the support of the Army for this year. If Senators think it is wise to further postpone the consideration of these appropriation bills for the purpose of general consideration and debate, I have discharged my duty.

Mr. REAGAN. I only desire to say a word. It will not delay the action of the Appropriations Committee more than three-quarters of an hour or an hour to allow me to make my remarks. If the Senator persists on proceeding, of course he has a right to do so; but as I have not before asked this courtesy of the Senate, and as it has not been denied to any other Senator——

Mr. ALLISON. If Senators on either side of the Chamber think it is wiser to go on with miscellaneous debate, I shall yield, only stating the situation of these measures.

Mr. HAWLEY. The only way for the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to find what the Senate wishes is to ask the Senate to dispose of his motion by a vote.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not care for that now.

THE PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] is entitled to the floor on the resolution of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to refer to the Committee on Finance the President's annual message.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, I propose to discuss briefly some questions connected with our tariff legislation; and as the line of observation I propose does not involve a discussion of the details of any bill, I will occupy the attention of the Senate now without waiting for the report of the Senate's committee now preparing a tariff bill.

TAXATION AND REVENUE.

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

The power being thus given by the Constitution to raise revenue, among other ways by means of levying duties on imports, the courts will not attempt to control the discretion of Congress as to the rates of duty to be imposed. The objects for which such duties may be levied are specified in the foregoing clause of the Constitution; that is, "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States." Duties levied for any other purpose would be without warrant or authority in the Constitution.

Mr. Cooley, in his work upon Constitutional Limitations, says:

But we think it clear, in the words of the supreme court of Wisconsin, that "the Legislature can not * * * in the form of a tax, take the money of a citizen and give it to an individual, the public interest and welfare being in no way connected with the transaction. The objects for which money is raised by taxation must be public, and such as to subserve the common interest and well-being of the community required to contribute." Or, as stated by the supreme court of Pennsylvania, "the Legislature has no constitutional right to * * * levy a tax or authorize a municipal corporation to do it in order to raise funds for a mere private purpose. No such authority passed to the Assembly by the general grant of legislative power. This would not be legislation. Taxation is a mode of raising revenue for public purposes. When it is prostituted to objects in no way connected with the public interest or welfare, it ceases to be taxation and becomes plunder. Transferring from the owners of it into the possession of those who have no title to it, though it be done under the name and form of tax, is unconstitutional for all the reasons which forbid the Legislature to usurp any other power not granted to them."

Mr. Justice Miller, in delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Loan Association against Topeka, decided in 20 Wallace, uses the following language:

To lay with one hand the power of the Government on the property of the citizen, and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals to aid private enterprises and build up private fortunes is none the less robbery because it was done under the forms of law and is called taxation. This is not legislation; it is a decree under legislative forms.

All our constitutions of government, State and Federal, guard most jealously the rights of private property; and, except what is paid in legitimate taxation, in our country, it can only be taken without the consent of the owner for public uses, and not then without just compensation.

A tax levied on imports to obtain revenue to pay the debts of the Government and to provide for the common defense and general welfare is lawful, and may be necessary and proper.

A tax levied for the purpose of excluding imports, and to enable domestic manufacturers to increase the prices of their fabrics, and thus to enrich themselves off of the earnings of other people by extorting from them money to which they have no right, is, in the language of the Pennsylvania decision, "plunder," and in the language of Mr. Justice Miller "robbery," under the forms of law.

The inquiry arises, how shall we determine the boundary between a tariff for revenue and a tariff for protection? The answer is, that as long as the increase of the tax secures an increase of revenue it is a revenue tariff. But when we reach the point on any commodity where the increase of the tax reduces the revenue by excluding imports, we then have a tariff for protection.

While on this subject we have, according to the opinions of judges and law writers, the apparently incongruous views presented that Congress may, in the exercise of its discretion, violate the Constitution by the enactment of a protective tariff law, and that there is no remedy for this in the courts; still the members of Congress are required to take an oath to support the Constitution, and the people have a right to appeal to their consciences for the preservation of the organic law. On failure to secure justice in this way their remedy then is to change their Representatives and Senators.

The difficulty here is that where men's interests are involved it is the common experience that they are apt to pay too little regard to the requirements of the Constitution and to the rules of right. So that at last, on this question, the various interests of the country are practically driven to the necessity of protecting their rights and property against spoliation by their numbers and votes. This being so, let us consider the practical question of how the present tariff legislation affects the interests of different classes of people so as to be able to determine what should be the policy and action of each class so affected.

Protectionists and the managers of trusts seek for a scale of duties so high as to exclude imports, give them a monopoly of the markets, and enable them to fix their own prices on their fabrics. Some of them say—I must think insincerely—that protection does not increase prices. If it does not, what reason can they assign for desiring it; and why do they so earnestly contend for it? They must have some motive for this contention. What is it, if not to secure to them higher prices and greater profits?

Consumers seek open markets and reasonable prices for the things they are obliged to buy, and hence desire the lowest rate of duties which will furnish the necessary revenue for the support of the Government economically administered.

WHO IS BENEFITED BY THIS TAXATION.

The value of our imports for the year which ended June 30, 1888, was $723,873,630. Of this sum the taxed imports amounted to $479,805,362; the remainder, $244,068,268, being imported free of duty. The average rate of duty on the taxed imports was 47.10 per cent. and yields a gross revenue of $225,988,225. Now, let us see what it costs the consumers of the country, the farmers, laborers, artisans, professional men, and others, to obtain this $225,988,225 of gross revenue. The value of manufactured products in the United States for the year 1880, as shown by the census, was $5,369,579,191. It is fair to assume that when we tax imports $47.10 on the $100 worth of imported goods this enables the makers of domestic products of the same kinds to add 47.10 per cent. on the dollar to the price of their fabrics, and still to undersell importers by the amount of the cost of transportation from foreign countries to this. This may not be strictly accurate, but it is near enough correct to illustrate the view I am presenting. A tax of 47.10 per cent. on the amount of our domestic manufactures of 1880 (and they are considerably more now) would yield $2,527,071,798 of revenue. But let us deduct $2,000,000,000 from the $5,369,579,191 as the assumed proportion our free-list bears to the taxed imports and we still have $3,369,579,191 of domestic fabrics of the kinds of our taxed imports. A tax of $47.10 on the $100 of this sum would show that to obtain $225,988,225 of gross revenue for the support of the Government from imports we are taxed $1,587,071,798, which does not go into the Treasury, but is transferred by law from the consumers to the manufacturers of these goods.

But this sum should be reduced by the amount of a reasonable average tax—say 30 per cent. A tax of 30 per cent. on $3,396,579,191 would yield $1,010,873,757 of revenue. Deduct this sum from $1,587,071,798 and still the consumers of our domestic manufactures would be unnecessarily taxed the sum of $576,198,044 a year. This is the sum annually transferred, according to this calculation, from the consumers to the manufacturers of these fabrics. At this rate how many years will it take to transfer the property of this country into the hands of a few men and to make paupers and beggars of the toiling millions?

Is any one surprised that the great body of the people of this country and their property are being covered with debts and mortgages, while a few men and corporations are accumulating hundreds of millions of dollars? Is any one surprised that there is discontent, unrest among farmers, mechanics, and laboring men all over the land?

Examination will show that this picture is underdrawn rather than overdrawn, and that the aggregate of this legal robbery is even greater than I have estimated it.

As confirmation of the above, I quote from the Hon. Frank H. Hurd, one of the ablest political economists in this country, in Belford's Magazine for June, 1888, as follows:

I content myself to give what the ablest and most faithful statistician has given me, after I had referred the query to his most thoughtful and accurate investigation. His report to me was that the increased price to the farmer of America—

Growing out of our tariff—exceeds $600,000,000 a year.

And this last sum of $576,198,041 is the difference against the consumers of these fabrics and in favor of the manufacturers of a tax for protection of $47.10 on the $100 worth of merchandise consumed, and a tax for revenue of $30 on the $100 of merchandise consumed; and assuming that the population of the United States is 55,000,000, this is equal to a tax of $10.47½ a year for every man, woman, and child in the United States.

Among those who defend a high protective tariff are many who have much to say on occasions about the crime of African slavery as it formerly existed in this country when about 5,000,000 were held in that condition. These same persons are now laboring to enslave and are enslaving 40,000,000 people, white and black. The difference between these two systems of slavery is, that under the former the master, from self-interest and from the principles of humanity and of religious duty, housed, fed, and clothed his slaves, furnishing them medical service in sickness and having them nursed in infancy and cared for in old age. Under the latter system the manufacturers, the masters of this larger number of white and black slaves, extort from them about all the profits of their toil and neither house, clothe, nor feed them, nor furnish them medical assistance, nor nurse them in infancy, nor care for them in their old age.

Of the 50,155,783 population of the United States in 1880 there were, as shown by the census, 17,392,000 engaged in gainful occupations. Of these there were engaged in—

Agriculture	7,670,493
In professional and personal service	4,074,238
In trade and transportation	1,810,256
Aggregating	13,554,987

And there were engaged in manufactures and mechanical and mining industries, 3,837,112. Of these probably about one-third were engaged in the business of protected manufactures, leaving about 16,113,075 people who are taxed $47.10 on the $100 worth of merchandise of the taxed kinds, which they buy for the benefit of 1,279,034 people engaged in the manufacture of articles of the kinds of our taxed imports. This statement is made on the idea that the laborers in the manufacturing establishments participate in the receipt of the plunder thus extorted from others, while in fact they only get enough of it as a rule for their barest subsistence. The balance goes to the 14,500 mill-owning capitalists, for whose benefit the whole American people, including their own laborers, are thus mercilessly plundered.

It is pitiable to see their workmen accepting as true the hypothetical falsehood that high protection means high wages, and voting to perpetuate such an outrage on themselves and their countrymen. If that is true, why is it that after being blessed with a high protective tariff for twenty-seven years the employés of the manufacturing establishments of this country find that there is now less certainty of their getting employment, and that they are in greater poverty and want than ever before in the history of this country?

Our exports must pay for our imports or we must cease to trade with foreign nations. To take away from our people foreign markets for their wheat, corn, meats, cotton, dairy products, etc., would be to bankrupt the millions of our people who are engaged in agricultural pursuits and to ruin the country financially.

During the year which ended the 30th of June last we imported into this country $716,492,896 worth of merchandise from other countries. We paid for that merchandise by exporting $716,183,211 worth of the products of American labor. Of this amount of exports $523,073,798 were agricultural products, being 74½ per cent. of all our exports, this amount being the surplus which remained after supplying all that our home markets required. If we could not have found a market in foreign countries for this immense surplus of our agricultural products that large sum would have been lost to the farmers of the United States.

We could not have secured this market abroad without buying from the people of other countries a portion of their surplus products. If we refuse to buy in foreign countries we can not sell in foreign countries.

The dullest intellect can see that if the Republican policy of a prohibitory tariff shall be adopted the 8,000,000 agriculturists of this country must be hopelessly ruined, our unequaled agricultural possibilities destroyed, and our people by this process of robbery so impoverished that they would be rendered unable to purchase even the domestic manufactures of the capitalists by whose avarice they are being despoiled.

Agriculture has no protection, but is taxed for the benefit of other interests at home and must find markets for its unprotected surplus in foreign countries in free-trade competition with what is called the pauper labor of the Old World. And notwithstanding this, Republican farmers of this country, under the party lash, accept this cruel delusion and aid to perpetuate this stupendous fraud on their own rights and on those of their wives and children.

Let us see as to what is the necessary and actual result of the legislation which transfers such vast sums of money from the great body of the people to a limited class.

This, with the other class legislation for which the Republican party is responsible, such as their policy with reference to the finances of the country, the squandering of the public lands, the giving of the public money to corporations, and generally the use it made of the control of the Government to enrich those in power at the expense of the people generally, has in the last twenty-five years revolutionized American society, totally changed its condition from what it was before that party came into power, in this, that it has made it possible for a considerable number of men to accumulate fortunes of from one million to one hundred and fifty million dollars each in a few years, in the face of the fact known to all that no man under just and equal laws and by fair and legitimate enterprise can accumulate such sums in an ordinary lifetime. Such a result can only be brought about by legislation such as our protective-tariff laws, which operate to transfer the property and money of the country from the many to the few without reciprocal compensation, or by theft or robbery. We do not, as a rule, suppose those who have accumulated these vast fortunes to have been guilty of ordinary vulgar theft or of robbery by force and violence. They employ the more refined and elegant method of robbing by the help of unjust and unconscionable laws, and call this successful business enterprise.

While these vast fortunes are thus being made by the few we see that during the same time vast numbers of what was formerly the independent middle class of society becoming poor employés and dependents and losing the sturdy manhood which formerly characterized them, while those who were poor are being year by year converted into vast armies of beggars and tramps, suffering out a miserable existence and endangering the future peace, welfare, and safety of both society and government.

In this connection I read the following dispatch:

WILMINGTON, DEL., August 9.

The Every Evening (Dover, Del.) correspondent says: "Tramps are still coming down the Peninsula by the car-load, and what to do with them is now the question. Over one hundred of them are now in Dover jail, and that building can hold no more. Twenty-six were added to the number yesterday. Detective Hutchins received a telegram asking him to come to Wyox, where fully two hundred tramps were hanging around the station. He did not go, as he had no place to put them if they were arrested. A great many think that the fruit men made a big mistake in passing that 'tramp protective resolution,' as it has evidently encouraged this class to come here. It is estimated that fully ten thousand are on the Peninsula, and still they come."

This will be better understood by those old enough to contrast the condition of the people of this country as it was before the Republicans came into power and its condition at the present time.

From the year 1801, when the Democrats came into the control of the executive and legislative departments of the Government, until 1861, when they went out of power—for these sixty years no people on earth made such progress in the establishment and maintenance of popular liberty, in the increase of intelligence and virtue, and in all the elements which give content, security, and happiness to society as ours did during that time, with the single exception of the controversy about the institution of African slavery, an institution which they inherited from their colonial ancestors, who accepted it from Great Britain, France, Spain, and the Dutch merchants, and which had been perpetuated and protected by the Constitution and laws of the United States, and of a part of the States, and for which, therefore, if it was wrong, they were not responsible. With this single exception during that time it is not probable a like number of people were ever anywhere or at any time so independent, so self-reliant, so happy, and so contented.

Perhaps I am wrong in saying "with this single exception," as from 1828 to 1833 there was discontent and disturbance over this same tariff question.

During those sixty years we had equal and just laws, except the high-tariff legislation just mentioned, which protected all the people alike and gave unjust advantages to none. During that period we had no millionaires, and but few paupers, and no tramps or anarchists. During that period the wealth of this country was more equally distributed among the people and the fruits of that wealth were more universally enjoyed by them than by any other people in any age of the world. And during that period we had the freest, the most independent, and the happiest people on the earth.

And we had no Grange organizations, no Alliance organizations, no Knights of Labor, no Union Labor party; the doctrines of the socialists were only spoken of to be reprobated as Red Republicanism, and such a creature as an anarchist was not supposed to be a possibility in American society. And such strikes of workingmen as have occurred in the last ten or fifteen years, in which capital lies idle, workmen are impoverished, and property destroyed, were unknown.

Now, all things have their cause. I submit that these several organizations, and others of a political and quasi-political character, which have come into existence since the Republican party got control of the Government, had their foundation in its monopolistic and reactionary theory of government and the practices under it of promoting and combining the interests of capital against the interests of labor; and that each of these organizations, as well as the organization of the Greenback party, was a separate and several protest against the doctrines and practices of the Republican party, connected with the fear that the Democratic party would not be strong enough to give the necessary relief; and partly perhaps because Republicans who were wearied with the practices of their party and desired to correct them were not willing, on account of party prejudice, to unite with the Democrats to secure the needed reforms.

It has been charged that the Democrats have for a long time had control of the House of Representatives, and recently of the Executive Departments of the Government, and that they have failed to give relief against the oppressive and unjust policy of the Republican party.

Republicans charge the Democratic party with not being able to relieve the country against their own legislation and policies. It must be borne in mind that the Democratic party has at no time since these Republican policies were inaugurated had the control of both branches of Congress and of the Executive Departments of the Government at the same time; and that for this reason it has not been able to formulate and carry out a policy of its own. If the people will give it the power, and if it shall then fail to inaugurate a policy in the interest of the people, then let it be condemned. But it is both unfair and unjust to condemn it for a failure to do what it has not been intrusted with power to do.

Now, we have a few people with their millions of wealth, with their palatial residences, their villas for summer resort at watering places, their costly yachts for pleasure at sea, their splendid equipages for enjoyment on land, reminding one of the costly villas by the sea and of the princely and luxurious style of living of the wealthy masters of Rome just preceding the fall and desolation of that once imperial and all-conquering republic. And if our present protective-tariff legislation and other class legislation shall be continued as they are now we shall see the great masses of the people descending lower and lower in the scale of poverty and becoming less and less independent, until at last they must reach the level of the poverty and degradation of the people of Rome, when princes and peasants, masters and slaves, the rich and the poor, on the fall of the empire, went down in one common sea of ruin, brought about by a system of enriching the few and enslaving the many, only different in the plan of its accomplishment from that which is now being pursued in free, democratic America.

How long, oh, how long, will our people consent to be deceived and cheated by heartless knaves into the belief that they are benefited by being taxed $47 on every hundred dollars' worth of merchandise they buy of the class of taxed imports!

WHO PAYS THE TAXES?

The theory on which taxes are paid in this country is that we pay poll-taxes to the State governments in consideration for the personal security guarantied to us by the Government; and that we pay a property tax in return for the protection of our property by the Government. This is reasonable and just. We pay no poll-tax to the Federal Government, because under our system we must look to the States for our personal security. Nor do we pay a property tax to the Federal Government, for the same reason as to the States. But we are taxed by it to raise revenue to pay its debts and for the common defense and general welfare. This covers, in a sense, the protection of both the persons and property of the people. And the same rule as in the States should apply—that is, that the citizen should be taxed in proportion to the amount which the Government protects for him. The rich should pay more, and the poor should pay less. As we are considering the tax on imports, I shall not now discuss the internal-revenue tax.

Do the several citizens pay taxes on imports for the use of the Government, and the taxes which go to the manufacturers, and which are not for the use of the Government, in proportion to the property they own, and which the Government is bound in case of necessity to protect?

Let us see. The tax formerly levied on manufactured products yielded in 1866 $127,000,000 of revenue for the support of the Government. This was a tax on wealth, and the law authorizing its levy has been repealed. We had a graduated tax on incomes which yielded a large amount of revenue for the support of the Government. That was a tax on wealth, and it has been repealed. The receipts of railroad companies, insurance companies, and express companies were taxed. These were taxes on wealth, and they have been repealed. So bank capital, bank deposits, and bank checks were taxed. These were taxes on wealth, and they are repealed. The 140,000 miles of railroad in the United States, of the estimated value of nearly $8,000,000,000, pay no taxes to the Federal Government either on their vast property or on its income, for this would be a tax on wealth.

No tax is paid on the thousands of millions of dollars' worth of stocks and bonds held in this country, or on the income from them, for this would be a tax on wealth. The 283,852 manufacturing establishments in the United States in 1880, with their capital at that time of $2,790,272,606 (the number and capital being much greater now), pay no taxes to the Federal Government on either their property or their income; such a tax would be a tax on wealth. Who then pay the tariff taxes? Those who wear clothes made of cotton or woolen goods, those who eat sugar or rice or other food products, those who buy and use tools for the farm or the workshop. The man with a wife and three children who owns or rents a small farm, or the mechanic who owns or rents his shop and works hard the year round to support his family and educate his children, pays more taxes into the Federal Treasury, and pays more for the benefit of domestic manufacturers, which does not go into the Treasury, than W. H. Vanderbilt or Jay Gould, who own their hundreds of millions of dollars. I say more, because in addition to the clothes and food they buy, which is common to both classes, the farmer or the mechanic has to pay the taxes on his tools, while the millionaire needs no tools to enable him to collect the income on his stocks, bonds, and railroads. Even the day laborer, if decently clad, pays about as much of this tax as his wealthy employer; for each pays the tax on the clothes he wears and the food he eats.

The enormous tax of $1,587,071,798, which I have shown is collected annually for the benefit of the Government and of the manufacturers, is paid mainly by the farmers, mechanics, artisans, professional men, and laborers of the country. It is an enormous tax on industry and labor from the burdens of which the wealth of the country is in the main exempt. It is a tax on poverty and toil for the benefit of wealth and luxury. It is an unjust burden on the many for the benefit of the favored few.

This is in harmony with the policy of the Republican party from the time it came into power of running the Government for the benefit of corporations and the moneyed classes, and of sacrificing the interests and disregarding the rights of the general mass of the people.

DO HIGH TAXES ON IMPORTS SECURE HIGH WAGES TO LABOR?

The Republicans affirm this proposition; the Democrats deny it.

Of all the fallacies relied upon by protectionists this is one of the boldest, most insincere, and most mischievous. The statement of a supposed case will illustrate this. John Jones has $1,000,000 invested in an establishment for the manufacture of cotton or woolen goods or iron or steel. At a given rate of duty, after paying for raw material, and paying his operatives $1 a day, he receives a net income of 10 per cent. on his investment, equal to $100,000 a year. The rate or duty is then increased on the manufactured product, so that under the same circumstances he receives a net income of 30 per cent., equal to $300,000 a year. Is there a laboring man outside of a lunatic asylum, whether in a manufacturing establishment or on a farm, ignorant enough to suppose that the manufacturer will increase the pay of his operatives to $3 per day because his profits are increased threefold by the increase of the tariff duties? Or is there a protectionist who has so little respect for truth and honor as to assume that this increase of profits would cause a corresponding increase of wages?

The truth is that the profit of the employer has very little influence, as a rule, over the rates of wages. It is true that where profits are large the employer would be enabled, if he chose to do so, to pay higher wages than he could on small profit. But will he do this? Does he do it? The rates of wages depend on very different questions. If labor is more abundant than the demand for it the competition for employment causes wages to be low. If labor is scarce and the demand for it greater than the supply, then wages are high. If the market is overstocked with any particular kind of manufactured fabrics, and sales are slow or suspended, the wages of the class of operatives who produce that fabric are lowered or suspended. If there is a condition of general prosperity the tendency is for wages to be good. If there is general dullness in the markets and in business, wages go down. If money is scarce wages are lower. If money is abundant wages are higher. Labor, like every other commodity which is for sale, is governed very largely by the law of supply and demand. The foregoing are the principal causes of the increase or decrease of the prices of labor.

If high duties give high wages, why is it under a tariff which is nearly prohibitory, and which nearly doubles the cost of living to families who live by their labor, that there is now and has been for years past so much poverty, destitution, and suffering among the operatives engaged in all the protected industries? Why all the lockouts and strikes we hear of all over the country, while at the same time the owners of the establishments in which these people work are piling up their millions of profits? If they were dividing these profits with their employés they and the employés might say that high tariffs give high wages. Until they do this common sense and decency should not be further offended by the cry that high tariffs make high wages.

But, it is said, if we reduce the tariff we will reduce the wages of our manufacturing operatives to the rates of wages of the pauper labor of Europe. This is untrue in every sense. In the first place a reduction of the tariff would reduce the cost of living without materially affecting the rates of wages. This is manifest from what I have just said.

In the next place, though operatives in this country, as a rule, receive higher wages than those in like employments in other countries, they produce fabrics at less cost to their employers. This is a result of their being better housed and fed and clothed, and hence more vigorous and skillful; because the American has higher incentives, higher motives to stimulate his pride and ambition to excel in whatever he undertakes; and because they are supplied with better tools and machinery, coupled with our possession of unlimited amounts of raw material. On this subject I present some high authority, going to show that our American labor is cheaper, considered in its relation to the value of its products, than the labor of Europe. Mr. Thomas G. Shearman, a high authority on this subject, in an article in the June number of Bedford's Magazine, says:

> On the contrary, the convention ought distinctly to recognize the unquestionable fact that American workmen receive higher wages than others solely because Americans produce more than others; that high wages mean cheap labor, and that while American wages are the highest, American labor is for that very reason the cheapest in the world.

Protectionists may think it a sufficient answer to this to say that Mr. Shearman is a free-trader. If so, I present some other authority on this question.

Hon. WILLIAM M. EVARTS, then Secretary of State of the United States, and now an honorable Senator in this body, in his official letter to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, on the 17th of May, 1879, "transmitting the reports from United States consuls in relation to the state of labor in Europe," after calling attention to these reports, summarizes the points raised by them, and introduces his summary as follows:

> There are a number of most important points, deducible from these reports, which should be kept prominently and permanently in sight in order that relative conditions of labor in Europe and the United States may be thoroughly appreciated. Some of these points are as follows.

After submitting eight points in this summary he proceeds as follows:

> 9. That the average American workman performs from one and a half to twice as much work, in a given time, as the average European workman. This is so important a point in connection with our ability to compete with the cheap labor manufactures of Europe, and it seems on first thought so strange that I will trouble you with somewhat lengthy quotations from these reports in support thereof.

After reciting extracts from the reports of consuls to sustain the foregoing statement, the honorable Secretary says:

> One workman in the United States, as will be seen by the foregoing extracts, does as much work as two in most of the countries of Europe.

In a letter from Hon. James G. Blaine, then Secretary of State of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, on the 25th of June, 1881, transmitting "reports from consuls of the United States on the trade in cotton yarns and twist, and cotton manufactures in their several districts," page 99, under the heading, "Wages of English and American operatives," after presenting reports and tables showing the hours of labor and the rates of wages, says:

> Undoubtedly the inequalities in the wages of English and American operatives are more than equalized by the greater efficiency of the latter and their longer hours of labor. If this should prove to be a fact in practice, as it seems to be proven from official statistics, it would be a very important element in the establishment of our ability to compete with England for our share of the cotton goods trade of the world.

And he adds:

> In the two prime factors which may be said to form the basis of the cotton-manufacturing industry, namely, raw material and labor, we hold the advantage over England in the first and stand upon an equality with her in the second.

These two references are two formal, official, and important state papers, by two of the ablest and most conspicuous protectionists in the country, and can not be answered by applying to their authors the stereotyped epithet "free-trader." And if their authority is to be relied on, a given amount paid in wages to American workingmen will produce a larger product and greater profit to the manufacturer (the capitalist) than an equal amount paid in wages will produce in Europe.

This shows the unfairness and hypocrisy of the pretense that a high tariff is necessary to protect the operatives in our manufacturing establishments against what is called the pauper labor of Europe.

PRICES AND WAGES.

It would extend my remarks beyond a reasonable limit to go fully into the effect of tariff legislation on the prices of commodities and the wages of labor in this country.

Mr. M. M. Grosvenor gave the country a volume on the question "Does protection protect?" some years back, in which he gives an analysis of the prices of agricultural products, of iron, of wool, and of woolen and cotton goods, and generally of manufactured fabrics, and of the wages of labor, and statistics on many other questions of political economy in this country, in which he shows the prices of the different articles and the rates of wages under each of the tariff laws of the United States from the first one passed down to 1871. He shows by reference to dates and prices that the effect of high tariffs is to reduce the prices of commodities, especially of raw materials, and to reduce the rates of wages; while the effect of low tariffs is to increase the prices of commodities and especially of raw materials and of wages. His book contains an exhaustive investigation of these questions, and demonstrates beyond doubt the propositions above stated.

OTHER EVILS OF A HIGH TARIFF.

Besides plundering the people for the enrichment of manufacturers and trusts, we are accumulating the money of the country in the Treasury of the United States at the rate of about $60,000,000 a year beyond the legitimate need of the Government; and on the 31st of July, 1888, there is in the Treasury a surplus of $132,517,535.47 taken from the channels of trade and locked up where it is useless to the business and labor of the country, as a result of excessive protection of capital against labor. And this is in addition to the $100,000,000 in gold locked up in the Treasury under the pretense that it is held for the redemption of legal-tender notes in the interest of bondholders and bankers, in the face of the act of May 31, 1878, which provides:

That from and after the passage of this act it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury, or other officer under him, to cancel or retire any more of the legal-tender notes. And when any of said notes may be redeemed or received into the Treasury under any law from any source whatever, and shall belong to the United States, they shall not be retired, canceled, or destroyed, but shall be reissued and paid out again and kept in circulation.

It is thus seen that at a time when, as to all the rural agricultural parts of the country at least, there is a scarcity of money which is causing much distress, $232,517,535.47 are withdrawn from circulation to accommodate the interests of protectionists and bankers and bondholders, and as a temptation to profligate and corrupt legislation. And this vast sum of idle money is being increased by exorbitant taxation at the rate of about $60,000,000 a year.

The President of the United States and the Democratic members of Congress propose to reduce this surplus in the Treasury and to allow this vast sum of money to be returned to the channels of trade to stimulate enterprise and industry, and to reward labor by a reduction of the tax on imports to what is actually necessary to meet the expenses of the Government economically administered.

The Republican national convention which recently met at Chicago accepts the issue thus tendered by the Democracy, and in their platform say:

We accept the issue, and confidently appeal to the people for their judgment. The protective system must be maintained. * * *

The Republican party would effect all needed reduction of the national revenue by repealing the tax upon tobacco, * * * and the tax upon spirits used in the arts and for mechanical purposes. * * *

If there shall remain a larger revenue than is requisite for the wants of the Government, we favor the entire repeal of internal-revenue taxes rather than surrender any part of the protective system.

The fair and undoubted meaning of which is that this Republican convention favors a tax as nearly prohibitory as they can obtain on such luxuries as clothes, hats, blankets, food, and tools to work with, and in lieu of this to supply the country with such necessaries of life as whisky and tobacco freed from all taxation; and the Republican members of Congress indorse and approve this monstrous policy.

Can there be a doubt as to which side of this question the majority of the intelligent and patriotic voters of this country will adopt?

There is much reason to congratulate the country on the professed reforms of political principles which the Democracy has compelled the Republican party to adopt as a last means of saving that party from further defeat.

The Republican national convention which recently met in Chicago, among other declarations of principle, made the following several declarations:

We declare our opposition to all combinations of capital organized in trusts or otherwise to control arbitrarily the condition of trade among our citizens.

They did not know what Mr. Blaine would say on that.

We reaffirm the policy of appropriating the public lands of the United States to be homesteads for American citizens and settlers.

The restoration of unearned railroad land grants to the public domain for the use of actual settlers.

The Republican party is in favor of the use of both gold and silver as money, and condemns the policy of the Democratic Administration in its efforts to demonetize silver.

That beats audacity itself, and I do not know what name to call it.

The votes and speeches of Republican Senators and Representatives in Congress, from the time that party came into power until the present, and the action of the Executive Departments at all times when under the control of that party, will show to any one who will take the trouble to investigate them that the foregoing declarations of principle are in direct conflict with the recorded action of that party for many years past, and that they may now be regarded as a sort of death-bed confession of past political sins.

In view of the conflict between the recorded action of the Republican party and the foregoing declarations, we may congratulate the country on the success of the Democratic party in educating Republicans up to the point of making such declarations of principle. If they are only hypocritically made in the effort to be successful in the approaching election, still such action is a tribute to the virtue and soundness of Democratic principles.

The Hon. James G. Blaine, who has just returned from luxuriating in the splendid castle of Mr. Carnegie in Scotland, the prize extorted from American labor by a protective tariff, has taken upon himself the task of showing how little President Cleveland knows about tariffs, and trusts, and statesmanship generally. He sent from Europe his arraignment of the views of the President on the tariff question.

In his last annual message the President said:

In speaking of the increased cost to the consumer of our home manufactures, resulting from a duty laid upon imported articles of the same description, the fact is not overlooked that competition among our domestic producers sometimes has the effect of keeping the price of their products below the highest limit allowed by such duty. But it is notorious that this competition is too often strangled by combinations quite prevalent at this time, and frequently called trusts, which have for their object the regulation of the supply and price of commodities made and sold by members of the combination. The people can hardly hope for any consideration in the operation of these selfish schemes.

And now, Mr. Blaine, who is the guiding spirit of the Republican party in the pending campaign, true to his past record, and a true representative of his party and of its past history, has taken on himself, in his speech in Portland, Me., of yesterday, to ridicule Mr. Clevelands reference to the evils and dangers of trusts. And in his role of defender of protection, of corporations, of aggregations of capital of all kinds, he poses as the apologist and defender of trusts. This, with the money and corporation interests of the country, will add a new feather to the plume of their gallant knight, and endear him anew to the hearts of the money lords. I quote as follows from his speech of yesterday:

When President Cleveland delivered his message he had something to say to the American people about the danger of "trusts." I think there has since been no Democratic papers in the country, whether they understood the meaning of the word or not, that have not been constantly warning the people as to the horrible danger of "trusts." [Laughter.]

Laughter by his audience.

Well, I shall not discuss trusts this afternoon. I shall not venture to say that they were altogether advantageous or disadvantageous. They are largely private affairs, with which neither President Cleveland nor any private citizen has any particular right to interfere.

And then he goes on to argue that trusts are not the outgrowth of protection, and have no connection with high tariffs. Flattered by the receptions tendered him on his return from Europe he has no doubt concluded that his influence is great enough to enable him to still further contemn American rights and defy American interest by assuming the defense of trusts, the most odious combinations against both. The American people are to be congratulated that the claws of monopolistic oppression are thus allowed to protrude from beneath the soft furs by which they are usually concealed. Mr. Blaine's jubilation has once more overcome his discretion.

President Cleveland——

Mr. BLAIR. Is the Senator designing to leave his allusion to Mr. Blaine's speech right there?

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAIR. He must have read a very meager and garbled extract of the speech, because the Senator could hardly consider what he has given as a fair quotation of the report of that speech.

Mr. REAGAN. I give it as it appeared in the dispatches from Portland on yesterday, and I have no doubt Senators will undertake to apologize for it, and I think Mr. Blaine will apologize before two or three months longer.

Mr. BLAIR. There is no occasion to apologize for anything Mr. Blaine said on trusts. Without undertaking to defend them at all, he simply undertook to say that they were not the necessary outgrowth of protective tariffs, that they are found to a greater extent in free-trade England than they are in the United States. He undertook no apology and no defense of trusts as such.

Mr. REAGAN. I am not assuming that trusts may not be found in articles not taxed. I am simply now giving the position of Mr. Blaine on the President's proposition warning the people against the dangers of trusts, and in which he ridicules the idea of their danger and substantially defends their existence. That is all I have to say on the subject now.

Mr. BLAIR. The longer extracts from the speech of Mr. Blaine which I have seen are very much to the contrary of the Senator's statement of Mr. Blaine's position.

Mr. REAGAN. The Senator will not say to the contrary. There may be other things stated, and I understand from the extracts that he did go on to say that trusts were not entirely connected with protection.

I stated that, and that is all the Senator can say. He can not controvert what I have stated without controverting the text which comes over the wires.

Mr. BLAIR. What I controvert of the extracts of the speech which I have read is this, the statement of the Senator that Mr. Blaine there figures as an apologist or defender of trusts; quite the contrary. He did not so figure in the extracts from his speech which I saw.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not know what the Senator saw. I quoted what the President said and I quoted what Mr. Blaine said, and I leave them for every one to judge for himself.

President Cleveland has been very bitterly denounced by the beneficiaries of a high protective tariff on account of the recommendation in his last annual message of a revision of the tariff in such a way as to prevent the withdrawal of millions of dollars from the channels of trade and the accumulation of a dangerous surplus in the Treasury. While I have not agreed with some important features of the financial policy of his Administration he has shown himself to be a patriot and statesman, and a man of the grandest moral courage by his fearless adherence to the Constitution and to the principles of justice, at a time when political partisans pay but little regard to the Constitution and recklessly squander the public money as a means of securing political advantages, when he might have escaped their censure by countenancing their vices. He has set a noble example to the American people of unselfish and patriotic devotion to duty, and of manly courage and independence at a time when its costs much to exercise these great qualities. For this he deserves the lasting gratitude of the American people, and can not fail to be honored by posterity.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, I wish to just put in the RECORD in connection with this matter something from the speech of Mr. Blaine itself, if the Senator from Iowa will yield to me.

Mr. ALLISON. I want to get the record right before I begin, and I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. BLAIR. I will send to the desk and ask the Secretary to read from the New York Tribune of this morning, from the words "Mr. Chairman," the remarks of Mr. Blaine at Portland.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BERRY in the chair). The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN, LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: I should not have left my home the very day after my arrival, but for my desire to feel myself once more in touch with those with whom I have in previous years fought in many a good Republican contest [cheers], once more to compare notes with those upon whose wisdom the party has always relied—namely, the Republican masses—as to what should be done at this crisis in the political affairs of this country and in the history of the party which is its great defender.

When President Cleveland delivered his message he had something to say to the American people about the danger of "trusts." I think there has since been no Democratic papers in the country, whether they understood the meaning of the word or not, that have not been constantly warning the people as to the horrible danger of "trusts." [Laughter.] Well, I shall not discuss trusts this afternoon. I shall not venture to say that they were altogether advantageous or disadvantageous. They are largely private affairs, with which neither President Cleveland nor any private citizen has any particular right to interfere. Aside from that, the point which I wish to impress upon you is that "trusts" are not the outgrowth nor in any way the incident of the protective policy as the President charges; that a protective policy no more breeds what the President considers the pestilence of trusts than does the veriest free-trade country in the world, which is England, for England is literally plastered all over under her system of free trade with trusts. The very day before I sailed for home, just a fortnight ago, I cut from a London journal the announcement that all the manufacturers of coffins and all the undertakers of the United Kingdom have gone into a trust [laughter]; that it was to consist of two millions of capital, which in the language of the English financial market was to have a large number of "preferential bonds," and that the yearly death rate might be expected to yield a semi-annual dividend of 12 per cent. [Laughter.] Now, I think, my friends, that we might safely bury all the President's predictions of evils from trusts in this country in the graves in which these coffins are about to go, preferential bonds and all, and we might do this safely by showing that so far from the protective policy generating trusts, an utter free-trade policy generates them in far greater number [cheers], and thus I leave the question.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 1321) for the erection of a marine hospital at Evansville, Ind.;

A bill (H. R. 4659) for the relief of George M. Ochiltree; and

A bill (H. R. 10060) prescribing the times for sales and for notice of sales of property in the District of Columbia for overdue taxes.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The conference report is before the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. This report, I believe, was read yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report was not read yesterday.

Mr. ALLISON. It is in the RECORD of this morning. So, unless some Senator desires to inquire as to the changes in the bill made by the conference committee, I shall simply ask the Senate to take a vote upon the report.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, as one of the conferees on the part of the Senate on this bill I desire to say a word or two. I have with my colleagues signed the report, which, I take it, has already been read to the Senate, as I understand from the statement of the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary informs the Chair that the report was printed in the RECORD but was not read. It was ordered to be printed in the RECORD by unanimous consent yesterday evening, without being actually read.

Mr. GORMAN. So that it is printed I am satisfied.

I desire to say to the Senate that while signing that report, I do not concur in the conclusions that have been reached. I notice that in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 4, on page 7926, when this conference committee was appointed by the Chair, the following proceedings took place:

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

"IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, August 3, 1888.

"Resolved, That the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10234) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, and ask a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon."

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives. Has the House appointed conferees, may I ask?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They have not; at least no conferees are announced in the message on the part of the House of Representatives.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. When a motion has been made to adjourn until to-morrow at 11 o'clock and another motion has been made simply to adjourn, and the Chair has ascertained that no quorum voted on either of those propositions, and then there was a call of the Senate which disclosed that there was a quorum present, may I ask whether there is any motion in order or any other business in order except to take the vote on the motion to adjourn?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rules provide that messages from the House of Representatives may be received at any stage of business, except when the Journal is being read or when the Senate is dividing.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Is it in order when there is a motion to adjourn pending?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that——

Mr. PLATT. Are we not in open executive session now; and, if so, can we transact legislative business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate agree to the conference asked for by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and the President pro tempore announced the appointment of Mr. ALLISON, Mr. PLUMB, and Mr. GORMAN.

Mr. HAWLEY. I rise with some delicacy to make a suggestion. The matters in conference between the two Houses relate to the amendments providing for heavy ordnance, coast defenses, etc.——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection, the Senator from Connecticut will be allowed to proceed.

Mr. HAWLEY. The rule, I understand, is positive—the usage of the Senate certainly, and I believe, the rule—that two of the conferees shall be Senators friendly to the action of the Senate.

As I have said, it is a matter of delicacy with me to make the suggestion; but the usual committee on conference appointed in such cases consists of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations that has the subject-matter in charge. The Senators from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] and Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], two members of the subcommittee, are on record, by their speeches, as being very strongly opposed to the amendment in question. I call the matter to the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HOAR. Are there any other matters technically or formally involved?

Mr. HAWLEY. There are some other matters technically involved.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to be permitted to make one observation with reference to what the Senator from Connecticut has said.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Senator from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. HOAR. I was myself at one time, in regard to an amendment on one of the appropriation bills, in very much the same condition as the Senator from Connecticut now is. There was an amendment to an appropriation bill that I advocated with great earnestness and which the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] resisted with all his zeal and ability—and everybody knows that Senator's zeal and ability are very great, for he is thoroughly in earnest—and the Senate agreed by a very small majority to the amendment which I had moved.

The Senator from Kansas was put upon the conference committee. I then made to the Chair the same suggestion which the Senator from Connecticut has now made to the Senate. The President of the Senate at the time was the then Senator from Illinois, Mr. Davis, and the conclusion was come to that, as there were several other matters in issue, he could not pick out one rather than another, and say that that alone must be considered in making up the conference committee on the part of the Senate, and he pursued the usual rule to appoint members of the Committee on Appropriations. The result was that the Senator from Kansas held on to my amendment, going before the House conferees with the same tenacity with which he had fought it in the Senate. If I had been on the conference committee myself I should have lost it. As it was, it was saved.

Mr. ALLISON. May I say a word?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that, in theory, the managers of a conference on the part of the Senate are appointed by the Chair. In fact, they are designated by the friends of the measure; and, upon appropriation bills, have been uniformly the subcommittees of the Committee on Appropriations having in charge the particular bill. The Chair is ready to be instructed, or to take the sense of the Senate on the question.

Mr. ALLISON. May I say one word in reply to the Senator from Connecticut?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the Senator from Iowa may proceed.

Mr. ALLISON. The Chair has stated the usual custom respecting appropriation bills. I think I can say, in connection with what has been said by the Senator from Massachusetts, that it has been the uniform custom of the Appropriations Committee, without reference to their action in the Chamber, to stand by the views of the Senate relating to all items in appropriation bills. The theory, as I understand it, of these conference committees is that the members of the committee on the part of the Senate shall represent the Senate, and not the views of the persons comprising the committee.

Mr. HAWLEY. I withdraw my suggestion, Mr. President. I made no motion—only a suggestion, and I withdraw even that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The managers of the conference will stand as previously announced.

Now, Mr. President, but for that rule as stated by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I could not have served upon this conference. But having served upon it, I did to the utmost of my ability co-operate with my colleagues in carrying out the will of the Senate and signed the report; but here upon the floor as a Senator and no longer as a conferee, I desire to say that the action of the Senate originally and the result of the conference does not meet with my approval, nor can it receive my vote as a Senator.

I think the committee of conference have greatly improved the bill as it passed the Senate and as it went to the committee of conference, but one feature which I have objected to always, and do still object to, is the fact that the entire appropriation for the construction of ordnance is placed in the hands of Army officers and the work is to be constructed at a Government foundry, which is yet to be erected, without the slightest opportunity on the part of inventors or contractors or owners of large establishments to build, assemble, and complete the parts and come in competition with the ordnance officers with finished guns. To my mind it is entering upon a system which prohibits competition. We can have but one result, and which the experience of every other civilized country testifies to, and that is extravagance. I will not say corruption, and yet such has been the result where competition is excluded.

I know, Mr. President, that it is not proper to refer to actions or statements of committees, but I have a right to say that I think the proposition, objectionable as it is, has been greatly improved by the action of the conference committee. As the bill stood, this immense appropriation of about $7,000,000 or more would have been expended, the shops would have been erected, and the tools would have been purchased or manufactured under the direction and control of the ordnance officers who are now in charge of that branch of the public service and who have expended in the past twenty years in time of peace and frittered away thirty or forty million dollars with no adequate results.

If this proposed expenditure had been continued in their hands as the bill passed the Senate, it would have been, to my mind, simply so much money thrown away; but the committee of conference have amended the proposition, making reductions aggregating $2,154,500, and have added on my suggestion a provision that all of this expenditure under the amendment known as the Hawley amendment shall be made by a board of officers consisting of the commanding officer of the Army, General Schofield, an ordnance officer, to be designated by the Secretary of War, and an artillery officer, also to be designated by the Secretary of War.

That I consider a very great improvement. It gives the general in command of the Army a control over this matter, and the determining of the character of the guns and the improvements, that he ought to have, of course all under the general direction of the Secretary of War. It enables the Secretary of War to select the most skilled men in the Ordnance Corps. There are some very bright and efficient men in that corps, I suppose equal to officers of any army in the world, but they are not found at present in positions of control of the expenditures of public money. The other is to permit an artillery officer, who is to use these weapons, to participate in determining, not only as to the character of the weapon, but also as to the buildings to be erected.

The reductions made by the conference committee were:

Medical and hospital supplies	$5,000.00
Repairs on old Fort Barrancas, Florida	1,000.00
Manufacture, etc., cannon and carriages	100,000.00
Watervliet arsenal	50,000.00
Purchase of rough-finished steel, etc	1,500,000.00
Submarine mines, etc	500,000.00

So that the bill to my mind is infinitely better, more in the line of economy, and will insure better results because of the supervision of the expenditure by three of the distinguished officers that will be selected.

Notwithstanding that, sir, I again repeat that I think it is a great misfortune that, in connection with this expenditure, going with it and the appropriation to be made at the same time, we could not have opened the door to all the ingenious men of enterprise who are engaged in making steel and iron and put them in active competition with our Army officers.

There has been much said by gentlemen connected with the Ordnance Bureau, who have been so active in promoting this legislation so as to keep the entire expenditure in their hands, to exclude and make it impossible for any man in civil life to compete with them; and they have succeeded; Mr. President, they have succeeded because they have had the opportunity to come before the committees and to interview members of Congress and impress their views. Their inefficiency, their shortcomings, the extravagance in expenditures have all been covered up in their reports, so that Congress and the ordinary mind have not been able to ascertain nor to appreciate how bad—I will not say corrupt—but how bad and how exclusive this system has been.

I think that I shall before this matter closes offer a resolution for a special committee which, if granted, I believe from the information that has come to me and from their own published statements, will be able to show a chapter of incompetency and extravagance and exclusion of private enterprise that will be only rivaled by the recent investigations by the English Government into their great establishments. However, that comes later on.

Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] asks me what is meant by the provision of this bill as it stands, that all the steel, rough turned and rough bored, is to be contracted for? That is done in the ordinary way of advertising and giving to any firm in the United States that has the facilities to make it the opportunity to make a bid for furnishing the steel.

Mr. HAWLEY. I beg the Senator to direct his remarks to the Chair and speak a little louder. We can not hear him on this side.

Mr. GORMAN. But the completion of the gun, the finishing of it, making it ready for use under the provisions of this bill, is all to be done in the Government shop. The other proposition, the one I advocate, was while making this appropriation to offer to the public an opportunity to furnish to the Government completed guns ready for firing, so that you might have private enterprise that would furnish the Government complete from one to five hundred guns, or whatever number Congress make an appropriation for, so that you would have competition between your own officers, in the finishing and assembling, and outside parties.

Experience elsewhere has demonstrated that that work can be done 25 per cent. cheaper in private establishments. Now, the bill as it stands prohibits, and I think for a long time, the possibility of having that competition, and all this work will be confined to Army officers in the expensive way in which I have stated.

But not only that, it confines the Army officers to a certain class of guns. It requires the purchase of $3,500,000 of steel for the purpose of making built-up steel guns. There is no discretion in the board to take any other method; there is no discretion to take any other metal, but to go on with the plan which has been adopted by the English and French Governments, but which is believed by many experts to be obsolete, and that a new theory will come in.

What I desired was a large appropriation running over a number of years, to be controlled by an intelligent board going on with the built-up steel gun, which is the gun of to-day, giving an opportunity for cast-steel guns and guns of any other metal that may be found within the next three or four or five years to be better than built-up steel guns.

We have an illustration of it in our own Government. The Secretary of the Navy has established a shop at the Washington navy-yard where they are building some of these 6 and 8 and 10 inch built-up guns as good, I suppose, as are found in any place in the world, at an expense which is very great and which we all recognize must go on, for we must educate our mechanics as well as our officers; but the Secretary of the Navy has the power under the act of a year ago to go outside and to contract with individual firms for the construction and making complete guns. Under that general authority he has contracted with the South Boston Works and I think with an establishment near West Point, to build four or five or six or eight guns for the Chicago and other vessels which are soon to be had.

There you have the competition. Private enterprise furnishes the steel and these private firms complete the guns in competition with the naval officers in Washington. The result, I am told by those who have charge of it, is marked. From the moment the contract was made there has been spirit and energy shown and the desire manifested by our officers to make their work complete and equal to or better if possible than the South Boston Works.

But they have done more than that in the Navy. They have recognized the fact that the built-up steel gun is not the best in all probability to be had, and a contract was made with a Pittsburgh firm for a cast-steel—a cast of cast-steel, a solid piece, so that it may be bored out. The first cast of that gun, I am informed, was defective, and while they are going on with its completion they have not completed it. The enterprising men of the Pittsburgh works, not satisfied with the one experiment, have made another cast for a smaller gun which the experts say will be sufficient. If it is successful, it will probably supplant the built-up steel gun probably at a cost one-third less to the Government.

Mr. President, under the provision of this bill we are bound by an iron-clad rule to the one line of built-up steel guns. No matter what improvements may be made, we will go on with the gun of to-day, and while I again say the committee of conference have greatly improved the bill by having the intelligence and the knowledge of three distinguished men, instead of keeping it in the same old rut, still that board is bound down to the construction of guns whose best day has passed in the opinion of many of the best men of the country.

Mr. BECK. Why is not the Chief of Engineers put upon the board?

Mr. GORMAN. The Chief of Engineers is not on the board, I will say to the Senator frankly, because of the duties imposed upon him in the great appropriation of $22,000,000 for rivers and harbors and the other duties assigned to him, the building this great work here, this great building for the Library, so that it is almost a physical impossibility for him to take charge of any part of this work. Besides that, it was thought that an artillery officer, the man who fires the gun and who is to use it if it ever goes into action, would be a better man for the manufacture of the gun. So I think the board as constituted or agreed to by the committee of conference is probably the best board that could be constructed within the Army.

But that is not all. If provision had been made in this bill for a larger appropriation, covering a great many years, so that the outside people whom I have described might have an opportunity to compete with Army officers, I think the measure would be practically perfect.

As to the built-up guns made of steel, the Senator from Kentucky asks in his seat how many guns we shall make under the provisions of this bill. Three millions and a half of dollars is appropriated for steel and seven hundred and fifty thousand for foundries and works. I should say, judging from the experience we have had, that we possibly may get twenty-five or thirty guns in the next three years; but you will have contracted for the steel; and I desire to say to the Senator from Kentucky that in entering upon this scheme the appropriation for steel in large quantities becomes a necessity, for the reason that you have now only two plants in the United States capable of making steel, and I think neither of them has the capacity to make a 12-inch gun. If the contract for the amount of steel is not sufficiently large, nobody else will put up a plant, and the Government will be at the mercy of one or two men.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I ask a question for information?

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not know that there is any concern in the country that can make a 12-inch gun.

Mr. GORMAN. I have so stated.

Mr. HAWLEY. There have been one or two 8-inch guns made in the United States, and others, except as finished off at navy-yards, have been purchased at foreign shops.

Mr. GORMAN. I think more than one of 8 inches; but they are making one of 10 inches now, as I understand. But still they have not the facilities, as the Senator from Connecticut says, to make the 12-inch guns now. I mean, of course, that nobody in the United States has the plant for doing it.

Now, Mr. President, confined as we are, or will be, if this bill becomes a law as it comes from the committee of conference, to the built-up steel guns, to absolutely exclude the experiments in cast-steel, to absolutely exclude the purchase of any cast guns either as mortars, steel bound or otherwise, or the trial of cast guns with improved metal which is being made now—that, I think, is a great misfortune. It is unbusinesslike. No man and no firm in the United States would conduct his or their business affairs in the mode prescribed by this iron rule of this bill without bankruptcy, and the Government of the United by doing so and proceeding upon this line in other matters is practically wiping out the surplus.

Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky asks me how many finished guns have been made for the Navy by private parties—guns that were complete. My recollection is—I may not be accurate about it—that the South Boston Works have practically completed four 4-inch guns for one of the cruisers.

Mr. HAWLEY. Steel guns.

Mr. GORMAN. Built-up steel guns, in competition with what you are doing at the navy-yard.

Mr. CHANDLER. But in no case from steel produced by themselves.

Mr. GORMAN. No, it was from the steel which was produced from the Bethlehem Works, under the general contract for steel made by the Secretary of the Navy, but they took the steel rough-turned and rough-bored, precisely as it comes to the Washington navy-yard, and completed the guns and had them ready to fire. That is a business proposition; that is the way to do it; and the Secretary of the Navy has had the courage, without the explicit provision of the law directing him to do it, to go outside and get those splendid mechanics at Boston to do that work; and I think it would be unwise in Congress to permit such establishments to close. You have nearly bankrupted that concern now.

It was the great works of this country that during the war poured out their millions to make the guns that were used during the rebellion, and there is no firm in the country that has been so treated and driven almost into bankruptcy as this has been by this Ordnance Corps, and now they will be pursued by these ordnance officers as long as the present men remain there, simply because Mr. Hunt—whom I never saw and knew nothing about until I came to investigate it with my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] on the committee and General Logan, and I think that gentleman had more genius, had more courage, had more loyalty than any man I have ever met in supporting his Government—he has been nearly bankrupted by the system that you are now going on and fastening upon this Government simply because he and his mechanics under him had more genius than the ordnance officers.

Mr. CHANDLER. Now, the Senator will allow me to ask him where he finds in this amendment of the Senate that is now to be agreed to by the House anything to prevent the Secretary of War from taking this three and a half million dollars' worth of gun steel, which is to be provided, and making contracts either with the owners of the West Point foundry or of the South Boston gun foundry for the manufacture of guns from that steel?

Mr. GORMAN. I suppose the Secretary of War is a sane man, a prudent man, and would try to carry out the provisions of any act Congress might pass.

Mr. CHANDLER. Can not the Senator trust his own Secretary of War?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes, I can trust the Secretary of War, but I think, so far as I am concerned, I would bind the Secretary of War of the party of which I am a member as tight and as close as if he were the Secretary of War representing the Republican party. I say that to leave this discretion to him and to rely upon his judgment alone, surrounded, as he is, by these Army officers, is wrong. It is wrong in principle; it is not right as a business proposition, and if you were in power I would stand here and fight it until the end of the session.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. If I understand now the criticism of the Senator from Maryland, it is that by this bill under the conference report we commit this Government and bind the Secretary of War to build up these guns at a particular price, and that we, by this report, exclude the idea that private parties are to take the rough borings and build them up as steel guns. Do I understand the Senator from Maryland to state that to be the import and purport of this bill?

Mr. GORMAN. Unquestionably.

Mr. ALLISON. So far from that being true, that suggestion was not even made in the conference committee by anybody, not even by the Senator himself, and, so far as I am concerned, it never entered my mind that this was to be the exclusive work of the Government. I read this bill, and I saw that the first delivery of steel was to be eighteen months from this time. The first opportunity that we shall have to take hold of these rough forgings will be eighteen months from this time. So I understood in my own mind, and I supposed it was the judgment of the committee, that two or three sessions of Congress yet to come would settle the question as to whether these rough borings should be completed by contract in private establishments or whether they should be done at the Watervliet arsenal, if it should be made ready.

Why, Mr. President, so far from the Senator from Maryland stating what is true, I draw an absolutely different conclusion from the language and the spirit of this conference report. I stand with him not in favor of the absolute exclusion of private enterprise with reference to building up these guns. I know the Secretary of the Navy under similar provisions has given private contracts to build guns. Now, to say that by our conference report we exclude these people is a thing that never entered my mind as a member of this conference committee.

Mr. BECK. One moment. The reason I asked the questions I did was on the line of difference between the two conferences. I, of course, was not a member of the committee of conference, but I thought we were trying to get the steel and leave it open hereafter to the best contracts that could be made with private parties as well as our own establishments. If that is a mistake, we made a mistake.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator will allow me one moment longer. I do not want, as a member of this conference committee, to be put in an attitude of excluding the idea that men who are fit to build up these guns shall have an opportunity of doing it, and I want to say that idea never entered my head, and, so far as I remember, that idea never was suggested in the conference committee and never was suggested in the Committee on Appropriations, to my knowledge. I will go hand in hand with the Senator from Maryland when we have the opportunity of getting hold of this steel, the first delivery being made eighteen months from now, and we will then see what shall be done in the way of building up these guns. No other idea ever entered my head as respects what should be done with these rough borings when we have them.

Mr. GORMAN. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has made a very broad statement. We all know how fair a man he is; but when he says that this is the first time that he has heard the proposition advanced, he is certainly mistaken. I never said that this proposition was not considered by the Committee on Appropriations, but that it was offered in the Senate. I say it was not considered in detail. His memory fails him or he has not paid attention to anything I have said on this floor and elsewhere in committee and at all times, and I am sorry I have not had the attention of my friend from Iowa, who I know wants to be entirely accurate. I do not want to repeat my speech of a few weeks ago; it is too warm to-day to do so.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator will permit me a moment?

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. It is true during a portion of the remarks of the Senator from Maryland a few weeks ago I was elsewhere occupied and had not the pleasure of hearing all he said; but as I understand the controversy in the conference committee it was that we ought to buy guns and not buy forgings; in other words, that we ought to encourage the establishment of not only the forgings to be executed by private parties, but also that the gun should be executed by private parties to the exclusion of the Government. The response made to that, in my mind and in the mind of the conference, was that in order to place the Government independent of these private parties it was also necessary that we should have a gun foundry of our own.

Mr. HAWLEY. A finishing shop; no forging.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand perfectly well that it did not mean forging, that we were to have a gun foundry which would take these forgings and build them up, and so far as I expressed an opinion I expressed it in favor of the Government having its foundry and of encouraging also private parties in that direction, knowing perfectly well that at the South Boston Works there was such a foundry to which they might, if it were properly encouraged, be transferred, and also another on the Hudson. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator any longer except to put myself right as respects this matter.

Mr. GORMAN. I think the Senator from Iowa will recognize that he has done me great injustice in taking an advantage of me which he ought not to do and does not intend to do, and I will explain what I mean. There was not, so far as I know, anything except fair and proper discussion of the matters involved in the amendments before the committee of conference. What I said upon the floor a few weeks ago he knows from the RECORD. I was on that committee of conference and bound by the rule which you laid down yourself, and which is the rule of the Senate, to stand by the Senate amendments, and I did not feel at liberty to advance the views that I give utterance to upon the floor now as a Senator, and that I did before this bill went to the conference committee. Therefore he does me injustice. He has no right to take advantage of my silence in the conference, because he knew I was so bound as representing the will of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will allow me there, I do not and I did not criticise the Senator from Maryland as respects his attitude either in conference or on this floor. I only wished to explain that so far as I was concerned as a member of this conference, I never entertained for a moment the idea which he now places on these amendments, but I understood all the time that was a question to be postponed to the future, to build up these guns.

Mr. GORMAN. There is no better business man in Congress than the Senator from Iowa. He has had great experience in matters of appropriations, and I say for him, as I have seen a great deal of him, for I think I am one of the oldest around the Capitol, I mean in point of time—that I know of no man in my whole experience who is more careful than he is. But this is one of those questions that has not come under his observation and close scrutiny as most matters do. It was referred to others, and to General Logan among them when he was a member of the committee, my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] and my friend from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] and myself for four or five years. There never has been a shade of difference between any member of the committee who has examined it as to the effect of this exclusion of all private enterprise. There is no man in either branch of Congress on the Appropriation Committee who has looked at it for six years past who has not come to that conclusion. As I said on a former occasion, I came to it reluctantly. I did not believe it as it was first presented to me, but I was forced to the conclusion. I had no interest in and no knowledge of the men of Massachusetts or of the men on the Hudson who had stood by the Government and who had been nearly bankrupted by this system; but when I saw that such was the fact, and what injustice had been done them and an attempt made to perpetuate and keep forever that injustice in vogue, there was but one thing before me to do, and that was to take the stand and denounce these Government officers as I have done.

As to the proposition of how it will exclude them, you have appropriated in this bill, if it shall become a law as reported from this committee, $700,000 for the shops at Watervliet. They first came here and said they would give them $200,000. For that they could go on and make up a great establishment there, which would turn out one or two guns a month, and as they approached the time when they found Congress was in the humor to put the whole matter in their hands you made it $700,000. You have given them over a million dollars to experiment with in buildings and tools and torpedoes and what not. Now, to say that it is not meant so and will not be carried out so, that when you contract for this steel, when you have appropriated three and a half millions and when you let these great establishments that you are building up at a cost of one and a half million dollars—that you will not use it to make the guns, but you intend by this bill private firms can complete the guns, that would be worse than anything else that has gone before, bad as it has been.

Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire wanted to know if I would trust the Secretary of War. I have a great respect for Secretary Endicott as a man of sterling integrity and unquestioned honesty, and learned in the law. He is the peer of any man who ever presided over the War Department, but I would not trust any man in that position to determine the question of the advisability of having private factories compete with the Government shops. That is a question Congress should settle. You must use the $3,500,000 worth of steel in your shops, or you are making an extravagant blunder in that immense appropriation for the plant and for the tools. It will be so used, Mr. President, and the Senator from Connecticut knows it.

I want to say to my friend, the chairman of this committee, without any opportunity to look at all the details, that I offered an amendment to this bill when it was under consideration, so as to make it the duty of the Secretary of War to give private parties an opportunity to compete with the Government. I stated at the time that I was not responsible for all the provisions in that amendment.

I offered it so that it might be gotten into print and my friend from Iowa and the balance of the committee and the rest of us might have the benefit of it. It was met here in such a way, there was such opposition, that there was not a friend, there was not a man on either side, so far as I know, that considered the matter of sufficient importance to delay the appropriation bill for a moment, and put the amendment in proper shape, so that there might be no question about it.

But here we are under these iron-clad provisions confined to built-up steel guns.

Mr. President, I will read one or two extracts from a statement made by a manufacturer of large experience. He says that—

Built-up guns are of many types; in general they have a steel (or iron) tube, onto which heavy hoops, sometimes to the number of twenty, are shrunk or pressed. Nearly all the great modern guns are of this sort. They were invented before the modern methods had been perfected for obtaining strong cast steel in quantities large enough for a gun of large size. Of course they require a very expensive plant for their manufacture; one of Armstrong's steam-hammers costs half a million dollars, and one of Krupp's nearly a million. Until very recently no manufacturer in this country could make all the necessary forgings, except for very small guns, and the Government was compelled to buy some parts abroad, and then wait a long time for them.

Whatever may be the future of such guns in this country, they are still in the experimental stage. Even the Chief of Ordnance, in his latest published report, says: "The requisite machinery for the production of even the smaller forgings will be, to a considerable extent, experimental with our manufacturers, and must be gradually developed" (1886, page 19). Further, such guns are very expensive to build, requiring a very long time and the most accurate work in the fitting together of the many parts, yet their life is entirely uncertain; experienced foreign makers will not guaranty their guns for more than a hundred rounds.

With reference to their great cost, Mr. William Metcalf, the well-known steel manufacturer of Pittsburgh, in a paper read before the American Society of Civil Engineers last March, gives some information. He quotes as the cost of guns with steel tubes, hooped with steel, from 65 to 78 cents per pound, while Rodman cast-iron guns cost only from 10 to 13 cents. He estimates that 40 cents a pound is not a high price for gun parts as the steel-maker would deliver them, and 40 cents more for finishing and assembling them. A bill, which failed at the last session of Congress, appropriated at the rate of about $1.25 per pound (without the carriage), and if the first guns were satisfactory others might be ordered at not more than 65 cents per pound.

To quote Mr. Metcalf again: "Splendid steel castings, up to 30 or 40 tons weight, can be bought now for less than 6 cents a pound. I believe the built-up gun to be unscientific and unmechanical. It has cost Europe probably a hundred millions of dollars to produce an uncertain gun of greater power, and we may hope that it will cost her another hundred million to produce something to equal America's guns of the future."

The opposition to the built-up guns comes from so many sources that, beyond question, the country will demand a thorough trial of the cast-steel guns before it authorizes any large portion of the expenditures that must be made in the next few years for our coast defenses, for, as the figures given above show, these are much cheaper than built-up guns. They can be procured very much sooner, and in all probability will not be inferior in power. That there is an open field is evident from the fact that only two bidders responded to the recent advertisement of the Secretary of the Navy for small cast-steel guns, and both obtained a contract.

I find in the Scientific American of April 2 an article which I will have inserted in my remarks, headed "The new guns for the Navy," in which it is there stated that the best built-up steel guns of Europe, the Krupp and the Armstrong, are to-day recognized as practical failures; that is to say, that they do not come up to the requirements of the times, and that there are other improvements of cast-steel and improvements in metal and in the use of cast-iron that have been made which would make it a half cheaper and much better.

The article from the Scientific American is as follows:

THE NEW GUNS FOR THE NAVY.

By the acts of Congress approved August 3, 1886, and March 3, 1887, the sum of $3,120,362 is available for armament of the new vessels of the United States Navy—the monitors, cruisers, and others. The acquisition of the largest and most powerful guns made is contemplated in the granting of these appropriations. The question arises, therefore, what type of gun should be chosen? If we look abroad for a model, the heavy artillery of England, Germany, or France at once are suggested. The works of Armstrong and of Krupp, and the French establishments at Ruelle, St. Chemond, and Le Creusot, present themselves as the great gun factories of the world. Their names seem to guaranty the quality of their product. Basing their qualifications largely on the material used by these producers, the authorities of this country have called for steel of certain definite strength and ductility. The tendency is inevitably to be guided by European practice.

But criticism of this method of dealing with the question is not wanting. Facts that seem undeniable are cited which go to prove that the construction of large guns is not yet perfected. If this is true it would suggest a field for independent work by the ordnance authorities of this country. We hardly seem justified in following blindly the lead of foreign constructors. The successful gun of the future may yet be an American production.

Many of Krupp's guns are known to have failed in war use. In the British House of Lords on April 30, 1876, the following statement was made by the Duke of Cambridge, commander-in-chief of the British army: "Out of seventy heavy guns employed against the southwest of Paris (by the Germans), thirty-six were disabled during the first fortnight of the bombardment by the effect of their own fire." It is said that during the Franco-Prussian war two hundred Krupp guns burst, and that the German commanders thought that a week's further resistance by the French would have silenced the batteries bombarding Paris, as the attacking guns would have become disabled by their own discharges. The Italian Government has rejected two of Krupp's 100-ton guns, after trying them at Spezia.

From France similar accounts are received of the behavior of their ordnance under more recent trials. On June 4, 1884, a 24-centimeter (9.45 inches) steel gun burst at Havre on the fifth round. The breech was driven backward into an earthwork at the rear, while a portion weighing several tons was driven forward and fell into the water. Other French guns cracked near the muzzle, and had to be reduced in length. It is reported, also, that during the past year several steel guns have failed, and produced disastrous accidents in their explosions.

In England failures have been numerous. A million of pounds sterling is annually spent upon artillery. Yet Engineering, one of the leading English technical journals, speaking of the English artillery, says: "After all this, our guns are inferior to those of other nations, and are nearly as dangerous to those who fire them as to the enemy." In 1886 the English were making five 110-ton guns, eighteen 66-ton guns, and six 43-ton guns, in the words of Engineering, "all on the same plan as the gun which recently failed on the Collingwood with little more than half its proper charge of powder."

In last March, in the House of Commons, the following facts were cited: To one ship orders had been sent that her guns should only be fired under reduced charges; on another ship, out of nine guns, eight were unserviceable; an 80-ton gun had been sent home from Gibraltar to be repaired; a 9-inch 18-ton gun burst at Woolwich in testing powder; one hundred and thirty-five guns were made on one plan, and seven of these burst, requiring a lower rating of charge and reduced initial velocity for the remainder. In a letter to the London Times last year Capt. Robert H. Armit referred to the disabling of all of the 38-ton guns on the Ajax, and ended his letter by stating that "there does not exist a sound gun in the service." This was only one of his letters. So far had he gone in his condemnation that an injunction was applied for by the makers of the guns to restrain him, which relief was refused by the court, his criticisms being held to be "privileged communications."

These are some of the lessons furnished by foreign practice. They all possess one peculiarity: they teach us how "not to do it." But we can not say that a successful and final type of heavy gun has yet been developed. The built-up guns are subjected to strains, molecular and mechanical, that tend to their ultimate disorganization. The powder heats the metal from the interior, expanding the tube and inner rings the most. These expand, not only radially, but longitudinally. On cooling, great resistance is offered to contraction by friction, so that a permanent injury is caused in many cases. The continual expansion and shrinkage have an inevitable tendency to disorganize the whole piece.

The theory of the strength of a gun teaches that the metal nearest the bore does the most work in resisting the effect of the discharge. The useful effect of the metal, according to Professor Barlow, varies inversely with the square of its distance from the longitudinal axis of the piece. Thus, the outer layers do comparatively little, and should be, if anything, the softer and more expansible metal. To be of any effect, these layers should be in intimate contact with the inner. This statement would indicate a source of weakness in re-enforced guns. A ring shrunk on may be in such a state of tension as to be ready to part, yet its connection with the tube or ring below it is not as intimate as if it were a part of the same metal.

As remedies for these evils different cures have been suggested. Soft steel of low tensile strength is advocated by one engineer. Such steel is incapable of taking a temper, and is really wrought-iron. It is naturally free from many of the defects of the higher steels. The latter crack more readily, and have not the lead-like toughness of the milder metal. The lower tenacity called for seems a defect, but it is used as the index of the quality. A tough, weldable metal is inevitably of lower tenacity, and in defining this the other qualities go with it. A more radical remedy is proposed by a second engineer. He advocates the abandonment of all steel and the adoption of cast iron. This sounds like a step backward. Yet he fortifies his position with so many instances of what cast-iron guns have done that it is hard to resist the conclusion that they are at least worthy of a more extended trial. Their rifling may need special study, as the wearing of the bands has been one of their weak points. Other details may have to be worked up. But when it is considered that an integral piece is obtained at a minimum cost the subject seems worthy of trial.

Some aluminum compounds could well be experimented with. The mitis castings might afford a good basis for work. Enough has been shown to indicate a good field for inventive genius, to which we hope our Government will afford every encouragement. All we wish to suggest is that the field is still open for exploration; that, according to all accounts, the perfect gun has not yet been produced.

I also extract from the Scientific American the following:

FAILURE OF BUILT-UP GUNS.

[Scientific American, April 7, 1888.]

No less than ten of the large 9.2 guns made for the British Government have recently failed at test, the inner tubes of nine having been split and the outer casing of the other fractured. This, we believe, is the style of gun that has of late been so urgently advocated by certain of our Army and naval officers as necessary for adoption in this country, to the exclusion of all other kinds of ordnance. In the opinion of these wise men all people who hinted at anything else were behind the age.

ALUMINUM STEEL.

[Scientific American, August 20, 1887.]

The Iron Trade Review, of Cleveland, says: "Some important and very satisfactory experiments have been made at the Cleveland Rolling Mill Company's works during the last two weeks in treating Siemens-Martin steel with small percentages of aluminum manufactured by the Cowles Electric Smelting and Aluminum Company of this city. The result of the work proved conclusively that a small quantity of aluminum freed the steel from blow-holes and increased the tensile strength somewhat without increasing the elongation, besides adding very materially to the fluidity of the bath, thereby producing much sharper castings. It has not yet been determined how small percentages of aluminum are necessary to secure the required products, but from one-tenth to one-twentieth of 1 per cent. gave satisfactory results. The castings made showed a tensile strength as high as 140,000 pounds to the square inch. The alloy was applied in the form of broken ferro-aluminum."

BURSTING OF A GREAT GUN.

[Scientific American, March 10, 1888.]

An Armstrong breech-loading gun recently burst at the Royal arsenal. The officials represent the occurrence as merely one of a small percentage of failures which are always expected in the course of the proof trials; but the great size of the weapon, which was a 10-inch gun of about 38 tons weight, gives prominence to the accident, and the fact of several rounds having been fired before the burst took place points to some cause beyond a mere flaw in the material, which the first test ought to have revealed. The chase or barrel of the gun was blown clean out of the chamber end, and fell in one piece to the ground.

I believe it is the wise thing for us to do to make this appropriation so that we may have the Army at work; so that we may have every private establishment in the country that is willing to compete for the plant competing with our Army, and then a provision broad enough so that any improvements that may come along hereafter may be utilized by the Government.

Mr. President, I do not care to detain the Senate; it is too warm a day. I say, from the evidences all around, everywhere, not only here but elsewhere, the power is great, as we all know, of these men who have life tenures, who are at the head of the Ordnance Department. They have sufficient power to mold Congress in the way that they desired.

While I have no hesitation in voting, with the restrictions that I have indicated, $40,000,000 for the defense of this country, to be spread over the next ten years, giving all of our people an opportunity to experiment and to give us the benefit of their skill and genius, but, Mr. President, the Senate has determined otherwise.

It is to be confined to the War Department, to the officers of the Army, and there is nothing left, so far as I am concerned, but to enter my protest and to say that at some time later on, and before greater amounts are appropriated to be squandered, I hope the Senate will grant me a special committee that I may bring the facts before them as I have seen them only in part, and which I have indicated, for I believe the mismanagement of that branch of the service will astonish the country.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I wish to say a word or two in response to the observations of the Senator from Maryland as respects these amendments.

The statement of the Senator is true in respect to the amendments provided for in sections 3, 4, 6, and 7 of this bill. They did not originate in the Committee on Appropriations. One of the amendments somewhat involved in the question of gun experimentation was put on by the Committee on Appropriations, but the amendments generally were put in after a pretty full debate by the Senate, and I think with reasonable unanimity.

When the conference committee of the Senate met our brethren from the House we dealt with these amendments as we found them, and we made concessions, and very large concessions, to the House committee. In the first place we modified somewhat section 3, the section providing for the erection, etc., of a gun foundry at Watervliet, and we reduced the appropriation which was made by the Senate amendment, of $750,000, to $700,000.

Section 4 as it passed the Senate provided for an expenditure of $5,000,000 for gun steel. The committee on the part of the House insisted that that should be reduced one-half, but on comparison of views it was thought that if we reduced that sum one-half it would not hold out sufficient inducements to existing steel manufacturers in our country to secure and provide the necessary plant to enable them to make the kind of steel involved in this section. Thereupon the House committee yielded finally so as to allow the sum to be three and a half million dollars, that being regarded as a sufficient sum to induce steel manufacturers in our country to compete for the manufacture of this steel and build a plant for the purpose if necessary, because unless we appropriated a sufficient sum for this purpose it was perfectly evident that the single steel manufactory in this country which could now or which can very soon put itself in position to bid for this work would bid for it exclusively and at its own price. So, then, the amount involved in this bill now for the purchase of steel is three and a half million dollars.

Section 5 is a section which simply relates to the method whereby the advertisements, etc., shall be made, and also provides that the bidders, whoever they may be, shall agree to erect a suitable plant, if they have not already a suitable plant erected, including the best modern appliances, etc., capable of making all the steel required by this provision.

Then the amendment provides—

That the time of the delivery of the steel for the smaller caliber of heavy guns to commence at the expiration of not more than eighteen months, and that for the larger caliber specified in the advertisement at the expiration of not more than three years from the date of the acceptance of the contract.

I admit that the Senator from Maryland made a very proper criticism of myself as respects detailed knowledge of this subject passing through several years. The details of these bills have from time to time in the Committee on Appropriations been committed to my friend on my left [Mr. DAWES], and during the lifetime of General Logan to him as chairman of the Subcommittee on Fortifications. But I think I would not do myself justice if I did not say that during all these debates and during all these investigations going on in my committee-room, most of the time I was awake, and although I did not hear all the arguments, nor was I present at all the conclusions, yet I believe I did acquire some general knowledge of the situation and of the hopes and expectations of inventors, of contractors, gun-makers, and steel makers. I learned enough, in the way we usually acquire knowledge in this Chamber and out of it, to know that there were a great many disappointed inventors who were not able to secure that recognition which they believed their inventions deserved at the hands of the Ordnance Department of the Government.

I also was able to acquire knowledge that a great many patriotic men during the years between 1861 and 1865 did assemble plants suitable to the ordnance of that day, and that with the return of peace and with the improvement in inventions these old and antiquated plants became somewhat out of date and useless and worthless. With that peace also came a general disposition on the part of the Government and Congress not to embark in large expenditures for fortifications and for heavy guns. I have sympathized with these men who in time of war found themselves enjoying large profits, and who when peace came found their occupation substantially gone. I have also sympathized with that public sentiment which has been growing up of late years in our country looking to a more effective modern navy employing and using more effective enginery of war than was used some eight or ten years ago. I have also sympathized with that public sentiment which looks to the reasonable defense of our seacoasts and particularly our great cities.

But I confess that I have never reached high-water mark upon any of these propositions. I have never felt that it was necessary for this Government to enter upon a scale of expenditure that would look to the disbursement of a hundred or a hundred and fifty millions of dollars for coast defense. I am willing and believe that is the public judgment and public sense of this country, that we shall go on in a way rapid enough and yet not sufficiently rapid to build guns and fortifications that will be useless in the future.

Having these views in my mind, I fell in very heartily and readily with the amendment suggested by the Committee on Military Affairs which looked to progressing slowly in this matter. I had an opportunity of listening to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland when this bill was under debate.

I gathered its meaning as I could, but it had been my privilege to see that amendment before it was offered in this Chamber, and I saw in it a proposition to embark in a great field of operations, which I for one was not ready then, upon this bill at least, to embark in. I saw a proposition which has great merit, I have no doubt, and which has been promoted in various ways about this Chamber and the other, that looked to the committal of this Government not only to the building of guns of steel and of cast-iron, but of the two mixed, if you please, committing this Government, not for this year or next year, as this little appropriation comparatively does, but committing this Government to a scale of expenditure far beyond anything that I think we ought to adopt this year or next, a scale of expenditure that does not exhaust itself until 1902, and making appropriations of public money binding this Government, not for this year or for next year, but binding this Government until the next century shall roll in, to an expenditure for guns of a particular kind and of a particular method.

Mr. GORMAN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. GORMAN. As I said a moment ago, I am not committed to all the details of that amendment, which I was not entirely familiar with; but it was offered so as to get it before the Senate in print. The Senator does not state it accurately. The provisions of that amendment, taking it as it was, covered only $38,000,000 to run to 1902, and the appropriation per annum for the present fiscal year was not half the amount included in the bill now under consideration. It was spread over a number of years, and that is the only way in which you can get private enterprise to embark in it so as to give them a contract to enable them to put up a plant.

Mr. ALLISON. I was coming to that branch. That amendment did commit this Government by appropriations to an expenditure, the Senator says, of $38,090,000. I supposed there was about $40,000,000 in it. The Senator from Connecticut tells me he added it up and it amounted to $40,000,000. I submit that it is not wise for us at this time to enter upon any such scheme of public expenditure, at least until every committee that has proper jurisdiction of that question in this body shall have investigated it with care. If it came here with the imprimatur of the Committee on Military Affairs, after full and fair deliberation and discussion, and they should show us that it is necessary now to enter upon a scale of expenditure amounting to $40,000,000, to be followed with $40,000,000 more, I might be willing to enter upon its consideration.

The Senator from Maryland says that the object of this provision was to encourage men to invest large sums of money in a plant necessary to build these guns. I am not speaking now of the Senator's amendment, because I am not certain that it contained this provision, but the amendment which was shown to me as an amendment proper for the emergency and exigency at this time, involved a proposition to build 20-inch guns. I may be mistaken, but I do not know that there is a 20-inch gun now in existence in the world, certainly not so far as I have heard. I say that that was and is a scheme of Utopia. So far from this amendment or its promoters looking to the exhaustion of the Treasury, the motive in my mind upon this subject was to keep the appropriations within reasonable bounds until we could have absolute knowledge of the best method of expending them.

I take it that from our general knowledge of ordnance, which so far as I am concerned is very general indeed, guns will be made of metal; that we shall not make them of wood any longer; and there are not many metals of which they are likely to be made. Certainly one of those metals will be steel. I hope and believe that as the years roll on our inventors and machinists will be able to make steel stronger and better by the infusion of other material, as has been suggested by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] two or three times on this floor as to the value of aluminum with steel. Believing that steel would not be likely to be discarded absolutely in the next ten years as gun metal, I was willing to go as far as these amendments go in providing steel, because if we should find a better metal in the near future we could undoubtedly find places to put the guns constructed of that metal.

Mr. GORMAN. You have excluded them.

Mr. ALLISON. We have not excluded anything. The Senator from Maryland seems to think because we have not embodied and embraced everything here that thereby we have excluded things. We have not provided here for guns of cast-iron.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether the appropriation of three and a half million dollars to buy steel ingots to make guns from 3 inches up to 12 inches is not in effect a provision that not one dollar of the appropriation can be used for anything else except steel?

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. GORMAN. Then you have excluded every other metal.

Mr. ALLISON. But we do not exclude the idea that steel is not the only thing.

Mr. GORMAN. Not the idea, but the metal.

Mr. ALLISON. We simply provide for steel metal, that is all. We do not even provide a gun in this amendment. Of course if this metal is not to be used for guns it would probably be sold. The implication is that this three and a half million dollars' worth of steel is to be used for guns, of course, but that is as far as we have gone.

What else have we done in this report? We have provided that the Government itself shall put money into its own arsenal at Watervliet, containing, I believe, one hundred acres of ground with a plant there now of a million dollars in value. We have proposed to add to that plant a sufficient amount of machinery to enable the Government itself to take one of these steel forgings, or half a dozen of them, if necessary, and work them up into a gun. We have not said anywhere in the bill that when this machinery is provided one single pound or ton of the forging shall be worked up there.

I do not believe there is a Senator on this floor who will say that it is not a wise thing for the Army to have a gun foundry. The Navy has one at the capital, here at Washington. Was there any fuss made about that when it was provided for? Have we not built up this gun foundry for the Navy at the Washington navy-yard by such gradual and delicate steps, if I may use that term, as to scarcely call the attention even of Congress to it? There is a very adroit Secretary of the Navy, as we know, and we have put into our naval appropriation bills from time to time appropriations which have enabled him to assemble here at the capital machinery which will put up or put together 8 and 10 inch guns, if I am not mistaken. I know certainly they have many 8-inch guns, and I believe they have one or two 10-inch guns.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes, they are finishing 10-inch guns there now.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; they are finishing 10-inch guns there now. That is what has been done for the Navy. So when I found in this bill a proposition to provide the Army at one of its own existing arsenals with machinery which would enable the mechanics there to swing in by means of cranes and other appliances these forgings and put their tools upon them so as to assemble them into a gun, if that was thought to be a wise thing hereafter, we should have the machinery there to do it.

The Senator from Maryland says that the enormous sum of $700,000 is proposed to be appropriated for this purpose. I do not know but that it may be twice as much as is necessary, but we have guarded the amendments. The Senator will remember how our friends from the House insisted that we should put in "or so much thereof as may be necessary." I had myself a general and vague idea that the whole of it would be expended, but I had great faith in our Secretary of War, that in this prudent and economical system of government which we have now there would at least be no corruption in the expenditure of money, that a machine would not be bought for $100,000 and a voucher given for $150,000. When it was suggested that we ought to throw some circumlocution around the Secretary of War and the Ordnance Office, I readily assented to a provision that we have the scrutinizing eye of the commanding general of the Army to overlook and oversee this business in a general way, and that the Secretary of War should be required specifically to detail an ordnance officer of experience and knowledge on this subject, and an artillery officer, and that they should supervise under the Secretary of War these general expenditures.

Therefore, whatever sum may be necessary to make a plant at the Watervliet arsenal is provided for in this bill, and no more; and I doubt whether this sum is sufficient to make an effective plant. If any one will say that this Government can not afford to spend $700,000 for a plant, then this conference report ought to be disagreed to.

Passing from that to the criticism of the Senator from Maryland, that the defect in the bill is that we have not also gone further and appropriated money enough to induce and influence private manufacturers to build up gun plants or to induce the owners of the works a South Boston and at Cold Spring to add to their existing plant large sums of money in order that they may come in competition with the Government in building these guns, my answer to that is that we will take care of that question when it comes. So far as I am concerned I have pledged whatever influence I have on the Committee on Appropriations to provide in our bill for the steel, which we must contract for years in advance of its production, because everybody knows that we have not now the steel plant in this country which will enable us to make these forgings and that we are not likely to have it within two years—if I should happen to be in this Chamber then I shall stand side by side with the Senator from Maryland in giving the private establishments who may have facilities at that time for building these guns up an opportunity to exert themselves in that direction. In other words, I shall also be in favor of allowing the competition of private parties to come in and compete with the Watervliet arsenal as the Secretary of the Navy allows the South Boston people to compete with them in the construction of 4-inch guns.

I repeat what I said when the Senator from Maryland was speaking. So far as I understand the bill as amended to apply to this question, it commits the Government not at all to building up one single gun at the Watervliet arsenal after we have these forgings. The whole thing will be under the control and direction of Congress hereafter.

Mr. BECK. May I be allowed to say a word?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. BECK. I thought the Senator from Iowa was through.

Mr. ALLISON. I want to add only a word or two more, and then I shall yield the floor.

The Senate put on this bill $500,000 for the purchase of submarine mines, etc. The House conferees would not agree to that and we struck it out. They did agree to an appropriation of $100,000 for the purchase of submarine torpedoes.

For myself, Mr. President, I think that we ought to agree to this report. I think it is a wise expenditure of money, and if anything further is to be done it can be done on the fortification bill, which is soon to come to us for consideration, and the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Maryland on that bill will have ample opportunity to consider what further they think ought to be done.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, perhaps this would be a good time to say a few words, because during the next session of Congress I shall be laughed at again, as I have been for ten years for the struggle I have tried to make in keeping such amendments off appropriation bills. The Military Committee know all about the matter under consideration. So with regard to the Navy, the Naval Committee, in consultation with the Secretary of the Navy, knew all about the big ships that ought to be built. The Committee on Commerce know a good deal about what subsidies ought to be given. Yet every matter of that sort, somehow or other, is tacked on to an appropriation bill, and a committee that is loaded down with work necessary to carry on the general business of the Government under existing laws is expected to find out exactly what is best to be done for the Army, what is best to be done for the Navy, what is best to be done to carry on the postal service; although every time a suggestion is made by myself or some one else that these are matters which ought to be kept altogether independent of the appropriations necessary to carry on the Government and should not be tacked on appropriation bills, when we are forced to deal with them at the close of a session and have neither the opportunity to ascertain the facts nor when in conference do we know what is best to be done, it is disregarded.

The Senate will bear me out in what I say, that year after year whenever an amendment is sought to be made to an apppropriation bill as to how we shall build ships, I have resisted it, not because I was opposed to the thing being done, but because the Committee on Appropriations were not the proper committee to act upon it. The conference report on the naval appropriation bill, which I signed as one of the conferees, will be before us to-morrow, in which the only way out of it was to agree to all the House had done and all the Senate had done. My name is to it; perhaps it is right, but I do not know, and I can not prove whether it is right or not, and I should not be required to deal with those subjects.

So in regard to this matter, instead of the Committee on Military Affairs taking care of themselves and after full consultation with all the men who are making steel and all who are competing with the Navy and War Departments in regard to the best guns, it was turned over to the Committee on Appropriations, a committee, as I said, loaded down with the work of making the appropriations necessary to carry on the Government under existing laws, and we have to formulate new methods of building up a navy, the best method of carrying on fortifications, the best guns and the best way to have them made, the best way to regulate commerce, and the best way to extend our trade. All that has to come before us. As I said, year after year I have resisted it, and I have been very frequently laughed at because I did. The tangle we are in at this minute is the best evidence of the fact that the Committee on Appropriations ought to have nothing to do with those matters.

I understand that the fortifications appropriation bill will be here from the House in a day or two, duplicating perhaps many of the things now brought before the committee. I do not know but that it would be the best thing, as a rebuke to the Senate for sending such things to us, to reject this conference report and have it all stricken out and put it into the fortification bill, which I understand has already passed the House and will be before us dealing with many of these matters.

Mr. President, while I am on my feet I have only one word to say about the merits of this matter. I agree substantially with what the Senator from Iowa has said. When we are obliged to take charge of it, we ought not to go into any system that will commit us to anything by which we may make a great blunder.

As a member of the Committee on Appropriations, without more information than I have, I would not go into the system suggested by the Senator from Maryland to extend over a number of years, nor would I go into any extensive system of fortifications. I may be all wrong about it, but I do not believe we ought to build any fortifications now in the present condition of the world's armor as a preparation for war. I remember the General of the Army, General Sheridan, came before us on one occasion and we asked him about it, and I think he made the most sensible remark of any of these men. He said, "make me the guns and I will find some hole or other to put them in, for a good hole is better than any fortification I know;" and I think he was right. You can not build a fortification now upon which you can rely, but you could extemporize some place where you could put the guns. Therefore, to that extent, I was willing to buy steel and have guns made.

I desire to say in addition that I believe the best way to build up guns for the Army and Navy is to give our officers in the Army and Navy a chance to build some under our own management, and to give the manufacturers of the country and the builders of the country and the private operatives and the private managers of the great establishments in the country a chance to build part of them, and to give enough of the work to private men to encourage them to go on, and let them see that they are not to be bankrupted by the efforts they make, for many things they only can make for us. Nobody wants a gun except the United States, and the true way to get the best is to have as much competition as possible, at South Boston, at Midvale, near Philadelphia, at Cold Spring, at Watervliet, or elsewhere for ourselves on our own account, but let everybody compete, and when everybody is doing the best he can let us come back to the one who does it the best and the cheapest.

I am against giving a monopoly to the War Department. I do not care how good their work is. I have never seen much progress made by it during the years I have been here. I have seen a good many who have patents to cover the things they have and who lean toward their own inventions, but I never approved of very much they did. I have no charges to make against them, but I would not give them sole jurisdiction. I was very much astonished for a while, when I first heard the Senator from Maryland, to think that might be the effect of it, because I was very sure the Committee on Appropriations did not mean that that should be the effect of it.

Now, I care nothing about whether this report is agreed to or not. This matter ought not to have been on this bill. It was put on against the wish of the Committee on Appropriations, in my opinion, or against the wish of the most of us. It ought to be dealt with by the committee especially charged with the subject. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALTHALL], and others have been considering these matters all the session, and I can not understand, with all the opportunity they have had to present a bill that would be an intelligent measure, why it should be tacked on the appropriation bill. I do not know about fortifications, but I speak in regard to guns. I do not know why it should be turned over to a committee, many of the members of which know nothing about the subject-matter. For one I do not. I do not profess to know, and I have no opportunity to learn, and I suppose there are others in the same condition. So it is with matters relating to the Navy; the Naval Committee ought to attend to its own matters. So it is with many other things.

I thought I would take this opportunity to say that the best thing to do hereafter is that each committee specially charged with particular business, which knows all about it, should bring in such measures and that they should not be turned over to the Committee on Appropriations to present. In that way the reasons would be given intelligently, instead of having us in a tangle as we are now.

I rather think I shall vote against this report, to see if the difficulty will not be removed or something come out of it; but I do not know whether it is best to do so or not.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, the Senate is asked to approve the report of the conference committee. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], who opposed the amendments I had the honor to offer, concedes cheerfully and frankly that they are very much improved by the conference report. Now, inasmuch as the Senate adopted the original amendments by a very large majority I feel no very great apprehension that it will not approve of the improved amendments to the Army appropriation bill.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] makes a very proper and wise suggestion, in which I very heartily concur, concerning the loading of appropriation bills with legislation that does not pertain directly to expenditures under existing laws. But nobody is better aware than one with that Senator's experience, that both Houses of Congress have come to resort to that course in despair in many cases as the only way of getting important public business done. That is not the fault of this branch; I do not say whose fault it is. I have known a legislative department in which it has been systematically the practice to bury things they did not quite like, and not to give their own body a chance to vote upon them.

I will suppose a case. I will suppose that these very amendments that I offered to the Army appropriation bill were pending in the form of an independent bill in the other House, and suppose that there was to be no chance whatever for them there as an independent bill and that we here thought that as they were entirely germane to an Army bill we would place them, in the form of an amendment, on the Army appropriation bill. In an ideal Congress that perhaps would not be the wisest way always to let such amendments be considered in connection with an appropriation bill, but in a practical Congress we have found it a practical way of getting at the result, to put on an appropriation bill some wise and indispensable legislation because that train was going through anyhow and we did not know whether we could catch a freight train or not. That is the vicious way that Congress has sometimes to legislate.

I will endeavor as concisely as I can to explain the existing legislation. To begin with, the Senator from Maryland has severely criticised the Ordnance Corps. Well, I think we have thrashed that grain already, and I will not spend any time on it. He confesses that we have in that corps some of the most skillful and wise men in the world and I confirm that opinion. I do not think there is a brighter class of young officers in any corps in the world than we have in some of these staff corps—honorable as well as ambitious men. The Senator from Kentucky said something of the motives of the officers of that department. There is no motive whatever for dishonesty in these matters. All our officers are seeking the honor and efficiency of the Army, as honorable and ambitious officers should. They do not wish to spend forty or fifty years in an army with no gun worth shooting.

He also says that they have spent ever so many millions of dollars since the war, with nothing to show for it. That is not correct, Mr. President. The Ordnance Department has spent considerable money since the war, but a great part of it has been for ordinary current expenses. Still, they have supplied since the war some 318 new guns. They have stopped building that kind of gun now because science has outstripped them. They have conducted a great variety of experiments, chiefly at the command of Congress, and in a great many cases under specific appropriations. They are charged with having expended this very money that they were ordered by Congress to expend. On the beach at Sandy Hook you will find all sorts of guns that they have been ordered to try, and they are willing to go on with that work of trial upon the order of Congress. If the Senator from Maryland will move to establish a board of experiment and inquiry, or something of that kind—an ordnance board of that description—I will cheerfully support a measure for that purpose, and it will have no better friend in the world than the officers of the ordnance corps and the artillery corps of our Army, because they will then be relieved of the odium heaped upon them for being obliged to say "No" to the many ambitious and cranky inventors who come forward with various devices. The ordnance officers say "We have not the money to expend on your inventions," and forthwith the inventor goes away and fills the public ear with reports concerning the Ordnance Corps.

When these experiments are made, the ordnance officers undertake to see to every detail of the work; they supervise the experiments, observe the effect of every ounce of powder, and observe the range and penetration of the shot, and every other particular connected with the experiments, and frequently, when all is summed up, the whole thing proves a failure. Then the poor inventor, never surrendering—and it is good for the world, perhaps, in the end—comes again to Congress and asks us to make another appropriation for his invention. Some of them suggest the taking of our biggest guns, boring them out, making them thinner, etc., and want to alter some four hundred of them! If you will establish a board of experiment and inquiry, it will relieve the Army from a great deal of odium, and you will once in awhile discover a grain of wheat undoubtedly.

The Senator has said that the Ordnance Corps want the money to expend. Not at all, Mr. President. They will not expend one stiver of it. And I am obliged to the committee for its superabundance of caution, for putting on this bill a clause that directs the expenditure to be under the supervision of three officers, the commanding general of the Army, an officer of the Ordnance Corps, and an officer of artillery, these being supervised with full power by the Secretary of War. Now, we shall have some good work done for which the Ordnance Department will not be charged with injustice or dishonesty. I was perfectly willing to trust the Secretary of War before, without that provision, because then the whole matter was under his supervision. This provision, however, arranges that he shall have three good men to attend to the work, and he will then supervise the whole matter. That he would have done in any case.

What do we propose in this bill? This is really, I hope, the first step in what is to be a long line of mechanical and scientific work for renewing the defenses of the country, and I have not the slightest idea that we shall ever go backward upon it; because it is in accordance with the experience of European countries, all of them. It is in accordance with the advice of the great steel manufacturers of the United States as the wisest and most economical method of doing this work. Some governments furnish the whole shop for the manufacture of guns, forging and finishing everything themselves. Some work in partnership with private concerns, owning part of the stock. But these experiments in general have failed.

The example of Germany is pointed to as if it were a great success. Why, Mr. President, Krupp has undoubtedly a great city of builders and workers there, and has built magnificent steel guns. But the Government of Germany is now virtually his slave. His prices are enormous, although the government could get out of it if they chose. Germany to-day is full of private scandals and audible mutterings of scandal regarding that establishment. People inquire specifically how high in rank are the officers who have the ordering of those guns?

The French Government have tried, each in its own way and in its own time, a variety of experiments. The most successful plan, as has been reported by the Gun Foundry Board in their report—and they give the facts on which they base their findings—is that which we are proposing to follow. The steel manufacturers said to us when we were inquiring into this matter a few years ago that it would cost a million and a half dollars to put up a shop that would build to completion a steel gun. They said, "We will not do that, in view of the fate that has overtaken great contractors like Roach & Co.; we will not think of it; your better way is to divide the work." That is to say, suppose you want 4,000 tons of steel to be manufactured into guns. some 8-inch, some 10-inch, some 12-inch, and some 16-inch guns. You will want the jackets, the tubes, the thirty or forty rings or bands of steel that go around these guns to build up one big gun. If you should offer to the steel-men of the country the forging of 4,000 tons of this steel—enough to make a profitable or partially profitable contract, because the plant they would have left they would go on to use to some extent for commercial purposes—"then," they said to us, "we would bid." That part of the work would cost us $800,000 to build a plant for.

Then the Government could put up shops for nice finishing and turning and for putting together the parts of guns. That would cost $800,000. Then, they said, "If we went on and were unreasonable the Government could go on and build forging shops for themselves; but if you should tell us that the thing was a success, and that we might go on, we would add to our plant the requisite machinery to finish the gun, and we would give you a complete gun. But for the present you could assume the finishing of guns for yourselves."

That, Mr. President, is the best system of checks and balances and the most economical method of introducing this important industry. The tendency of it is to build up among private capitalists great forging shops, and ultimately finishing shops. It is the best plan for the country. Nobody will at present put up the machines that are indispensable to the building of a great establishment. We have pointed out the best way to get the work done, which is by a division of the work in the first place, aiming ultimately at the doing of it all by private parties.

Some Senators say, "Why not open to all men the chance to bring in their guns and let us buy as many of them as may be desired." But there is not a solitary person on earth who will give you a modern gun in that way. The South Boston works will give you some fine cast-iron guns of course, but we have been trying them, and we have been bursting up some good 12-inch cast-iron rifled guns. The South Boston works have failed with a great 12-inch cast-iron cannon. It is hardly to be expected that these men will give you a complete, first-class, large gun—a 12 or 16 inch gun. That there should be some way for inventors to apply and offer their guns I agree. This bill does not shut us up to one thing. What the bill says is simply that we must have some guns for the country right away; there may be something better in ten or twelve or perhaps even five years, but let us build these now and make a start.

I claim, therefore, that this is the most economical way of getting an armament, and that it bars out nobody. It is a safe measure as a matter of administration.

I believe I have spoken of nearly every point that the Senator from Maryland has made. If I have omitted any I do not know it.

This bill covered originally about $6,000,000. We had proposed to authorize the War Department to contract for $5,000,000 worth of heavy steel forgings. The conference committee has cut that down to three and a half millions. I would have left it at five millions, because all the money is not to be expended within four or five years anyhow, and the contractor will give you a better gun if you will give him a long contract, because he has to expend an immense sum before he can get a plant.

If the contractor charges you in his bid the $800,000 cost of his plant, so that when he gets through he will have had a little profit and have his whole plant repaid to him. you will have made an expensive bargain for steel. But he will not probably do that. He will probably give you a fair bid, because after that he will have his plant left, and he will hope to get some further bids for armament and guns, and he will hope to build some steel shafts, because we have a great many ships. We are second only to Great Britain in the number of ships we have.

The Senator from Massachusetts asks if this opens the work to competition? It does not ask every man in the world to build you good, big, fine guns and bring them here and let you choose the best, because you might wait until all eternity and might not get a gun. But it invites competition—such competition as can be had from such establishments as the South Boston Works, the Johnstown Works, the Cambria Iron Works, the Midvale Works at Philadelphia, and the Bethlehem Works. The Bethlehem Works have already put in a plant and they are doing for the Navy just this class of work. Nobody is forbidden to compete for the chance of this three and a half million dollars for these rough forgings of steel. Those who say that there is no competition about it, therefore, are in error.

I have alluded to the improvements in the bill. The conference committee has provided for a board of three to supervise all expenditures. It has struck out about $500,000 of the appropriation concerning torpedoes and the mines, galleries, and other things indispensable to work torpedoes. I am sorry for that, because torpedoes furnish that sort of defense which can be most quickly extemporized. The torpedo comes more nearly under that description than any other article of defense. We could get a supply of them ready very soon; but we could not get torpedoes ready now under three months if we should have notice that we had to defend ourselves, because the galleries that run down from the banks, the means of shelter, the electrical apparatus, the trained men, and all that would not be ready. This torpedo provision, however, was stricken out. But let it go; what we are looking for is the main thing.

Mr. PLUMB. I would call the attention of the Senator to the fact that what is called the shore torpedo is very much better than the other.

Mr. HAWLEY. But that will not take the place of the other.

Mr. PLUMB. It will very largely do so, I think, because torpedoes located in channels are liable to be taken up by vessels and are not the best means of defense. In addition to that, however, the Senator will bear in mind that there is in the bill an ample provision relating to the movable torpedo, which, according to our present light, is one of the very best implements of defense known to modern warfare.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator is right, undoubtedly, in that statement.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not think that the bill, from the standpoint of the Senator, is very materially interfered with.

Mr. HAWLEY. Well, I am submitting very gracefully to the slaughter of one of my little children, or one of the children of the Committee on Military Affairs, because the bill provides for the purchase of certain torpedoes, if they are found valuable. There is a reduction made of $500,000 by the striking out of section 6, and a reduction of a million and a half by the striking out of the section relating to steel forges. The committee also struck out from section 3 the clause relating to the recommendation of the Gun Foundry Board. They did not like to bind themselves to the findings of that board, because improvements might have been made since the making of that report. I can not say, therefore, that the report of the conference committee is open to any valid objection.

Mr. DAWES. I voted for this amendment when it was offered to the bill by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], and I shall vote for the conference report, but I wish at the same time to express my regret at the lack of one feature in it. The controversy over this matter which has been discussed in the remarks of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] is not a new one. It has been my lot to fall into this controversy for several years, being at the same time very much in the position in which the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] found himself—not knowing anything at all about it. I have got along as well as I could.

In the last Congress the controversy that arose between the two Houses, and which rested in the committee of conference during two sessions, where the fortification bill finally failed, was over substantially this very measure propounded by the Senate, and something like the measure which has been advanced by the Senator from Maryland, propounded by the other House. The Senate, however, did what I wish was in this bill. They incorporated along with this measure the idea that it was absolutely necessary for the safety of this Government in time of war and peril that there should exist in this country establishments that could produce guns. This plan, and the best of them all by itself, makes the rough castings by private enterprise and the assembling and completing of them by the Government.

That was the proposition of the Senate in the last conference. Against that the House proposed to construct the guns entirely by private enterprise, cutting the Government out entirely; and that was the struggle. Now, the Senate measure, which has had the elements of this, though not so well perfected, carried along with it the idea that the establishment in this country that did produce guns of value, and in time of war of the greatest and most vital importance, should be kept up in this country and should not be left to die out, so that when the exigency did come the Government would not be left helpless.

The Government should not depend wholly on private enterprise, for private enterprise could not produce a gun, because private enterprise would be embarking entirely in the rough castings and the Government in the assembling and completing of them.

That is a great feature which ought to be carried out, and is very well guarded in this measure from the Military Committee. But while it does not exclude, as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] say, it does not forbid the maintaining of these private establishments by the Government; it does not include them; it leaves them to die; and the Senator from Iowa pledges himself two or three years hence, when these steel castings shall come to be complete, to stand up here and breathe the breath of life anew into these establishments. That will involve delay and the confining of the manufacture of all guns to steel. If I were absolutely certain that the steel gun was the best gun of the future and the only gun that it was wise to construct, that might be a very strong argument for keeping it exclusively in this copartnership—if I may use that word—this casting by private enterprise of rough castings and the completing them in the Government works. But I do not think that the Government ought to turn its back upon all other guns than steel guns. Cast-iron has not passed out of use for guns by any means. There is a new metal now coming into use in Europe for guns, and we are getting now for the first time into what is an essential condition, an admirable one for building guns, but are confining ourselves entirely to steel. That is the only criticism that I have upon this measure.

All the controversies over this subject that have taken place in the past have had this idea which is in this amendment, and along with it a proposition to make other guns—not to cripple and not to circumscribe the effort to bring into perfection the idea of this amendment, but at the same time to hold out encouragement to private enterprise to enable it when the emergency came to itself build a gun and complete a gun. Private enterprise under this plan can not complete a gun; the Government under this plan can not complete a gun; it takes the two together, and the two together in my opinion can work better and more profitably, with more promise of perfect result, than in any other way; but at the same time I repeat my regret that this amendment has turned its back upon all encouragement to private enterprise to hold up its establishments, or rather to invest more capital in establishments for the construction of guns.

Nevertheless, sir, it is such a valuable thing for which I have contended along with the other elements, for two or three Congresses in the past, that I am very glad to vote for this. I hope, however, that the Congress of the United States by doing this will not decide that this is all that they will do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate concur in the report of the committee of conference?

Mr. GORMAN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this question the Senator from Maryland asks that the yeas and nays may be entered upon the Journal.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not wish to detain the Senate, but I rise to say that while I agree that this report shall be adopted, and that I have no doubt it will be of service in its way, I think it is far from meeting the entire case, and that there ought to be something which affords more of a stimulus and opportunity to the inventive public and to the general enterprising public in regard to matters of this kind than is afforded by this proposition.

This proposition assumes that we have got to a certain stage of perfection in the manufacture of powerful weapons of war, and that we can take what has been provided and go on without inviting further improvements.

Mr. HAWLEY. Oh, no; do not add that last sentence.

Mr. PLUMB. So far as that goes I have no objection to taking something of that kind, although I believe it ought to go further. I believe, as I have heretofore said, that we are on the eve of developments in regard not only to explosives but to guns and materials for guns, that will put us as much forward in perhaps the next three or four years as the whole world has gone forward in the last twenty-five.

The complaint I have to make about this is not that we are to spend three or four million dollars in the construction of what may prove to be effective weapons, because by the expenditure of this money not only shall we secure instruction for our artisans, but by thus turning our manufactures into the right direction we shall secure incidental advantages more than counterbalancing the entire cost. But the complaint I have is that the bill does not go further; that it does not give larger relative importance to this other branch of inquiry and investigation in regard to what is best to be done in the way of offensive and defensive weapons and methods.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry as to the effect of the vote. If we refuse to agree to the report of the conference committee, does the bill then go back to the conference committee, or is it finally defeated?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The conference, as the Chair understands, was on amendments offered and agreed to in the Senate to a bill originating in the House of Representatives. The House disagreeing to the amendments, the bill went to a conference, and the papers being in the possession of the Senate, the report of the conference committee is first made to this body. In case the Senate should refuse to agree to the report of the committee of conference it will be as if no action whatever had been taken. The amendments will still be pending disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and the Senate can either insist upon its amendments or adhere to them, or it can recede from them. The bill retains its vitality.

Mr. HAWLEY. Some Senator asked the Senator from Maryland about how many heavy guns this sum of $3,500,000 would make. It is a thing very difficult to estimate, because whoever takes this contract is expected to expend a great deal of money in plant—unless it all goes to the Bethlehem works—they have their plant very nearly ready. But if we suppose that the finished guns will cost $1,000 a ton, the appropriation would secure for us 3,500 tons of heavy guns. Nobody intends at present to build a gun weighing 100 tons—a 16-inch gun—so far as I know. The guns would probably be 8-inch, 10-inch, and 12-inch guns. I should say they would make three guns to the hundred tons. That would make 105 guns, though it would really make probably more than that, as more of them would probably be 8-inch than 10-inch guns.

Mr. GORMAN. Let me ask the Senator as to the capacity of the shop or yard at Washington, if worked up to the full capacity of its plant? Is it a product of twenty-five 6-inch guns and ten 8-inch guns?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. GORMAN. The capacity of the shop at Watervliet would be greater when completed, but it can not be completed within two years. Therefore the capacity of that shop, with what improvements they would make, would probably not exceed that of the plant here.

Mr. HAWLEY. But when these shops are once established the increasing of their capacity means nothing more than buying a few more of the larger lathes, etc.—a few more machine tools.

Mr. BLAIR. Let me inquire of the Senator whether these guns are to be used indifferently for the Army and the Navy?

Mr. HAWLEY. These guns for the coast defenses are contemplated to be guns for the Army only.

Another point occurs to me. A Senator spoke of private parties making these guns. There is no difficulty about private shops making small guns. One shop has made some nice 8-inch steel guns, but there is no shop in the country prepared to forge the heavy pieces for a 10-inch gun.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the question of concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. HISCOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SABIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]. I shall transfer that pair to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER], and record my vote "yea."

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON].

Mr. TURPIE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. VANCE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BERRY. My colleague [Mr. JONES, of Arkansas] is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK].

Mr. BATE. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. CULLOM. For the purpose of making a quorum I will transfer the pair of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] with myself to my colleague [Mr. FARWELL] so that the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] and myself can both vote.

Mr. MORGAN. I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS]. If his colleague knows how he would vote on this matter I should like to be informed of it.

Mr. ALLISON. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. MORGAN. With that assurance I vote "yea."

Mr. CALL. I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN]. I do not see him in the Chamber, and if he has not voted I shall withhold my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not voted.

Mr. TELLER. I think he would undoubtedly vote "yea," if he were present.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CALL. If it is necessary to make a quorum, I will vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not necessary.

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—30.

Allison,	Dawes,	Mitchell,	Sabin,
Beck,	Dolph,	Morgan,	Sawyer,
Blair,	Edmunds,	Paddock,	Sherman,

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 10998) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 1992, Senate bill 3226.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Pending that I wish to submit a privileged motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio desires to submit a privileged motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business in open session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate now proceed, in open executive session, to the consideration of the fisheries treaty.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is now in open executive session. The title of the treaty will be read.

The EXECUTIVE CLERK. Treaty (Executive M) between United States and Great Britain concerning the interpretation of the convention of October 20, 1818, signed at Washington February 15, 1888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The treaty is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read by articles. The first article will be read.

The Executive Clerk read as follows:

ARTICLE I.

The high contracting parties agree to appoint a mixed commission to delimit, in the manner provided in this treaty, the British waters, bays, creeks, and harbors of the coasts of Canada and of Newfoundland, as to which the United States, by Article I of the convention of October 20, 1818, between the United States and Great Britain, renounced forever any liberty to take, dry, or cure fish.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, I know very well that I can add nothing to the stores of learning, to the eloquence and ability which have characterized this debate——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Louisiana pardon me for a moment? I should like to know for my own information whether when the reading of the treaty by articles begins it ought not to be read through by articles.

Mr. GIBSON. I desire to submit some remarks on the treaty itself, and to make a motion. I am content that the treaty shall be read through.

Mr. HOAR. I think that is the orderly way.

Mr. MORGAN. It has been read through.

Mr. HOAR. But it has to be read by articles, under the rule.

Mr. GIBSON. I understand that there are some amendments to be proposed to different articles.

Mr. HOAR. As I understand it, the rule requires the treaty to be read by articles.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Massachusetts will pardon the Chair, the treaty has once been read at length before the Senate, and the rules require that it shall be considered as in Committee of the Whole subsequently, and read by articles for amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I so understand it, and that is precisely what I was about to state, if the Chair please. I understand that the treaty should be now read through by articles under the rule, the rule requires it, until some amendment is offered to a particular article. If an amendment be offered then, of course, the amendment is debatable; otherwise the debate on the treaty goes on after the reading by articles is completed.

Mr. GRAY. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts, and I ask somewhat for information, whether when an article has been read it is not proper for any Senator who wishes to discuss that article to rise and make remarks upon the article and present his views on the question?

Mr. HOAR. Not without moving an amendment. I do not care anything about the question, and will agree to whatever course the Senator from Louisiana prefers to take; but I understand if we proceed according to the strict rule there must be some pending question. The question upon the whole treaty is not pending until the treaty has been read through under the rule by articles. If, however, as it is read by articles an amendment is moved, then it is in order to address the Senate on that amendment; but there is no question open for debate until one or the other of those things takes place, either when the treaty has been read through and the question is on its passage or on a motion to amend a particular article.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Louisiana will pardon the Chair for one moment, it will be interesting to have the rule read, so that it will be clearly before the minds of Senators; and as it is brief, the Chief Clerk will read the parts of Rule XXXVII which refer to the proceedings when treaties are under consideration.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

When a treaty is reported from a committee with or without amendment it shall, unless the Senate unanimously otherwise direct, lie one day for consideration; after which it may be read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole, when it shall be proceeded with by articles, and the amendments reported by the committee shall be first acted upon, after wh ch other amendments may be proposed; and when through with the proceedings had as in Committee of the Whole shall be reported to the Senate, when the question shall be, if the treaty be amended, "Will the Senate concur in the amendments made in Committee of the Whole?" And the amendments may be taken separately, or in gross, if no Senator shall object; after which new amendments may be proposed.

At any stage of such proceedings the Senate may remove the injunction of secrecy from the treaty, or proceed w th its consideration in open executive session.

The decisions thus made shall be reduced to the form of a resolution of ratification, with or without amendments, as the case may be; which shall be proposed on a subsequent day, unless, by unanimous consent, the Senate determine otherwise; at which stage no amendment shall be received, unless by unanimous consent.

On the final question to advise and consent to the ratification in the form agreed to, the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators present shall be necessary to determine it in the affirmative; but all other motions and questions upon a treaty shall be decided by a majority vote, except a motion to postpone indefinitely, which shall be decided by a vote of two-thirds.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, I know I can add nothing to the stores of information and to the ability and eloquence which have characterized this debate. I would be content to cast a silent vote if it had not been that certain imputations, unjust and indecorous, have been laid against Senators who represent States lying south of the Potomac and the Ohio. It might be well for these Eastern Senators to reflect that if their ancestors had treated our ancestors and predecessors in public life from the country south of the Potomac and the Ohio in the same spirit of suspicion and reproach, there would probably have been no Declaration of Independence, no war of the Revolution, no Independence achieved, no Constitution, no Union, and no United States of America. Moreover, it is due that I should make known the considerations which have induced me, after examination, to give my cordial support to the ratification of the pending treaty.

There is no interest of this country beyond its boundaries so insignificant as to escape the scrutiny and reach of our Constitution and laws; none so remote as to be beyond the solicitude of American Senators, and of such interests none is so justly entitled to recognition, protection, and support as our fishing rights and liberties on the eastern coasts of the British provinces. There is not one of these American fishermen who, leaving his wife and children in his humble home, goes forth in his little dory from the rockbound shores of New England to brave the storms of these fierce northern seas in quest of a livelihood; not one of these intrepid husbandmen of the billowy pastures of the deep who is not accompanied by my personal good-will, and over whom I would not hold the flag and power of my country to protect his rights under the treaties and the laws of nations.

This fishing industry, it will be remembered, was acquired by our ancestors when they were British subjects. The domination of France was overthrown by the joint efforts of the colonists and the mother country, and the supremacy of England on this continent was fully recognized by the treaty of 1763. We all remember how that contest was begun by the colony of Virginia, which sent forth a body of four hundred men under the command of George Washington, then a young man and British subject, to attack the French in their stronghold of Fort Duquesne, on the Ohio River, and how he was surrounded and forced to capitulate. Washington was then a loyal subject of Great Britain, wearing the uniform and defending the flag, the old flag of the mother country. Though unsuccessful in his first venture, yet the struggle thus begun for the valley of the Ohio and the lakes extended throughout Canada, indeed throughout continental Europe, for it has been well observed by a distinguished historian that troops were fighting in Saxony for the Dominion of Canada. Troops from the Carolinas, from Maryland and Pennsylvania and Delaware, from Virginia, joined the regulars from England and rallied under the leadership of Braddock and Washington to drive the French and the Indians from their territory in the West, while gallant spirits from New England went forth over the very waters we discuss to-day to seize the fortress at Louisburgh. Soldiers from New England and New York were re-enforcing Wolfe when he scaled the Heights of Abraham, and many of them fell with Lord Howe at Ticonderoga.

Those were the days when our ancestors were proud to call themselves British colonists and British subjects; when the Province of Massachusetts was erecting a monument to Lord Howe, which the visitor may see to-day in Westminster Abbey; when the commons of South Carolina were dedicating a statue in bronze of the Earl of Chatham, the great English commoner, which still stands in Charleston as a perpetual memorial of their gratitude and appreciation for his public life and services; when the American colonist was marching side by side with the veterans of England to extend the area of English institutions and English power, and when his proudest boast was—

> That Chatham's language was his mother tongue,
> And Wolfe's great heart compatriot with his own.

It was under these circumstances and associations that this fishing right and liberty on the coast of the British provinces became our countrymen's right. But I need not recall the fact that the epoch of which I have been speaking was short lived, and that by reason of the oppression and wrongs of the mother country the loyal sentiment that had inspired the colonists was converted after unavailing remonstrances into deep-seated hostility.

The colonists took up arms under the leadership of George Washington, and by his genius and wisdom, and after a seven years' struggle characterized by every virtue that may adorn a people, our independence was achieved, and was fully recognized, as well as our fishing rights and liberties in the Northeastern waters, by King George III in the treaty of 1783, signed by John Adams, Benjamin Franklin, and John Jay. I append to my remarks Article III of the treaty of 1783.

But it must be borne in mind that this treaty was made, not under the present Constitution, but under the Articles of Confederation, and by the eleventh article it was provided that "Canada, acceding to this Confederation and joining in the measures of the United States, shall be admitted into and entitled to all the advantages of this Union; but no other colony shall be admitted into the same unless such admission be agreed to by nine States." Doubtless the belief existed and the hope was cherished that Canada would become one of the States of the Union, and perhaps it was owing to this sentiment, shared probably by English statesmen, that our commissioners were enabled to obtain full recognition of our fishing rights.

Having overthrown the power of Holland and Spain and France, England became mistress of the seas, and arbitrary and intolerant in her intercourse with other nations. She demanded the right to halt and search American ships on the high seas, and this was held to be insulting to our flag and to the honor of our country, and under the leadership of Madison and Clay and Calhoun and Lowndes the United States declared war against Great Britain. This was the boldest step ever taken by the Government of the United States, when you consider the power and resources of England and how meager were our own at that time, and yet this very measure was adopted by statesmen from the country south of the Potomac and the Ohio, whose successors to-day appear to be, in their opinion, unworthy of the confidence and esteem of the Senators of the States of the Northeast. This war was closed by the treaty of Ghent, where our commissioners proposed to the British commissioners that the provisions of the treaty of 1783 relating to the navigation of the Mississippi River and to the fishing rights should be incorporated in the treaty of 1815—a proposition which the British commissioners declined and notified the commissioners of our Government that they regarded the treaty of 1783 as having been abrogated by the war of 1812, in respect of these two matters, and that they would not make any recognition of the rights which had been conceded by the treaty of 1783 without a fair equivalent therefor. They seemed to consider the whole treaty of 1783 as a British grant; we considered it as a British acknowledgment.

The treaty of 1815 was silent as to the Mississippi River and the fishing interests, and it was equally silent, strange as it may appear, with regard to the "right of search," which had been the cause of the war. Mr. Gallatin had charge of the matter that related to the fishing liberty and to the navigation of the Mississippi River; of course he was aided by John Quincy Adams, Henry Clay, James Bayard, and Jonathan Russell, his associates on the commission. I have read, as I have no doubt other Senators have read, the memoirs of John Quincy Adams, who relates circumstantially interviews of our commissioners with the British commissioners, and gives every detail of the proceedings which resulted in the adoption of the treaty of Ghent. I will here say that there is no one who entertains a higher respect for the long services of John Quincy Adams, for his profound learning, his varied scholarship, his intense nationality, his obstinate devotion to what he thought was right, whenever called upon to treat with foreign governments. But in spite of his own devotion to the fishing interests, inherited from his father, John Adams, who had exclaimed, when making the treaty of 1783, "Our fishing rights or no treaty;" in spite of the exertions of Albert Gallatin, who in his day and generation rendered inestimable services to the public welfare; in spite of the persuasive eloquence of Henry Clay and the sturdy common sense of James Bayard, the grandfather of our Secretary of State, nothing could be accomplished; not a guaranty could be obtained from the British commissioners, who were in constant correspondence with their government, in acknowledgment of American rights in the fishing waters of the British provinces.

It is doubtful even whether the commissioners would have signed any treaty of peace had it not been owing to the friendship of the Russian Czar, who was then in coalition with Great Britain and making common cause against Napoleon, and insisted that England should make peace with the United States; and it may be that this powerful influence exerted in our behalf grew out of the friendship that had been formed between the Czar and John Quincy Adams, who in his youth was secretary of legation at St. Petersburg, and enjoyed the acquaintance and even the companionship of the Czar himself and of his prime minister. After the treaty of peace John Quincy Adams was appointed by President Madison minister to the court of St. James, and with that persistency that ever characterized him, on still pursuing the fishing interest and endeavoring to get a recognition of it, it was not long before he sought an interview with the minister of foreign affairs, the Earl of Bathurst, one of the most accomplished and the ablest of English statesmen.

Mr. Adams gave to Mr. Monroe, the Secretary of State, in a letter dated London, September 19, 1815, the substance of his conversation with Lord Bathurst and the opinions he derived from it. It appears that a captain of a British armed vessel, the Jaseur, had given warning to certain American fishing vessels to withdraw from the fishing grounds to a distance of 60 miles from the coast of the British provinces. This was one of the subjects that Mr. Adams proposed to discuss with Lord Bathurst, and as that was easily disposed of, he then set forth with great vigor an argument against the forfeiture by the war of 1812 of our fishing rights recognized by the treaty of 1783. He says:

I now stated to Lord Bathurst the ground upon which the Government of the United States considered the right as subsisting and unimpaired. The treaty of 1783 was in its essential nature not liable to be annulled by the subsequent war. It acknowledged the United States as a sovereign and independent power. It would be an absurdity inconsistent with the acknowledgment itself to suppose it possible to be forfeited by a war. The whole treaty of Ghent did constantly refer to it as existing and in full force, nor was an intimation given that any further confirmation of it was supposed to be necessary. It would be for the British Government ultimately to determine how far this reasoning was to be admitted as correct. There were also considerations of policy and expediency to which I hoped they would give suitable attention before they should come to final decision upon this point. I thought it my duty to suggest them, that they might not be overlooked.

I will not repeat all the considerations and arguments Mr. Adams urged upon Lord Bathurst. They are familiar to us all. But I ask the Senators to take note of the opinion which he formed at the conclusion of this interview as to the position of the British Government. He says, in conclusion, to Mr. Monroe:

I have no expectation that the arguments used by me, either in support of our right or as to the policy of Great Britain upon this question, will have any weight here.

The spectacle is presented of the ablest, most earnest, and obstinate, at the same time the most learned diplomatist that America had, acknowledging that all his efforts to induce the British Government to make any recognition whatsoever of our fishing interests on the coasts of the northeastern provinces had been in vain. But not content with this, Mr. Adams, a few days afterwards, September 25, 1815, submitted a paper to the Earl of Bathurst, which exhausts the arguments in favor of the rights of the United States. He notes how they were acquired by the colonists when they were British subjects, how the British Government by the treaty of 1783 had given the fullest acknowledgment of them, and contended that that treaty had not been abrogated by the war of 1812. And he hints at the possibility of resistance if these rights should be denied.

The treaty of Ghent—

in every one of its essential articles refers to that of 1783 as being still in full force. The object of all its articles relative to the boundary is to ascertain with more precision and to carry into effect the provisions of that prior compact. The treaty of 1783 is, by tacit understanding between the parties, and without any positive stipulation, constantly referred to as the fundamental law of the relations between the two nations. Upon what ground, then, can Great Britain assume that one particular stipulation in that treaty is no longer binding upon her? Upon this foundation, my lord, the Government of the United States consider the people thereof as fully entitled, of right, to all the liberties of the North American fisheries which have always belonged to them, which, in the treaty of 1783, Great Britain recognized as belonging to them, and which they never have, by any act of theirs, consented to renounce. With these views, should Great Britain ultimately determine to deprive them of the enjoyment of these liberties by force, it is not for me to say whether or for what length of time they would submit to the bereavement of that which they would still hold to be their unquestionable right.

It is but fair that I should make a brief quotation from the reply of Lord Bathurst in the contention of Mr. Adams. In a letter to Mr. Adams, dated October 30, 1815, Lord Bathurst says:

As to the origin of these privileges, in point of fact the undersigned is ready to admit that so long as the United States constituted a part of the dominions of His Majesty the inhabitants had the enjoyment of them, as they had of other political and commercial advantages, in common with His Majesty's subjects. But they had at the same time, in common with His Majesty's other subjects, duties to perform; and when the United States by their separation from Great Britain became released from the duties they became excluded also from the advantages of British subjects. They can not, therefore, now claim otherwise than by treaty the exercise of privileges belonging to them as British subjects unless they are prepared to admit on the part of Great Britain the exercise of the rights which she enjoyed previous to the separation.

If it be contended on the part of the United States that, in consequence of having been once a part of the British dominions, they are now entitled as of right to all the privileges which they enjoyed as British subjects in addition to those which they have as an independent people, the undersigned can not too strongly protest against such a doctrine; and it must become doubly necessary for Great Britain to hesitate in conceding the privileges which are now the subject of discussion, lest by such a concession she should be supposed to countenance a principle not less novel than alarming.

But though Great Britain can never admit the claim of the United States to enjoy those liberties with respect to the fisheries as matter of right, she is by no means insensible to some of those considerations with which the letter of the American minister concludes.

Although His Majesty's Government can not admit that the claim of the American fisherman to fish within British jurisdiction and to use the British territory for purposes connected with their fishery is analogous to the indulgence which has been granted to enemy's subjects engaged in fishing on the high seas, for the purpose of conveying fresh fish to market, yet they do feel that the enjoyment of the liberties formerly used by the inhabitants of the United States may be very conducive to their national and individual prosperity, though they should be placed under some modifications; and this feeling operates most forcibly in favor of concession. But Great Britain can only offer the concession in a way which shall effectually protect her own subjects from such obstructions to their lawful enterprises as they too frequently experienced immediately previous to the late war, and which are, from their very nature, calculated to produce collision and disunion between the two states.

Shortly after these events Mr. Adams was recalled to be Secretary of State under President Monroe. He retired from the British court, as he had done from Ghent, firmly convinced, as he said himself in his letter to Mr. Monroe, that his arguments had no weight with the British Government. He evidently had been discouraged, for on July 18, 1818, he addressed a letter of instructions to Messrs. Gallatin and Rush, who were about to make the treaty of 1818, respecting the fisheries, in which he says:

The proceedings, deliberations, and communications upon this subject, which took place at the negotiation of Ghent, will be fresh in the remembrance of Mr. Gallatin. Mr. Rush possesses copies of the correspondence with the British Government relating to it after the conclusion of the peace, and of that which has passed here between Mr. Bagot and this Government. Copies of several letters received by members of Congress during the late session, from the parts of the country most deeply interested in the fisheries, are transmitted.

The President authorizes you to agree to an article whereby the United States will desist from the liberty of fishing, and curing and drying fish, within the British jurisdiction generally, upon condition that it shall be secured as a permanent right, not liable to be impaired by any future war, from Cape Ray to the Ramaa Islands, and from Mount Joly, on the Labrador coast, through the Strait of Belle Isle, indefinitely north, along the coast; the right to extend as well to curing and drying the fish as to fishing.

No one better than Mr. Adams knew the meaning of the words "within British jurisdiction generally." He knew that meant to give up our rights and liberties along the coasts of Nova Scotia, Cape Breton, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Magdalen Island, and all that part of Newfoundland and Labrador not embraced within the limits designated by him. There can be no doubt about this, for in a communication, dated Ghent, December 25, 1814, the American plenipotentiaries, in a letter signed first by John Quincy Adams, and probably drawn by him, they speak of our rights on the coast of the northeastern provinces as the "right of the people of the United States to fisheries within the British jurisdiction." And Mr. Gallatin, in a letter to the Secretary of State, dated at Ghent, 25th of December, 1814, says:

On the subject of the fisheries within the jurisdiction of Great Britain we have certainly done all that could be done.

In that very same letter he says further:

The treaty which we signed yesterday with the British ministers is, in my opinion, as favorable as could be expected under existing circumstances so far as they were known to us. The attitude taken by the State of Massachusetts and the appearances in some of the neighboring States had a most unfavorable effect.

Nobody can deny that our contention from the beginning to the end has been for the fishing rights within the British jurisdiction. And now the only question to determine is how far the maritime jurisdiction of Great Britain on the coasts of the northeastern provinces extends into the sea. I will discuss the question of maritime jurisdiction more fully later on, but it is important to-day, in order to do justice to all parties concerned and to arrive at a fair and candid determination of this matter, that we should bear in mind the fact that John Quincy Adams, who above all others was the most zealous and devoted advocate of our fishing rights, while Secretary of State instructed our ministers who were about to make the treaty of 1818 to desist from pressing the liberty of fishing and curing fish within the British jurisdiction generally, upon the condition that the permanent right should be secured, a right not liable to be impaired by any future war, the privilege of fishing—

From Cape Ray to the Ramaa Islands and from Mount Joly, on the Labrador coast, through the Strait of Belle Isle, indefinitely north along the coast; the right to extend as well to curing and drying the fish as to fishing.

Let those who have doubts about the propriety of ratifying the pending treaty look over the maps which have been hung on the walls of this Senate Chamber, and contrast the terms that John Quincy Adams proposed to Messrs. Rush and Gallatin with those which have been secured by Thomas F. Bayard in the pending treaty.

But to pursue the subject further. How did Messrs. Gallatin and Rush treat these instructions? They informed Mr. Adams, the Secretary of State, in a letter dated London, October 20, 1818:

We succeeded in securing, besides the rights of taking and curing fish within the limits designated by our instructions, as a sine qua non, the liberty of fishing on the coasts of the Magdalen Islands and on the western coast of Newfoundland, and the privilege of entering, for shelter, wood, and water, in all the British harbors of North America."

So it appears that our plenipotentiaries were successful beyond the expectations and hopes of Mr. Adams, Secretary of State. We have before us now, in an official form, the interpretation which the plenipotentiaries themselves gave to the treaty they had just concluded, and their construction is, as will be perceived by reference to their letter, that they had secured by this treaty rights for taking and curing fish within the limits designated by Mr. Adams, namely, from Cape Ray to Rameau Island and from Mount Joly, on the Labrador coast, through the Straits of Belle Isle indefinitely north along the coast, but also liberty of fishing on the coast of the Magdalen Islands and on the western coast of Newfoundland, and the privilege of entering, for shelter, wood, and water, in all the British harbors of North America. They also admit that there is no right nor liberty to fish secured by this treaty on the coasts of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Cape Breton, or Prince Edward Island. This they say they had surrendered. This liberty of fishing is confined to the coast of the Magdalen Islands and the western coast of Newfoundland. They obtained, not a privilege for fishing, but a privilege for entering for shelter, wood, and water, which is accorded in all the British harbors of North America. This interpretation of the treaty by the plenipotentiaries themselves, in my judgment, is too narrow and contracted and is not justified by the language of the treaty itself. This interpretation would fully justify the British contention, and there will be no escape from the conclusion that we had not acquired by this treaty any right of fishing on any of the coasts or within the marine jurisdiction of any of those British provinces which are not specified in the treaty itself. Such at least is the opinion of the plenipotentiaries. But let us recur for a moment to the treaty itself. I will quote only the clauses that bear upon the points I am now discussing, but will append to my remarks Article I of the treaty of 1818, so that reference may be made to it. The concluding clause of Article I of that treaty provided:

And the United States hereby renounces forever any liberty which was enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, or cure fish on or within 3 marine miles of any coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within the above limits.

I propose for one, having the treaty before us and knowing the steps that led to its formation, to discuss it as if it were a compact between myself and another gentleman. You can not escape responsibility in a transaction of this kind to deal with it in perfect fairness and candor. Now, let us analyze that treaty. We have the language here:

The United States renounces their fishing rights within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in North America.

To a plain man reading that language it would seem that it drew back the line from the coasts, where it had been fixed under the treaty of 1783; that it drew it back 3 marine miles from the coasts where there were no bays, no harbors, no creeks, and 3 marine miles from the creeks where there were creeks, and 3 marine miles from the harbors where there were harbors, and 3 marine miles from the bays where there were bays. Strike out or expunge the word "bays" and then see how it would read. It would read precisely as our friends insist it should read in order to support what they call the "American contention." It would read then:

The United States renounces any liberty, etc., within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, creeks, or harbors, etc.

But I insist that a construction which would be justified only by expunging important words from the sentence can not be maintained. But take a step further and look at the proviso; what does it say?

Provided, however, That the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays.

What bays? Evidently the bays referred to in the preceding sentence, and from which that sentence excludes our fishermen. Why insert a proviso conferring upon them the right to enter such bays for certain specific and limited purposes if they had already secured that right under the preceding sentence? Why insert the proviso declaring that American fishermen shall be permitted to enter such bays for specific purposes, unless they had already been excluded from them for all general purposes? Now, taking in a spirit of perfect frankness the clause of renunciation and proviso attached thereto, and giving to each word its ordinary and customary and usual meaning, the reasoning is as conclusive as any theorem in Euclid that the intent and effect of this part of the treaty was to exclude American fishermen from the bays in His Britannic Majesty's dominions, except for four specified purposes, for which the proviso declares they may enter such bays, and for no other purposes whatever. This argument is unanswerable and conclusive, and it would belittle the human reason to attempt to deny propositions that are as plain as the English language can make them.

But if anything were wanting to complete this argument to the satisfaction of every one who would agree that two and two make four, it will be found in the clause which declares that the American fishermen shall be under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein. (That is, in the bays.)

Now, if this were the end of the treaty there would not be the slightest ground to oppose the British contention or whereon to set up the American contention. But this is not the end of the treaty. If we look a little further we shall find a proviso that is full of significance. It says that American fishermen shall enter such bays or harbors for the purposes of shelter, for repairing damages therein, for purchasing wood and obtaining water, but for no other purposes whatever; but they shall be under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein, or in any other manner whatever abusing the privileges thereby reserved to them. Now, if a bay, like the Bay of Fundy, be held to be such a bay as under this proviso American fishermen may enter, or if under the "headland theory" which stretches a line from cape to cape, those great arms of the sea be meant that run out from 40 to 60 miles, how could a storm-driven vessel find shelter in any one of them? They afford no shelter, they are really parts of the high seas, they afford no water except salt water, nor wood, and vessels can not be repaired in them. No one of the four purposes for which American fishermen are permitted to enter such bays could be subserved in these great arms of the sea; the proviso would have to be expunged in order to maintain the extreme British contention, just as it would be necessary to expunge words in the clause of renunciation to maintain the extreme American contention. So I submit that here we have two contradictory constructions of this treaty, which may be maintained fairly and honestly.

If you apply the British contention to the Bay of Fundy, how can you reconcile it to the fact that there are other bays in that bay—to which of them does the language of the treaty apply, to the smaller bays around the coast of this great arm of the sea, or to the larger bay itself, the Bay of Fundy, comprehending all the others? And if you apply the extreme or partisam American contention, you must abolish all the bays, small and great, on the coast of the British provinces. It is evident that the provisions of this treaty are inexact, ambiguous, contradictory, conflicting, confusing, and that the only way in the world to arrive at a good understanding is for the two governments to agree upon some common interpretation that shall be just to both, and in which both may perhaps be called upon to make some slight concessions, some relinquishment of the exercise of their rights in favor of that concord and harmony which should exist between these two great peoples, leading the way for advancement of man and of civilization and of constitutional liberty. This has been what the present administration of the Government under President Cleveland and through Secretary Bayard has sought to accomplish.

But, with the indulgence of the Senate, I will invite attention to the discussion of the terms and provisions of this treaty, which has been for over seventy years a subject of controversy between the two governments. It is no new question, for it has received consideration at the hands of the most patriotic and eloquent statesmen who have ever been called into the service of the people of the United States. In the discussion of this question it may be well to bear in mind the definition which Mr. Webster has given us of a bay, for I can think of none better; a bay, as it is usually understood, is an arm or recess of the sea entering from the ocean between capes or headlands, and the terms apply equally to large and small tracts of water thus situated.

I pass over the elaborate correspondence of Mr. Upshur when Secretary of State, and Mr. Stevenson while minister to the court of St. James, and I move directly to consider the correspondence between Mr. Everett and the Earl of Aberdeen, while Mr. Everett was our minister to England, in 1844 and 1845, under the administrations of Presidents Tyler and Polk. It is hardly worth while that I should commend Edward Everett to the regard of Senators, for they will well recall his profound learning, his ripe scholarship, his enlightened statesmanship, and his patriotic devotion to his country, and his complete equipment as a diplomatist. His correspondence is marked by a tone of elevation and fairness that does credit to his character and to the country he represented, showing that while he felt allegiance to his country and zeal for its institutions, that it was not necessary for him to trample upon the obligations of honor and truth in order to serve it.

I ought at the outset perhaps to say, as is well known to Senators, that these occurrences and this correspondence took place after the act of George III, 59, 1819, after the passage of the act by the provincial government of Nova Scotia of 1836, by which all sorts of harassments and annoyances and limitations were placed upon American fishermen under the pretense of enforcing the terms of the treaty, establishing certain regulations and restrictions for American fishermen as may be necessary to prevent them from abusing the privileges reserved in the treaty. I invite attention to this correspondence because it discloses the construction which Mr. Everett places upon the treaty of 1818, as well as Lord Aberdeen's construction. I need not repeat the language of the treaty of 1818, as I have often had occasion to refer to it. The subject-matter of the correspondence was the seizure of the American fishing vessel Washington by officials of Nova Scotia in the Bay of Fundy, and of the fishing schooner Agnes off the banks of St. Ann, northeast of Cape Breton. Mr. Everett says:

Existing doubt as to the construction of the provision arises from the fact that a broad arm of the sea runs up to the northeast between the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. This arm of the sea being commonly called the Bay of Fundy, though not in reality possessing all the characters usually implied by the term "bay," has of late years been claimed by the provincial authorities of Nova Scotia to be included among "the coasts, bays, creeks, and harbors forbidden to American fishermen." An examination of the map is sufficient to show the doubtful nature of this construction.

It will be remarked here that Mr. Everett does not deny the construction or reject it. He expresses no resentment at it, like many of our friends on the other side do to-day. He simply says, "An examination of the map is sufficient to show the doubtful nature of the construction." He says further:

It was notoriously the object of the article of the treaty in question to put an end to the difficulties which had grown out of the operations of the fishermen from the United States along the coasts and upon the shores of the settled portion of the country, and for that purpose to remove their vessels to a distance not exceeding 3 miles from the same.

In estimating this distance the undersigned admits it to be the intent of the treaty, as it is reasonable, to have regard to the general line of the coast, and to consider its bays, creeks, and harbors, that is, the indentations usually so accounted, as included within that line. But the undersigned can not admit it to be reasonable, instead of thus following the general directions of the coast, to draw a line from the southwesternmost point of Nova Scotia to the termination of the northeastern boundary between the United States and New Brunswick, and to consider the arms of the sea, which will be cut off, and which can not on that line be less than 60 miles wide, as one of the bays on the coast from which American vessels are excluded. By this interpretation the fishermen of the United States would be shut out from the waters distant, not 3, but 30 miles from any of the colonial coast. The undersigned can not perceive that any assignable object of the restriction imposed by the convention of 1818 on the fishing privileges accorded to the citizens of the United States by the treaty of 1783 requires such a latitude of construction.

It is obvious that (by the terms of the treaty) the furthest distance to which fishing vessels of the United States are obliged to hold themselves from the colonial coasts and bays is 3 miles. But, owing to the peculiar configuration of these coasts, there is a succession of bays indenting the shores of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia within the Bay of Fundy. The vessels of the United States have a general right to approach all the bays in Her Majesty's dominions, within any distance not less than 3 miles, a privilege from the enjoyment of which they will be wholly excluded, in this part of the coast, if the broad arm of the sea which flows up between New Brunswick and Nova Scotia is itself to be considered one of the forbidden bays.

Lastly—and this consideration seems to put the matter beyond doubt—the construction set up by Her Majesty's colonial authorities would altogether nullify another, and that a most important stipulation of the treaty, about which there is no controversy, namely: The privilege reserved to the American fishing vessels of taking shelter and repairing damages in the bay within which they are forbidden to fish. There is, of course, no shelter nor means of repairing damages for a vessel entering the Bay of Fundy, in itself considered. It is necessary before relief or succor of any kind can be had to traverse that broad arm of the sea and reach the bays and harbors, properly so called, which indent the coast, and which are no doubt the bays and harbor referred to in the convention of 1818. The privilege of entering the latter in extremity of weather, reserved by the treaty, is of the utmost importance. It enables the fisherman, whose equipage is always very slender, to pursue his laborious occupation with comparative safety in the assurance that in one of the sudden and dangerous changes of weather so frequent and so terrible on this iron-bound coast he can take shelter in a neighboring and friendly port. To forbid him to approach within 30 miles of that port except for shelter in the extremity of weather is to forbid him to resort there for that purpose. It is keeping him at such a distance at sea as wholly to destroy the value of the privilege expressly reserved.

Thus it will be perceived that Mr. Everett takes substantially the very ground I have indicated, namely, that the "headland theory" finds no place in the treaty of 1818, and that those large bays, which are properly arms of the sea, are not included in the terms of that treaty as being bays from which American seamen are excluded, but he admits that the bays meant are the inner bays, or bays surrounded by the territory of the British provinces, the smaller bays within these large arms of the sea. He declares that in estimating the distance, the intent of the treaty is to have regard to the general lines of the coast, and to consider its bays, creeks, and harbors—that is, the indentations usually so accounted—as included within that line. On this line of delimitation, drawn by the hand of Edward Everett himself, the Bayard treaty has been formed. It is such a treaty as Mr. Everett would have approved; it is a treaty that finds its justification in the correspondence of Mr. Everett which I have quoted. He rejects the "headland theory," he denies that our fishermen are excluded from the great Bay of Fundy and others like it, and he says further to Lord Aberdeen in his letter of March 25, 1845, speaking for the United States:

While they have ever been prepared to admit that in the letter of one expression of that instrument there is some reason for claiming a right to exclude United States fishermen from the Bay of Fundy (it being difficult to deny to that arm of the sea the name of "bay" which long geographical usage has assigned to it), they have ever strenuously maintained that it is only on their own construction of the entire article that its known design in reference to the regulation of the fisheries admits of being carried into effect.

Again he says:

If Her Majesty's provincial authorities—

He is now speaking of the case of the Argus, a vessel seized 28 miles off the northeast coast of Cape Breton, between Cowhead and the northern cape of Cape Breton—are permitted to regard as a "bay" any portion of the sea which can be cut off by a direct line connecting two points of the coast, however destitute in other respects of the character usually implied by that name, not only will the waters on the northeastern coast of Cape Breton, but on many other parts of the shores of the Anglo-American dependencies where such exclusion has not yet been thought of, be prohibited to American fishermen. In fact, the waters which wash the entire southeastern coast of Nova Scotia, from Cape Sable to Cape Canso, a distance on a straight line of rather less than 300 miles, would in this way constitute a bay from which United States fishermen would be excluded.

Now, in reply to these contentions of Mr. Everett, Lord Aberdeen says:

The undersigned will confine himself to stating that after the most deliberate reconsideration of the subject, and with every desire to do full justice to the United States, and to view the claims put forward on behalf of the United States citizens in the most favorable light, Her Majesty's Government are nevertheless still constrained to deny the right of United States citizens under the treaty of 1818, to fish in that part of the Bay of Fundy which, from its geographical position, may properly be considered as included within the British possessions.

It has not yielded an inch; and this was in 1845:

Her Majesty's Government must still maintain, and in this view they are fortified by high legal authority, that the Bay of Fundy is rightfully claimed by Great Britain as a bay within the meaning of the treaty of 1818. And they equally maintain the position which was laid down in the note of the undersigned, dated the 15th of April last, that, with regard to the other bays on the British American coast, no United States fisherman has, under that convention, the right to fish within 3 miles of the entrance of such bays as designated by a line drawn from headland to headland at that entrance.

But, says Lord Aberdeen further on:

But while Her Majesty's Government still feel themselves bound to maintain these positions as a matter of right, they are nevertheless not insensible to the advantages which would accrue to both countries from a relaxation of the exercise of that right; to the United States as conferring a material benefit on their fishing trade, and to Great Britain and the United States, conjointly and equally, by the removal of a fertile source of disagreement between them.

Her Majesty's Government are also anxious, at the same time that they uphold the just claims of the British Crown, to evince by every reasonable concession their desire to act liberally and amicably towards the United States.

It will be perceived, therefore, from this correspondence that Mr. Everett denied emphatically the "headland theory," rejecting it in toto, denied also that the American fishermen were excluded from the Bay of Fundy, but admitted that upon a fair construction of the treaty of 1818 they were excluded from the bays or the indentations of the coast by the express words of the treaty itself. To use his own language:

In estimating this distance, I admit it to be the intent of the treaty, as it is itself reasonable to have regard to the general line of the coast, to consider its bays, creeks, and harbors, that is, the indentations usually so accounted as included within that line.

What Lord Aberdeen held to be a relaxation of the British right in favor of the fishermen of the United States in the Bay of Fundy Mr. Everett held not to be a concession, but the admission of a right of the American fishermen to enjoy fishing privileges in that bay. I find in this correspondence a letter from Mr. Everett to John C. Calhoun dated May 26, 1844, in which he starts out to discuss the instructions he had received from the State Department on the 10th of August, in the case of the Washington, a vessel belonging to the United States and seized for having been found in the Bay of Fundy. He notifies Mr. Calhoun that on the 15th ultimo the result of his inquiry was communicated in a note to Lord Aberdeen, which he transmits, together with a copy of his reply bearing date of 25th instant. He says:

I have endeavored to present the strong points of our case in a favorable light, and I can not doubt that the spirit and intent of the convention of 1818 are such as I have represented them to be in my answer to Lord Aberdeen. * * *

But here Mr. Everett's observations on the convention of 1818 are supplied by a series of asterisks which signify to us that the balance of this communication was not furnished at the call of the Senate by the executive department of the Government, and it still remains in the executive department. At the time these transactions were taking place the sessions of the Senate in consideration of the treaties were held in secret; now, by a majority, and a strict party vote, the Republicans of the Senate have, as they conceive, determined in the interest of the public welfare that all the facts bearing upon this ancient controversy between Great Britain and the United States should be made known to the people, and should be discussed in open session in order that the public judgment may be informed and that the action of the Senate upon this pending treaty may be justified by an enlightened public sentiment.

We were told a few days ago by the Senator from Delaware that he had this important communication from Mr. Everett while minister to the court of St. James to the honorable John C. Calhoun, Secretary of State, in which his views are given at length upon the true meaning of the convention, the terms and stipulations and provisos of the convention of 1818. He asked permission of the Senate to read it; a resolution to that effect was offered and was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and that committee has not been willing to report the resolution favorably or to permit the Senate to vote upon the proposition. It is, in fact, determined that we can not hear Mr. Everett upon this important and interesting subject, with which he was familiar, and upon which he had been called to take an important and responsible stand in behalf of the United States Government. Why shall not the people of the United States know what Edward Everett thought on this subject? Can it be that this accomplished statesman, this patriot and scholar, upheld the British contention? Can it be that he took the British side of this subject? Can it be that he was against Massachusetts and Maine and New England, by whom he had been long trusted and admired? Have you not sufficient confidence in him to allow him to give his testimony here in the presence of the Senate and the people of the United States? Will you permit him to rest under the imputation that he is a witness whom you are afraid to allow to speak? Is your cause so weak that you will not hear from his writings, the words which have survived him, but words, we know, of honor and truth? We have summoned into this presence, in order to get the benefit of their opinions and wisdom, the sages of our country from the earliest times up to to-day; we have invoked the testimony of John Adams, and of his son, not less renowned, John Quincy Adams; Benjamin Franklin, James Madison, James Monroe, John C. Calhoun, Gallatin, Rush, and Clay, but when we have desired to hear testimony of Edward Everett, of him who had been charged with the greatest transaction in regard to this treaty of 1818, we are told by the Republicans in the Senate that he can not be heard, that he must remain as dumb as if he had never lived nor given an hour of his life to the service of his country. It will be well for the fishermen, well for the people of Maine and Massachusetts and the people of the whole country to know what were his matured views and convictions upon this matter which is now the subject of controversy between the Government of the United States and the Government of Great Britain, and which the executive department of the United States Government has endeavored to adjust in an honorable and satisfactory manner by the pending treaty. Can it be that Mr. Everett has in this correspondence with the Government laid down the very lines upon which this treaty proceeds? Can it be that he has recommended a convention like that which assembled here last winter, and that the Secretary of State, Mr. Bayard, finds himself, in the conduct of this negotiation, walking side by side with Edward Everett? Let us hear from Edward Everett, or let some Republican Senator tell us why this correspondence, which is now in the desk of the Senator from Delaware, should not be read to the Senate. Can Republican Senators be afraid of the truth, of its crushing force and its effect upon the mind and conscience of the people of the United States? Would they suppress it in order to gain a party advantage in a crisis like this, and on a subject fraught with such immense interest and responsibility?

We can not, therefore, hear anything further from Mr. Everett than that which I have already taken from the correspondence which has been furnished us between himself and Lord Aberdeen, and which in itself justifies the pending treaty. But this was far from being an end of the matter. The treaty of 1818 has been under consideration and controversy for seventy years, and after Mr. Everett's time this contention assumed an acute form under Mr. Fillmore's administration. It will be remembered that Daniel Webster was Secretary of State and that interferences with American fishermen by the provincial authorities and the disposition of the British Government to send war vessels to the scene of disturbance created quite an excitement in the United States. Mr. Webster had gone to his home in Massachusetts in ill health, and in the midst of the excitement he addressed a circular to the American fishermen warning them to keep inside of their rights under the treaty of 1818, and wrote to Mr. Crampton, then British minister to Washington, under date of July 17, 1852, a letter in which he informs Mr. Crampton of his desire that he, Mr. Crampton, should visit him in Boston, at the Revere House, or at Marshfield, his residence; that he had recommended to the President that the whole subject of the fisheries and the Canada trade should be taken up at once as matters for negotiation. He informed Mr. Crampton that he had inserted an official communication in the Boston papers and hoped Mr. Crampton would prevail upon the provincial authorities to institute no hostile proceedings against American fishing vessels until they could confer together on the subject.

A debate occurred in the Senate thirty-six years ago this month, in which Mr. Webster's position was arraigned. Senator Soulé, of Louisiana, whose reputation as an orator of picturesque and dramatic power, and whose high and chivalrous bearing and public services are still gratefully remembered by the people of Louisiana, addressed the Senate on August 12, 1852, when he employed the following language, after setting up the contention of Great Britain:

Is England right? If we trust the Secretary of State in the view which he takes of her claims, it would seem as if the terms, the letter of the treaty, were on her side. This Mr. Webster most peremptorily admits, while others but debate it upon mere technicalities of language.

Mr. Webster says that "it was undoubtedly an oversight in the convention of 1818 to make so large a concession to England, since the United States had usually considered that these vast inlets or recesses of the ocean ought to be open to American fishermen, as free as the sea itself, to within 3 miles of the shore." Here the whole is surrendered; there is no escape from the admission. It was an oversight to make so large a concession to England! The concession was then made, was it not? If so, the dispute is at an end; and yet, even then, it were a hard task to justify the summary process through which England has sought to compel us to compliance with the concession, particularly as she had, to say the least of it, suffered our fishermen to haunt the Bay of Fundy, by express allowance, in 1844, and to make their haunting other bays rightful, by a continuous, open, and public employment of them, ever since the convention of 1818. But to this I shall presently revert.

"The precise words of the treaty," says my friend from Maine [Mr. Hamlin], in the remarkable speech he delivered the other day, "may at first view seem to carry that construction;" but he denies immediately that the construction be correct; and so does the distinguished Senator from Michigan, who has shed so much light on this controversy, and handled with so rare a dexterity all the questions of secondary right arising under the treaty of 1818.

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Davis] grants that, "by the terms of the treaty, American fishermen are excluded from the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks," etc. "The British Government," says he, "raise a question of construction, namely, that we can not fish within 3 miles of any of these bays: that we are excluded to a distance of 3 miles not only from the coasts, but also from the bays, including in that term the Bay of Fundy and other larger bays."

It will thus be seen that Mr. Soulé held that Mr. Webster had given up the American side of the question. Mr. Soulé adopted the view which you will find laid down by the older writers, and especially by the Latin and continental authorities living in small countries, as, for instance, Galliani, Hubner, Vattel, Azuni, and Grotius, all of whom concurred in assigning the 3-mile limit to maritime jurisdiction, as in those days that was the extreme range at which cannon were effective. The rule of the law was, Terræ dominium finitur ubi finitur armorum vis. He illustrated this position by citations from the treaty between Tuscany and France and Russia and Austria in the last century. Senator Cass held similar views. He insisted upon the extreme American ground that our rights were limited to 3 miles from the shores inside the bays. Senator Butler, of South Carolina, was more circumspect. He held that the question must be settled by the determination of what the bay was, and he confessed that the subject was full of difficulties and doubts, though he was inclined to believe that we were excluded by the terms from British bays, unless we had derived the right by prescriptive use and by acquiescence of the British Government in such use. He rather took issue with Senators Soulé and Cass. Senator Seward defended Mr. Webster and the administration. It had been intimated that Mr. Webster was not zealous enough in the defense of American fishing rights, and he said in reply:

Sir, it has been complained by the honorable Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Soulé] that Mr. Webster conceded too much in his official notice of July 6, 1851. Now, here is Mr. Webster's language. After quoting the treaty, he says:

"It would appear that, by a strict and rigid construction of this article, fishing vessels of the United States are precluded from entering into the bays," etc.

And, in the same connection, he adds:

"It was undoubtedly an oversight in the convention of 1818 to make so large a concession to England."

That is to say, it was an oversight to use language in that convention which, by a strict and rigid construction, might be made to yield the freedom of the great bays.

"It is then a question of mere verbal criticism. The Secretary does not admit that the rigorous construction is the just and true one. And so he does not admit that there is any concession in the sense of the term which the honorable Senator adopts. Now, other honorable Senators, if I recollect aright—and particularly that very accurate and exceedingly strong-minded Senator, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Davis]—conceded that the treaty would bear this rigorous construction, insisting nevertheless, just as the Secretary of State did, that it was a forced and unjust one. The Senator from Louisiana dissents from him and other Senators, and maintains that it will not bear that construction at all; because he says that the other portions of the convention show that the 'bays' described must be bays within the British dominions. He adds that in order to bring a bay within the dominion of any power it must be such that its passage to the sea shall not exceed 6 miles in width, and that the shores on both sides belong to the power claiming dominion over the water. I can not assent to the force of this argument of the honorable Senator from Louisiana. I am the more inclined to go against it because I believe it is getting pretty late in the day to find the Secretary of State wrong in the technical and legal construction of an instrument.

Let us test the argument. The honorable Senator says that where the Government occupies both sides of the coast, and where the strait through which the waters of the bay flow into the ocean is not more than 6 miles wide, then there is dominion over it.

Now, then, the Gut of Canso is a most indispensable communication for our fishermen from the Atlantic Ocean to the Northumberland Straits and to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, for a reason which any one will very readily see by referring to the map; yet the Gut of Canso is only three-quarters of a mile wide. I should be sorry to adopt an argument which Great Britain might turn against us to exclude us from that important passage.

Again I recall the honorable Senator's argument, namely:

"Two things unite to give a country dominion over an inland sea. The first is, that the land on both sides must be within the dominion of the Government claiming jurisdiction, and then that the strait is not more than 6 miles wide; but that if the strait is more than 6 miles wide no such jurisdiction can be claimed."

Now, sir, this argument seems to me to prove too much. I think it would divest the United States of the harbor of Boston, all the land around which belongs to Massachusetts or the United States, while the mouth of the bay is 6 miles wide. It would surrender our dominion over Long Island Sound, a dominion which I think the State of New York and the United States would not willingly give up. It would surrender Delaware Bay; it would surrender, I think, Albemarle Sound and the Chesapeake Bay; and I believe it would surrender the Bay of Monterey, and perhaps the Bay of San Francisco, on the Pacific coast.

Mr. Seward's views were in direct opposition to the opinions of those who now insist that undue concessions have been made in the pending treaty, for the provisions of this treaty are in entire accord with the line of policy indicated by Mr. Seward himself in the Senate, and it is interesting to note that when he was Secretary of State (1866), fourteen years after, when the reciprocity treaty of 1854 had expired, he sought to make a treaty of interpretation precisely like this treaty and gave his instructions to Mr. Adams, our minister to the court of St. James, which are almost in the identical language of the instructions drawn up by Mr. Bayard for the guidance of the commissioners to form the pending treaty. They are embraced in the following protocol:

DRAUGHT PROTOCOL COMMUNICATED BY MR. ADAMS TO THE EARL OF CLARENDON IN 1866.

Whereas in the first article of the convention between the United States and Great Britain, concluded and signed in London on the 26th of October, 1818, it was declared that—

"The United States hereby renounce, forever, any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, or cure fish on or within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, not included within certain limits heretofore mentioned."

And whereas differences have arisen in regard to the extent of the abovementioned renunciation, the Government of the United States and Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain, being equally desirous of avoiding further misunderstanding, have agreed to appoint, and do hereby authorize the appointment of, a mixed commission for the following purposes, namely:

1. To agree upon and define, by a series of lines, the limits which shall separate the exclusive from the common right of fishery, on the coasts and in the seas adjacent, of the British North American colonies, in conformity with the first article of the convention of 1818. The said lines to be regularly numbered, duly described, and also clearly marked on charts prepared in duplicate for the purpose.

2. To agree upon and establish such regulations as may be necessary and proper to secure to the fishermen of the United States the privilege of entering bays and harbors for the purpose of shelter, and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood, and of obtaining water; and to agree upon and establish such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent the abuse of the privilege reserved by said convention to fishermen of the United States.

3. To agree upon and recommend the penalties to be adjudged, and such proceedings and jurisdiction as may be necessary to secure a speedy trial and judgment with as little expense as possible, for the violation of rights and the transgression of the limits and restrictions which may be hereby adopted.

Provided, however, that the limits, restrictions, and regulations which may be agreed upon by the said commission shall not be final, nor have any effect, until so jointly confirmed and declared by the United States and Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain, either by treaty or by laws mutually acknowledged and accepted by the President of the United States, by and with the consent of the Senate, and by Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain.

Pending a different arrangement on the subject, the United States Government engages to give all proper orders to officers in its employment; and Her Britannic Majesty's Government engages to instruct the proper colonial or other British officers to abstain from hostile acts against British and United States fishermen respectively.

The efforts of Mr. Webster at negotiation failed, but were afterwards matured in the treaty of 1854, made by Mr. Marcy in Pierce's administration, by which reciprocity was established between the two countries. Our commercial relations and trade under this treaty steadily multiplied and prospered. Secretary Manning in his letter to the House of Representatives dated January 5, 1887, says:

That reciprocity treaty was in force till 1866, a period covering our civil war. Under its influence the aggregate interchange of commodities between ourselves and the inhabitants of all the British provinces—numbering not as many as those of the State of New York—rose from an annual average of a little over $14,000,000 in the previous eight years to over thirty-three and a quarter millions in gold in 1855, to nearly fifty millions in 1856, and to eighty-four millions in the last year of its existence. During the thirteen years the British provinces, according to their official returns, purchased from us articles valued at over $359,500,000 in gold, and we bought from them one hundred and ninety-seven millions, thus making an international traffic of nearly $556,500,000 on a gold valuation. I can but think that if that treaty of 1854 had remained in force till this day, the two peoples—divided by a boundary line which can only with difficulty be discerned from the Arctic Ocean to the Pacific, from the Pacific to Lake Superior, and from Lake Ontario to the Atlantic—would now be one people, at least for all purposes of production, trade, and business.

When this treaty was terminated in 1866, we were again plunged into all sorts of difficulties. The Republican party in 1870 changed the tariff so as to admit fresh fish from Canada free of duty. But this did not solve the diplomatic problem. The administration of President Grant under the premiership of Mr. Hamilton Fish sought to compose the strife and restore harmony to our distracted relations with Canada and the British Government. Mr. Fish in 1871 instructed our negotiators on behalf of the Government that this class of questions might be adjusted either—

First—

By agreeing upon the terms upon which the whole of the reserved fishing grounds may be thrown open to American fishermen, which might be accompanied by a repeal of the obnoxious laws and the abrogation of the disputed reservation as to ports, harbors, etc.; or, failing that—by agreeing upon the construction of the disputed renunciation, upon the principles upon which the line should be run by a joint commission to exhibit the territory from which the American fishermen are to be excluded.

Second—

It may be, also—

well to consider whether it should be further agreed that the fish taken in the waters open to both nations shall be admitted free of duty into the United States and the British North American colonies.

Now, we have in 1871, Hamilton Fish proposing the very plan that Mr. Seward had suggested, and which will be found in the protocol which I have already quoted, conveying his instructions to Mr. Adams, our minister in London in 1866. It is either the Seward and Bayard plan and policy to agree upon a common interpretation of the treaty of 1818 for the regulation of our rights and liberties under that treaty, or to establish as the alternative free trade in fish. The latter plan was adopted by the commission. Who were our plenipotentiaries that made that treaty? Not one of them was from the country south of the Potomac. General Grant was President, Hamilton Fish was Secretary of State, and one of the plenipotentiaries was General Robert Schenck; the others were Mr. Justice Nelson, of the Supreme Court, Mr. George H. Williams, of Oregon, and Hon. E. R. Hoar, of Massachusetts.

They not only opened our markets for free fish from Canada, but they left the question of the difference in value between our open markets and the value of the inshore fisheries of the British provinces to arbitration, and our Government was condemned by the Halifax award to pay a sum of $5,500,000. That treaty was terminated in 1885. We have not heard a word said in this debate against it or its negotiators. It is not denounced as a surrender, nor does it attract the wrath and censure of the Senators from Maine or Massachusetts or New Hampshire. We are again plunged into the difficulties that arise whenever the reciprocity treaties have been terminated, and we are remanded now to the treaty of 1818 with all conflicting and confusing clauses and provisos.

I have endeavored to set forth the views that John Quincy Adams took of our fishing interests after his return from the English mission to assume the responsibility of the Secretaryship of State. I have also striven to show what the commissioners, Messrs. Gallatin and Rush, accomplished according to their own report by the treaty of 1818. I have endeavored to show how the terms and provisions of that treaty were construed by Edward Everett in his correspondence with the Earl of Aberdeen, and how Mr. Seward construed them when he came to defend Mr. Webster's policy in respect to the fishing interests.

I have also endeavored to make known how these difficulties were treated under Mr. Pierce's administration by Mr. Marcy, and how they were again disposed of under President Grant's administration by Mr. Fish and the distinguished negotiators who were associated with him. It is evident that the only resource which our Government has hitherto found, has been in reciprocity treaties, and that all efforts have failed to obtain a common and satisfactory interpretation of the clauses and provisions of the treaty of 1818.

But I think it must be clear that all these statesmen who were charged with the practical settlement of the question concurred in the opinion that the headland theory was inadmissible, that they were not excluded from the large bays, like the Bay of Fundy, but were shut out by the provisions of that treaty from all bays along the coasts of the British provinces that were clearly within the indentations of the shores, by the terms of the treaty except for the four purposes set forth therein.

But while these are the views of our diplomatists and public men, called upon by the positions they occupied to make the best defense possible of American interests, and to enforce them with all the vigor and ability of which they were capable, there is another class of men, writers upon international law, publicists, who speak not for this nation, or for that, but who hold up before the world the scales of justice and strive to make for all people a standard for the determination of their natural rights and their international obligations. Their views may not be enforced by cabinets or by courts or on battle-fields, but they find an echo in the conscience of all enlightened public men, under whatever government, and should find a supporter in every one who serves the government of a free people like this—a government ordained to establish justice, without orders or classes, a government intended to uphold the weak against the strong, and to exert, along with this power, its benevolence also. This Government can not afford to commit an injustice against a weak or a powerful nation, because it will suffer more from such an act of wrong than the people upon whom it may be inflicted.

What do these writers say? We have not been permitted to hear the testimony of Edward Everett, for the Republican majority in this Senate has declared that he should not be heard, and his views are stored away in the archives of the Government; but there is another son of New England not less distinguished than Mr. Everett for his high personal character and wide learning, and above all, for his conscientious devotion to the truth. I speak of Dr. Theodore D. Woolsey, president of Yale College, who has written a work on international law. It affords me pleasure to refer to this eminient publicist, for I had the honor in my youth to attend the college over which he presided, and it is my alma mater, for which, during the vicissitudes of many long years, I have ever entertained the profoundest reverence and affection. Here we have the views of an American scholar not actuated by any purpose to make the worse appear the better cause, not constrained or bound by any pressure of party, but drawing out of the past all its wealth of learning, and looking forward to the future with the kindest solicitude for the peace and welfare of all nations. He tells us what the territory of the state is. He says:

First, that the territory of a state includes all that portion of terra firma which lies within the boundaries of a state as well as the waters, that is, the interior seas, lakes, and rivers wholly contained within the same lines.

Second. The mouths of rivers, bays, and estuaries furnishing access to the land.

Third. The seacoast to the distance of a marine league. This is the regulation dictated by the necessities of self-protection as is expressed in the maxim of Bynkershoek, "Terræ potestas finitur ubi finitur armorum vis."

And he says, "As the range of cannon is increasing, and their aim becoming more perfect, it might be thought that the sea-line of territory ought to widen. But the point is not likely to become one of any great importance."

Again, Dr. Woolsey declares that "the right of all nations to the use of the high sea being the same, their right to fish upon the high seas, or on banks and shoal places in them, is equal. The right to fish in bays and mouths of rivers depends on the will of the sovereign."

Mr. Wheaton says:

The maritime territory of every state extends to the ports, harbors, bays, mouths of rivers, and adjacent parts of the sea inclosed by headlands belonging to the same state. The general usage of nations superadds to this extent of territorial jurisdiction a distance of a marine league, or as far as a cannon shot will reach from the shore, along all the coasts of the state. Within these limits its rights of property and territorial jurisdiction are absolute, and exclude those of every other nation.

Chancellor Kent says:

Considering the great extent of the line of the American coast we have a right to claim for fiscal and defensive regulations a liberal extension of maritime jurisdiction; and it would not be unreasonable, as I apprehend, to assume, for domestic purposes connected with our safety and welfare, the control of the waters on our coasts, though included within lines stretching from quite distant headlands, as, for instance, from Cape Ann to Cape Cod, and from Nantucket to Montauk Point, and from that point to the capes of the Delaware, and from the south cape of Florida to the Mississippi. It is certain that our Government would be disposed to view with some uneasiness and sensibility, in the case of war between other maritime powers, the use of the waters of our coasts, far beyond the reach of cannon-shot, as cruising ground for belligerent purposes. In 1793 our Government thought they were entitled, in reason, to as broad a margin of protected navigation as any nation whatever, though at that time they did not positively insist beyond the distance of a marine league from the seashores; and in 1806 our Government thought it would not be unreasonable, considering the extent of the United States, the shoalness of their coasts, and the natural indication furnished by the well-defined half of the Gulf Stream, to expect an immunity from belligerent warfare for the space between that limit and the American shore. It ought, at least, to be insisted that the extent of the neutral immunity should correspond with the claims maintained by Great Britain around her own territory, and that no belligerent right should be exercised within "the chambers formed by headlands, or anywhere at sea within the distance of 4 leagues, or from a right line from one headland to another."

Thus we see that our most distinguished writer extends our maritime jurisdiction, not to 6 miles, nor within the bays of our coasts, but adopts in all of its vigor the headland theory. It will be remembered that our Government in a controversy with France that arose about the seizure of the ship Orange within the capes of Delaware in 1793, held that Delaware Bay was entirely within our territorial jurisdiction, and defended its claims upon the authority which admitted that the arms of the sea, and channels, and bays belonged to the sovereign by whose territory they were encompassed.

We have seen what some of the publicists of our country thought of this subject, and I might add other authorities to those from whom I have already quoted, but I do not feel justified on this sultry August day in taxing the patience of the Senate with further quotations. We find that our leading writers all admitted that the jurisdiction of nations extends over the bays in their coasts, and I have here an interesting decision from the highest court of England in which the question of the territorial domination arose.

It is the case of the Direct United States Cable Company (limited), and the Anglo-American Telegraph Company (limited), and the New York, Newfoundland, and London Telegraph Company, consolidated, etc., on appeal from the supreme court of Newfoundland, from the "Law Reports" second appeal cases, 1876–1877, before the House of Lords, and the judicial committee of Her Majesty's most honorable privy council, the case of the Direct United States Cable Company vs. Anglo-American Telegraph Company, pages 420, 421.

Mr. Benjamin appeared among the counsel for the respondents, and his high position at the bar entitles his views upon this question to close consideration. He says the point in question, that is, Conception Bay, on the western coast of Newfoundland—

The point in question is as much the part of Newfoundland as if it were dry land. The 3-mile rule is not applicable to this case, for in the case of a bay like this, distinctly formed by well-marked headlands, its arc and waters fall within that territorial jurisdiction which includes its shores. Conception Bay is a bay in the sense in which that word is used by writers on international law when they lay down the rule that the jurisdiction of the sovereign of the territory extends over bays. * * * All authorities concur that "parts of the sea" may be subject to territorial jurisdiction, and that bays and estuaries are parts of the sea. * * *

It is true that in the fishery treaty of 1839 between Great Britain and France, the bays in which exclusive rights of fishery were maintained were limited to those not exceeding 10 miles in width at the opening. But even that is, at all events, a considerable extension of the limitation here contended for of 3 miles from the shore.

Lord Blackburn delivered the judgment of the court for their lordships, and I invite your attention to the following extract from the decision of this eminent jurist. He said:

It does not appear to their lordships that jurists and text writers are agreed what are the rules as to dimensions and configuration, which, apart from other considerations, would lead to the conclusion that a bay is or is not a part of the territory of the state possessing the adjoining coasts; and it has never, that they can find, been made the ground of any judicial determination. If it were necessary in this case to lay down a rule the difficulty of the task would not deter their lordships from attempting to fulfill it. But in their opinion it is not necessary to do so. It seems to them that, in point of fact, the British Government has for a long period exercised dominion over this bay, and that their claim has been acquiesced in by other nations, so as to show that the bay has been for a long time occupied exclusively by Great Britain, a circumstance which in the tribunals of any country would be very important. And moreover (which in a British tribunal is conclusive) the British legislature has by acts of Parliament declared it to be part of the British territory and part of the country made subject to the Legislature of Newfoundland.

To establish this proposition it is not necessary to go further back than to the 59th George III, chapter 38, passed in 1819, now nearly sixty years ago.

There was a convention made in 1818 between the United States and Great Britain relating to the fisheries of Labrador, Newfoundland, and His Majesty's other possessions in North America, by which it was agreed that the fishermen of the United States should have the right to fish on part of the coasts (not including the part of the island of Newfoundland on which Conception Bay lies), and should not enter any "bays" on any part of the coast except for the purposes of shelter and repairing damages, and purchasing wood and obtaining water, and no other purposes whatever. It seems impossible to doubt that this convention applied to all bays, whether large or small, on the coast, and consequently to Conception Bay. It is true that the convention would only bind the two nations who were parties to it, and consequently that, though a strong assertion of ownership on the part of Great Britain, acquiesced in by so powerful a state as the United States, the convention, though weighty, is not decisive. But the act already referred to, 59 George III, chapter 38, though passed chiefly for the purpose of giving effect to the convention of 1818, goes further. It enacts not merely that subjects of the United States shall observe the restrictions agreed on by the convention, but that all persons not being natural-born subjects of the King of Great Britain shall observe them under penalties. And in particular, by section 4, it enacts that if "any person" upon being required by the governor, or any officer acting under such governor, in the execution of any order or instructions from His Majesty in council, shall inter alia refuse to depart from such bays, he shall be subject to a penalty of £200.

No stronger assertion of exclusive dominion over these bays could well be framed. As has been already observed, Conception Bay is in every sense of the words a bay within Newfoundland, though of considerable width, and as there is nothing to justify a construction of the act limiting it to bays not exceeding any particular width, this is an unequivocal assertion of the British legislature of exclusive dominion over this bay as part of the British territory. And as this assertion of dominion has not been questioned by any nation from 1819 down to 1872, when a fresh convention was made, this would be very strong in the tribunals of any nation to show that this bay is by prescription part of the exclusive territory of Great Britain. As already observed, in a British tribunal it is decisive.

By the treaty of Washington it was agreed by the thirty-second article that certain provisions should extend to "the colony of Newfoundland so far as they are applicable. But if the Imperial Parliament, the Legislature of Newfoundland, or the Congress of the United States should not embrace Newfoundland in their laws for carrying the foregoing articles into effect, then this article shall be of no effect."

I quote this decision, not because it can have any authority with us as such, but because the reasons and arguments will have weight with every candid and just man. This decision was delivered in 1877, and is therefore a recent exposition of the learning and law on this subject of maritime jurisdiction by the highest court of England. We have had, I believe, no case before the Supreme Court of the United States in which this question has been directly raised and settled.

Now we have put ourselves in possession of the history of the transactions respecting the fishing question from the beginning up to the present time, and have noted the contentions of our diplomatists, and the part taken by our Government. We have also taken note of the notions and views of the British Government as expressed through her diplomatists. We find we have been traveling in a circle, and that we stand to-day just where we stood seventy years ago. We see that every effort to agree upon an interpretation of the treaty of 1818 has proved futile. We discover that whenever the controversy has become sharp, that the resort of the American and British Governments has been to form a reciprocity treaty.

The greater part of the fish coming in now from Canada is fresh fish, which the Republican party placed on the free-list in 1870, and the revenue derived from the importation of salt fish from Canada is a trifling matter. In 1886 it amounted to $297,000 in round numbers, and in 1887 to $345,000 in round numbers. The Canadian interests to be accommodated by reciprocity are really insignificant, and the bounty that our own fishermen receive from the tariff tax on fish from Canada is very small.

I say to the Senators from the Northeastern States that they must perceive that the tendency of things has been and will continue steadily in the direction of reciprocity, and I venture to assert that if this treaty be defeated, a reciprocity treaty sooner or later will be substituted for it. I for one would feel disposed to vote a subsidy or bounty to our fishermen in those northeastern waters, for I believe that this vast field for food supply is just beginning to be developed and known, and that its ultimate resources are greater than any one has imagined. According to Professor Baird's estimate the number of persons employed in our fisheries in 1880 was 131,426, of whom 101,684 were Americans. The fisheries of New England employed 37,043 men, the South Atlantic States 52,418, the Middle States 14,981, the Pacific States and Territories 16,803. The value of the fisheries of the sea, the great rivers, and great lakes was over $43,000,000. But it would be interesting to turn aside for a moment and to consider what a world of wealth there is in the sea; how much richer it is in food supply for the human race than the dry land itself. And I hope I may be pardoned if I read on this point from the interesting paper furnished by Hon. Robert J. Walker to Mr. Seward under date of April 24, 1868.

He said:

But there are other most important considerations connected with extended coasts and great fisheries. The fisheries are capable of furnishing more and cheaper food than the land.

The reasons are—

1. The ocean surface is nearly four times that of the land, the area being 145,000,000 square miles of ocean surface to 52,000,000 of land.

2. The ocean everywhere produces fish, from the equator to the pole, the profusion of submarine animals increasing as you go north up to a point but 433 miles from the pole and believed to extend there, whereas, in consequence of mountains, deserts, and the temperature of the surface of the earth in very high latitudes, less than half its surface can be cultivated so as to produce food in any appreciable quantities.

3. The temperature of the ocean, in high latitudes, being much warmer than that of the land surface, there is increased profusion of submarine animal life, especially in the Arctic and Atlantic Seas, where, on account of extreme cold, the land surface produces no food. In warm latitudes the deep-sea temperature diminishes with the depth, until a certain point, below which it maintains an equable temperature of 40° Fahrenheit. The temperature of the ocean in latitude 70° (many degrees warmer than the land surface) is the same in all depths. There are wonderful provisions for the multiplication of animal life in the ocean, and it moderates both heat and cold. These are additional reasons in favor of the existence of a Polar Sea, filled with a far greater profusion of submarine animal life than any other seas, and, as a consequence, possessing far the best fisheries. Indeed, as fish progress northward, on account of the better ocean temperature there, as also because the marine food there is more abundant, there can be little doubt that the open Polar Sea will furnish fisheries of incredible value.

4. The ocean produces food in all latitudes for the support of animal submarine life. These are squid (the principal food of the whale), also abundance of nutritious sea-grasses, etc., upon which the fish feed. Besides, as the earth is more and more cultivated, and farms, as well as towns and cities, drained by creeks and rivers to the seas, the submarine food is correspondingly augmented. Even in mid-ocean the phosphorescence observed there is produced by the presence in the water of myriads of living animals.

5. Whilst the earth produces food by plowing its surface only a few inches deep, the ocean supplies myriads of fish, tier on tier, thousands of fathoms deep. Thus, the registered take of herrings in the Scotch fisheries, in 1861, was 900,000,000, whilst that of Norway, in the latitude of Iceland and Greenland, was far greater.

Perhaps, however, the main reason why the ocean produces so much more food for man than the land is, that while land animals only give birth to one or two of their young at a time, some fish produce millions of ova, to be matured into life. Thus a female cod has been found to contain 3,400,000 ova; and other fish ova varying from several millions to 35,000. Hence, the vast success attending the increased production of fish by transfer, by sowing the spawn, and other methods known to ichthyology.

All efforts to agree upon a common interpretation of the treaty of 1818, as I say, have failed. We have before us to-day in the Bayard treaty the very first instance in the history of the country where a successful attempt has been made by the executive department of the Government to come to an understanding with Great Britain in respect to the meaning of the treaty of 1818. It must be borne in mind that this is not an original treaty based upon a comprehensive treatment of the whole question. It does not attempt to deal with our commercial relations with Canada; it does not propose to change the revenue system of the two countries, for this is beyond the scope of the treaty-making power unless concurred in by the Congress of the United States. It undertakes to define with precision what the treaty of 1818—that is, what rights and liberties it guaranties to our American fishermen, and it draws a line carefully around the bays and waters from which they are excluded. It regulates the restrictions which that treaty imposed upon our fishermen as a guard against their abuse of the privileges that it affords. Above all, it secures to our fishermen the right to buy the needful supplies on all occasions in the ports and harbors. It secures to us transit through the Straits of Canso; it carefully guards our rights within the precise terms of the treaty of 1818; in a word, so far as I know and believe, this Bayard treaty frees the American fishermen from every annoyance that they complain of, and guaranties to them every right and liberty that they are justly entitled to under the treaty of 1818. Take John Quincy Adams's letter, which I have quoted already, and in which he proposes to give up all our fishing rights "within the British jurisdiction generally," to secure permanent fishing rights on a small part of Newfoundland and Labrador; take the letter of our commissioners, Messrs. Gallatin and Rush, which I have also quoted, and in which they give their construction of the treaty they had just made; take the treaty of 1818 itself:

Take Mr. Everett's view as far as we have been permitted to disclose it to the people of this country; take Mr. Webster's, Mr. Seward's views, and those of Senator Hamlin, of Maine, and Senator Davis, of Massachusetts; take the law as laid down by Dr. Woolsey, Dr. Wheaton, and Chancellor Kent; take the settlement made by President Pierce and Mr. Marcy, and the policy pursued by President Grant, Mr. Fish, and then scan carefully the provisions of the Bayard treaty, and ask yourselves whether that treaty is not more favorable to American interests than the distinguished Americans whom I have quoted would have demanded, or than the conventions which have been completed by the different administrations of the Government could possibly justify?

It is alleged that the Bayard treaty, in excluding American fishermen from the smaller bays which are clearly within the British jurisdiction, and by not providing specially for the right of purchasing bait in Canadian ports, gave up essential American interests; and, yet, I find that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], on January 19, 1887, submitted a report in which it is held that the inshore interests amounted to very little after all. I quote from this report:

From the investigations made by the committee during the last summer and fall, and as the result of the great mass of testimony taken by it and herewith returned, the committee believe it to be clear, beyond all dispute, that the right to fish within 3 miles of the Dominion shores is of no practical advantage whatever to American fishermen. The cod and halibut fishing has been for many years almost entirely carried on at long distances from the shores, in the deep waters, on banks, etc.; and it is believed that were there absolute liberty for Americans to fish, without restriction or regulation of any kind, within 3 miles of the Dominion shores, no such fishermen would ever think of going there for the purpose of catching cod or halibut.

As regards the obtaining of bait for this class of fishing, the testimony taken by the committee in its inquiries clearly demonstrates that there is no necessity whatever for American fishermen to resort to Canadian waters for that purpose. Clam bait is found in immense quantities in our own waters, and there have been instances, so frequent and continuous as to amount to a habit, of the Canadians themselves resorting to American waters or ports for the purpose of obtaining it. The squid bait is found on the very banks where the fishing goes on. So that the instances would be extremely rare when any American fishing vessel would wish to resort to a Dominion port for the purpose of buying bait for this kind of fishing.

It was also proved before the committee that, with the rarest exception, it would be absolutely injurious to the pecuniary interests of all concerned for American vessels to resort to Dominion ports or waters, except in need or distress, for the time taken in such departures from the cod and halibut grounds, or from direct sailing to and from them, is so great that, with or without the difference of port expenses, time and money are both lost in such visits.

In respect of the mackerel fishery the committee finds, as will be seen from the evidence referred to, that its course and methods have of late years entirely changed. While it used to be carried on by vessels fishing with hook and line, and sometimes near the shores, it is now almost entirely carried on by the use of immense seines, called purse-seines, of great length and descending many fathoms into the water. This gear is very expensive, and a fishing vessel does not usually carry more than one or two. The danger of fishing near the shore with such seines is so great, on account of striking rocks and reefs, that it is regarded as extremely hazardous ever to undertake it. Besides this, the large schools of mackerel, to the taking of which this great apparatus is best adapted, are almost always found more than 3 miles from land, either in great bays and gulfs or entirely out at sea.

I read recently the remarks of Mr. Ellis, a member of the Canadian Parliament from New Brunswick, in which he states the list of concessions made to American fishermen by the Canadians, and I call the attention of Senators to them:

SUMMARY OF WHAT OUR FISHERMEN GAIN BY THE TREATY.

In the debate in the Canadian House of Commons on this treaty Mr. Ellis, of New Brunswick, enumerated this list of concessions made by the Canadian Government:

1. We have by the very act of making this treaty receded from the position maintained so long in practice, that Canada and Great Britain could impose their own interpretations upon the meaning of the treaty of 1818, thus enlarging the restrictions of that treaty. By doing this we have given the United States a precedent upon which to base new demands for the amelioration of the regulations applied to their fishing vessels should the need arise.
2. We have almost wholly abandoned the contention that fishing vessels are a class by themselves, and therefore not entitled to any commercial privileges.
3. We entirely and forever abandoned the 3-mile headland theory.
4. We forever admit the right of United States fishermen to navigate the Strait of Canso.
5. We no longer compel American fishing vessels to depart from our shores in twenty-four hours after arrival.
6. We relieve them from the obnoxious operations of customs regulations enforced against them as fishing vessels, and which were specially severe, as the true intent of these laws was to regulate commercial trading only.
7. We free them from harbor, pilotage, and other duties, which are sometimes inhospitably and often capriciously imposed upon them, even in cases when they sought shelter, dealing with them in these matters as commercial vessels, though denying them the rights of commercial vessels.
8. We have practically abandoned the course of ordering them to depart if supposed to be hovering within our waters; and also the plan of putting an officer on board of them as a matter of course.
9. We permit them under certain circumstances to purchase bait, to replenish outfits, to ship men, and to transfer cargoes.
10. We issue to them, free of charge, permits which enable them to purchase supplies in ports of entry, on all occasions, just as trading vessels, except that they may not do it for barter, and this applies both to the homeward voyage and outward voyages. This section does not name bait, but there will be no difficulty whatever of purchasing bait under it.
11. By the fourteenth article we abandon our previous contention, that preparing within Canadian waters to fish is evidence of intention to actually fish within Canadian waters, and we therefore recede from the position taken by the act of 1886.
12. We have limited and defined and reduced the severe penalties imposed by that act for violation of our exclusive rights of fishing. Forfeiture of the vessels is no longer a penalty except for fishing within Canadian waters, or preparing within these waters to fish therein. In all other cases $3 a ton is the highest fine which can be imposed.
13. We have provided a summary process of law for dealing with arrested or captured vessels, instead of the old and slow process of the admiralty court.

Now, Mr. President, with this history before us and the pending treaty the question recurs, what shall we advise the President to do? What shall our advice be? It will not do to say that the President and Mr. Bayard were dominated by any sectional influence in the making of this treaty. Where is the Southern man or a representative from this country south of the Potomac who had anything to do with making this treaty? The President himself has never put his foot upon the soil of the Southern country except when he stepped from a railroad train in his recent trip. He is of New England origin and he hails from the most powerful State of the Union—the State of New York, equal in its population and wealth to many powerful nations of Europe. He is a Northern man out and out, and has received the indorsement of the people of his own State and of his fellow-citizens of the whole country. And who should say that the Secretary of State, Mr. Bayard, was actuated by any unworthy influence in making this treaty? If Thomas F. Bayard does not deserve the confidence of the Senators in this body, then may we all despair of ever being able to gain the esteem or good-will of one another. I have always felt that among the compensations for the drawbacks of public life were the friendships formed, upon affection and esteem for our associates in their private relations, and admiration and honor for their public abilities and characters; and among them all there is not one who is more fully entitled to the esteem and friendship and admiration of his associates than Thomas F. Bayard. The idea of intimating that there is an alliance between the public men south of the Potomac and the public men of England is absurd and puerile, and does not deserve even contradiction.

Who were the gentlemen associated by the President making the treaty? One was Hon. W. L. Putnam, a New Englander, a citizen of Maine, and one of the leaders of the New England bar, and a gentleman of wide culture, upright character, and a sound Democrat. The other commissioner was Mr. James B. Angell, president of Ann Arbor University, Michigan, a gentleman distinguished for his scientific attainments, and a staunch Republican. Both were eminent citizens living on the frontier line of Canada and representing the people most deeply concerned in all the questions that related to the intercourse between Canada and the United States. They are quite as familiar with them as any two citizens of the Republic. Surely it can not be said that they were controlled by the influence of Senators or Representatives south of the Potomac.

If you reject this treaty, what do you Senators who constitute the majority of this body propose in its stead? You have declared that the time for negotiation is past. The only substitute you offer is that of retaliation. Nations, it is true, are justified in resorting to measures of a hostile character for obtaining redress which yet fall short of actual war. Among these are embargo, retortion, and reprisal. Retortion or retaliation is to apply the lex talionis to another nation. It is the adoption of the principle of "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth." Do you propose by such measures to fatigue, to bully, or to bulldoze the Canadian people into friendship? Is it proposed to provoke them, to act the part of picadores in a Spanish bull-fight and thus drive them into acts of violence, and then to declare war? Or do you expect that such a policy will secure their friendship?

Sir, I do not indorse this policy of retaliation. I might be willing in an emergency likely to produce conflicts to give to the President, within his discretion, power to suspend intercourse with a nation that was seeking to do us wrong, or even to fire a solid shot across the line of her march if intent upon measures that would cost us injury; but there is no more reason for retaliation against Canada now than there was fifty or sixty years ago. She has adopted no new policy, she has committed no new outrages different from those that have been the subject of controversy and negotiation during all these seventy years. Why, then, should we change our policy and say we will inaugurate a system of retaliation? Is that the outcome of our statesmanship in this nineteenth century, dealing with Christian people, our neighbors who ought to be our friends, who must be our friends. Instead of retaliation, which would be more becoming an Indian tribe than the American Senate, I propose that this treaty be amended. We have the power of amendment. It is before us for consideration, for amendment under our rule. Why not amend it? If it is not satisfactory why not make it so? An objection has been raised to the fifteenth article by the veteran Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]. That article does not constitute one of the operative clauses of the treaty; it is merely an invitation on the part of the Government for reciprocity, and it may be stricken out. Others, among them the Senator from Vermont, contend that the eleventh article is ambiguous, that it does not confer the right to the American fishermen to buy all needful supplies on all occasions. Why not amend that article, too? If it is ambiguous, make it plain. Objection is also raised to the thirteenth article of the treaty, by which it is stipulated that our fishing vessels shall have numbers exhibited on their bows. This very provision, which in the report of the majority of the Senate is held to be degrading, was taken from the treaty between Her Britannic Majesty and the German Empire, the King of Belgium and the King of Denmark, and the French Republic and the King of Prussia, and the King of the Netherlands, for regulating their rights in the North Sea fisheries. Signed at the Hague May 6, 1882. See Articles VI, VII, VIII, X of said treaty. The chief objection which the Senator from Ohio finds to the treaty is that it does not secure to our fishermen the right to transship their goods by railways from Halifax. I confess I would like very much to acquire this right for our fishermen. I presume the reason why the British commission was not willing to concede it was because the Canadian fishermen had to pay a heavy duty upon their fish in order to reach the boundary line of the United States, within which their market was to be found, and feeling that they were entitled to the advantages within their own boundaries that we claimed for our fishermen within ours.

I would be very glad to see an effort made to gain the right for our fishermen. I would throw down the barrier which our taxes on their fish impose, provided they gave us the privilege of inshore fisheries and full commercial rights. I would then help to develop the capacity of our own fishing interests by a proper system of bounties, which system was adopted in the beginning of the Government and was not terminated until 1866 by the Republican party. I have no doubt that the Secretary of State has done everything that is possible to secure every advantage for our American fishermen; but if you have doubts on that subject, why not test the question yourselves? Why shrink from the responsibility of meeting the issues now pending in the Government of the United States and the Government of Great Britain? You have the power and the opportunity presented to you. Set forth here the terms upon which you are willing to ratify this treaty, and let them be incorporated in it in order that the country and our fishermen may know precisely what your views are. But do not dodge the issue or seek to evade a plain duty by rejecting these efforts of our countrymen and leaving the question open so that our fishermen shall be subject to the whims and caprices of their competitors on the Canadian shores.

Fortunately for us there is a free offering from the British Government of a modus vivendi which will avert or modify these controversies until the Presidential election is over, when we may hope that independently of party passions and party interests this Senate may be able to discharge its duty by the fishermen of the country by making known precisely what the terms are they think requisite to the protection of American interests and rights. This system is so just and fair I trust it may be made stable and permanent. The tax on our fishing vessels is not so large as our tariff tax on their salt fish. But if it be held that the time for negotiation is past, as the report of the majority of this Committee on Foreign Relations asserts, and if it be determined this Senate shall not amend this treaty, rather than see all these issues involving the relations of our Government with Canada and with Great Britain left open to drift here and there, without metes or bounds and multiply disorders and ill-will, I would suggest as a resource that we agree to refer this question to an impartial tribunal of arbitration. I hold in my hand Miscellaneous Document 141, and I perceive that Senators SHERMAN of Ohio, and WILSON and ALLISON of Iowa have each introduced measures in favor of arbitration about to this effect: That the President be, and is hereby, requested to invite from time to time, as fit occasion may arise, negotiations with any Government with which the United States has or may have diplomatic relations, to this end, and any differences arising between the two governments which can be adjusted by diplomatic agencies may be referred to arbitration, and if possible be adjusted by such means.

I presume that these Senators intended by their resolutions and bills to provide for a settlement of this very question which we have now in consideration, because these bills have all been introduced in the present Congress, and the last one by the Senator from Ohio on June 13, 1888. I find in the first treaty with Great Britain (that of 1783), when we were recognized as a nation, a declaration was made that there should be an inviolable and universal peace between the English King and his people and our Government and people, and it provided for arbitrations to settle the reciprocal claims of British subjects and American citizens. By a separate article of the treaty it was "expressly" stipulated that neither of the contracting parties would order or authorize any acts of reprisal against the other on complaint of injuries or damages until the said party should first have presented to the other a statement, supported and fortified by competent proof in evidence, and demanding justice, and that the same should either have been refused or reasonably delayed.

Now, in the face of this solemn agreement with the British Government under the treaty of 1783, which we all hold was not abrogated by the war of 1812, how can we violate this provision by resorting to reprisal and retaliation, as is proposed by the Republican majority in this Senate? Is it not better to refer the pending issues for arbitration? I do not mean to suggest that this policy should be universal. There are doubtless many questions that we would not feel at liberty to arbitrate—questions concerning the independence or sovereignty of our nation; its equality among the nations of the earth; its form of government; its internal affairs, or continental policy. But there is no reason why we should not refer questions relating to the construction of a contract or treaty for arbitration. We establish courts compelling our citizens in all cases of difficulties or of disputes, many of these as to an interpretation of contracts, to refer to these tribunals of law and of justice whose judgments are conclusive and final. We have adopted the policy of arbitration already in some eighteen different cases, and there is no reason in the world why we should not add another to the catalogue.

In many of our treaties we provided in the event of a dispute or disagreement we would leave the point involved to arbitration. A distinguished member of the Italian Parliament, Mr. Mazzini, has had the same clause inserted in nearly all the treaties which have been made of late years by the Italian Government, and this policy has been generally adopted by the principal governments of Europe in order to more effectually secure peace. We have received memorials from many representative bodies of foreign countries and our own in favor of this policy. One of the very first to be presented was one which originated in Pilgrim Hall, Boston, November 28, 1887, at which time there was a meeting of over eighty ministers of the Congregational Church of Boston and vicinity. We have here laid before us a memorial signed by 233 members of the British Parliament, and I am informed that every Irish member of that Parliament is in favor of an amicable settlement. I will read this memorial:

To the President and Congress of the United States of America:

The undersigned members of the British Parliament learn with the utmost satisfaction that various proposals have been introduced into Congress, urging the Government of the United States to take the necessary steps for concluding with the Government of Great Britain a treaty which shall stipulate that any differences or disputes arising between the two Governments, which can not be adjusted by diplomatic agency, shall be referred to arbitration. Should such a proposal happily emanate from the Congress of the United States, our best influence shall be used to insure its acceptance by the Government of Great Britain. The conclusion of such a treaty would be a splendid example to those nations who are wasting their resources in war-provoking institutions, and might induce other governments to join the peaceful compact.

It is signed, as I have said, by all the Irish members, yet it is understood the Republican Senators in this body, who constitute a majority of it, are keeping this question open in order to produce the impression upon the Irishmen of the United States that they are their true friends and that the Republican party is hostile to the Government of Great Britain, and that the result of their policy would be a declaration of war against Great Britain, followed by the emancipation of Ireland. From this memorial we see that the Irish members of the British Parliament are opposed to this policy, for they know that in the event of a war between the United States and Great Britain it would set back the recovery of justice and local liberty by the Irish people for at least a century.

We know, as friends of the Irish people, that their only hope for the establishment of an independent parliament, for home rule, which we in the South have treasured so highly, and for which we have made such sacrifices, that their only hope is to appeal to the enlightened public sentiment of the age, and to look for aid to such statesmen as Gladstone and others in the British Parliament who will assist them on their way to self-government. But there are other memorials here—one from the public meeting of citizens of New York; one from Johns Hopkins University, presided over by President Gilman; one from the citizens of Lynn, Mass.; one from the citizens of New Hampshire; one from the Kansas Society of Friends, and so on. From all parts of the country comes up the voice of the people in favor of this policy of arbitration. I do not mean to assert that we are compelled to arbitrate this question. This nation can do what it likes. It can reject the advice of good men all through the land. It has the power to challenge to battle any nation in the world, and to enter upon a career of forcible conquest for itself.

When we threw off the colonial yoke and were recognized as a member of the family of nations we have become possessed of moral attributes, for a nation is a moral being. Just in proportion as our power increases our responsibility and duties increase. You can not set aside moral law, you can not defy obligations and restraints which the claims of humanity and justice impose upon you in your relations with foreign nations or the people of neighboring states without sooner or later paying the penalty. Retaliation opens the door of controversy, hostility, and hate; arbitration throws open the door of peace. Retaliation would build up for 4,000 miles a barrier along our northern border bristling with fortresses. It would be the beginning of the establishment of a large standing army, and the cultivation of a military spirit and military methods, to which civil procedure and oldfashioned customs relating to individual rights would be subordinated.

The policy of retaliation would make Canada our enemy forever. She must be our friend. No man who can free himself from the resentments of the past, and relieve himself from sectional disabilities, can fail to perceive what a splendid career awaits our country if we can maintain peace with our neighbors and at home and the supremacy of our industrial development. Our dominion shall not be on the distant seas; we do not propose to step from continent to island, and from island to continent, nor to encircle the globe with our possessions or our drum beat, but we shall in the providence of God possess every foot of this continent. Our policy is continental. The first Congress called itself the Continental Congress.

The day is not far distant when the dominion of the United States will be extended by the free consent of its inhabitants to every part of the American continent—British America, Mexico, Cuba, Central America, and the islands on our coast. Whether we will it or oppose it, whether we are for it or against it, the spawning force of this Anglo-Saxon race, the benevolence of our institutions, the liberties which they embrace, equality by law, the great principle of the right of trial by jury, habeas corpus, the representative system; all the achievements of our race will carry this Government over every portion of this continent and to adjacent islands. Why should you attempt to arrest this destiny by adopting a policy of retaliation? Why should you attempt to build up in the hearts of the Canadian people a sentiment of resentment, the feeling that the great power to the south of them would be willing to take advantage of their weakness?

The policy of retaliation is unbecoming this great Government. It is incompatible, not only with the destiny, but with the generous character of the American people. We can afford to be just and magnanimous. We can afford to stretch out a helping hand to those weaker nations on our borders, and to draw them to us in friendship and in peace. It is the civic victories to be won by the people of the United States which shall constitute their chief glory, and not those that will blot the pages of her history with the stains and crimes of war and oppression.

Mr. President, I submit the following motion:

That the pending treaty be committed to the Committee on Foreign Relations with instructions either to frame and report such amendments thereto as shall appear meet to remove any ambiguities and to remedy any defects of said treaty, if any there be; or

To frame and report a plan for arbitration by which all differences between the Government of the United States and the Government of Great Britain, in respect of the rights and liberties of the people of the United States and of the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, respectively, in the North American fisheries under the treaty of 1818, shall be determined and settled, and by which it may be further determined and settled whether citizens of the United States engaged in the business of fishing on the eastern coasts of British North America are or are not justly entitled to all the advantages and benefits of the mutual arrangements of 1830 and the mutual rights of transit under the treaty of 1871.

And by which it may be further determined and settled what, if any, damages, indemnity, or compensation may be due for the alleged unlawful treatment, detention, and seizures of the fishing vessels of citizens of the United States, and violation of rights and privileges of said citizens of the United States under the treaties, arrangements, and conventions above recited.

APPENDIX.

TREATY OF 1783.

ARTICLE III. It is agreed that the people of the United States shall continue to enjoy unmolested the right to take fish of every kind on the grand bank and on all the other banks of Newfoundland; also in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and at all other places in the sea where the inhabitants of both countries used at any time heretofore to fish, and also that the inhabitants of the United States shall have liberty to take fish of every kind on such part of the coast of Newfoundland as British fishermen shall use (but not to dry or cure the same on that island); and also on the coasts, bays, and creeks of all other of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, and that the American fishermen shall have liberty to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of Nova Scotia, Magdalen Islands, and Labrador, so long as the same shall remain unsettled; but so soon as the same or either of them shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such settlement without a previous agreement for that purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground.

TREATY OF 1818.

ARTICLE I. Whereas differences have arisen respecting the liberty claimed by the United States for the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, and cure fish on certain coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, it is agreed between the high contracting parties that the inhabitants of the said United States shall have forever, in common with the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, the liberty to take fish of every kind on that part of the southern coast of Newfoundland which extends from Cape Ray to the Ramea Islands, on the western and northern coast of Newfoundland; from the said Cape Ray to the Quirpon Islands; on the shores of the Magdalen Islands, and also on the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks from Mount Joli, on the southern coast of Labrador, to and through the Straits of Belle Isle, and thence northward indefinitely along the coast, without prejudice, however, to any of the exclusive rights of Hudson's Bay Company; and that the American fishermen shall also have liberty forever to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of the southern part of the coast of Newfoundland hereabove described, and of the coast of Labrador; but so soon as the same or any portion thereof shall be settled it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such portion so settled without previous agreement for such purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground, and the United States hereby renounce forever any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, or cure fish on or within 3 marine miles of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included in the above-mentioned limits: Provided, however, That the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays or harbors for the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood and of obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever. But they shall be under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein, or in any other manner whatever abusing the privileges hereby reserved to them.

THE PENDING TREATY—PROTOCOL OF FISHERIES CONFERENCE.

WASHINGTON, November 22, 1887.

The Fisheries Conference having formally met, the full powers of the plenipotentiaries were exhibited and found to be in good and due form, as follows:

Grover Cleveland, President of the United States of America. To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

Know ye that, reposing special trust and confidence in the integrity and ability of Thomas F. Bayard, Secretary of State; William L. Putnam, of Maine; and James B. Angell, of Michigan; I hereby invest them with full power jointly and severally, for and in the name of the United States, to meet and confer with plenipotentiaries representing the Government of Her Britannic Majesty, for the purpose of considering and adjusting in a friendly spirit all or any questions relating to rights of fishery in the seas adjacent to British North America and Newfoundland which are in dispute between the Government of the United States and that of Her Britannic Majesty, and any other questions which may arise and which they may be authorized by their respective governments to consider and adjust; and I also fully empower and authorize the said Thomas F. Bayard, William L. Putnam, and James B. Angell, jointly and severally, to conclude and sign any treaty or treaties touching the premises, for the final ratification of the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, if such advice and consent be given.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed.

Given under my hand at the City of Washington this 18th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1887, and of the Independence of the United States, the one hundred and twelfth.

[SEAL.] GROVER CLEVELAND.

By the President:

T. F. BAYARD,
Secretary of State.

VICTORIA R. AND I. Victoria, by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Queen, Defender of the Faith, Empress of India, etc., etc., etc., to all and singular to whom these presents shall come, greeting!

Whereas for the purpose of considering and adjusting in a friendly spirit with plenipotentiaries, to be appointed on the part of our good friends, the United States of America, all or any questions relating to rights of fishery in the seas adjacent to British North America and Newfoundland, which are in dispute between our Government and that of our said good friends, and any other questions which may arise which the respective plenipotentiaries may be authorized by their governments to consider and adjust, we have judged it expedient to invest fit persons with full power to conduct on our part the discussions in this behalf. Know ye, therefore, that we, reposing especial trust and confidence in the wisdom, loyalty, diligence, and circumspection of our right trusty and well-beloved councillor, Joseph Chamberlain, a member of our most honorable Privy Council and a member of Parliament, etc.; of our trusty and well-beloved, the Hon. Sir Lionel Sackville Sackville-West, knight commander of our most distinguished Order of St. Michael and St. George, our envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to our said good friends, the United States of America, etc., and of our trusty and well-beloved Sir Charles Tupper, knight grand cross of our most distinguished Order of St. Michael and St. George, companion of our most honorable Order of the Bath, minister of finance of the Dominion of Canada, etc., have named, made, constituted, and appointed, as we do by these presents name, make, constitute, and appoint, them our undoubted plenipotentiaries, giving to them, or to any two of them, all manner of authority to treat, adjust and conclude with such plenipotentiaries as may be vested with similar power and authority on the part of our good friends, the United States of America, any treaties, conventions, or agreements that may tend to the attainment of the above-mentioned end, and to sign for us and in our name everything so agreed upon and concluded, and to do and transact all such other matters as may appertain to the finishing of the aforesaid work, in as ample manner and form, and with equal force and efficiency as we ourselves could do if personally present; engaging and promising upon our royal word that whatever things shall be so transacted and concluded by our said plenipotentiaries shall be agreed to, acknowledged, and accepted by us in the fullest manner, and that we will never suffer, either in the whole or in part, any person whatsoever to infringe the same, or act contrary thereto, as far as it lies in our power. In witness whereof we have caused the great seal of our United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland to be affixed to these presents which we have signed with our royal hand. Given at our court at Balmoral the 24th day of October, in the year of our Lord 1887, and in the fifty-first year of our reign.

The treaty having been signed, the British plenipotentiaries desire to state that they have been considering the position which will be created by the immediate commencement of the fishing season before the treaty can possibly be ratified by the Senate of the United States, by the Parliament of Canada, and the Legislature of Newfoundland.

In the absence of such ratification the old conditions which have given rise to so much friction and irritation might be revived, and might interfere with the unprejudiced consideration of the treaty by the legislative bodies concerned.

Under these circumstances, and with the further object of affording evidence of their anxious desire to promote good feeling and to remove all possible subjects of controversy, the British plenipotentiaries are ready to make the following temporary arrangement for a period not exceeding two years, in order to afford a "modus vivendi" pending the ratification of the treaty:

1. For a period not exceeding two years from the present date the privilege of entering the bays and harbors of the Atlantic coasts of Canada and Newfoundland shall be granted to United States fishing vessels by annual licenses at a fee of $1.50 per ton, for the following purposes:

The purchase of bait, ice, seines, lines, and all other supplies and outfits.

Transshipment of catch and shipping of crews.

2. If during the continuance of this arrangement the United States should remove the duties on fish, fish-oil, whale and seal oil (and their coverings, packages, etc.), the said licenses shall be issued free of charge.

3. United States fishing vessels entering the bays and harbors of the Atlantic coasts of Canada or of Newfoundland for any of the four purposes mentioned in Article I of the convention of October 20, 1818, and not remaining therein more than twenty-four hours, shall not be required to enter or clear at the custom-house, providing that they do not communicate with the shore.

4. Forfeiture to be exacted only for the offenses of fishing or preparing to fish in territorial waters.

5. This arrangement to take effect as soon as the necessary measures can be completed by the colonial authorities.

J. CHAMBERLAIN.
L. S. SACKVILLE-WEST.
CHARLES TUPPER.

WASHINGTON, February 15, 1888.

PROTOCOL.

The American plenipotentiaries having received the communication of the British plenipotentiaries of this date conveying their plan for the administration to be observed by the governments of Canada and Newfoundland in respect of the fisheries during the period which may be requisite for the consideration by the Senate of the treaty this day signed, and the enactment of the legislation by the respective governments therein proposed, desire to express their satisfaction with this manifestation of an intention on the part of the British plenipotentiaries, by the means referred to, to maintain the relations of good neighborhood between the British possessions in North America and the United States; and they will convey the communication of the British plenipotentiaries to the President of the United States, with a recommendation that the same may be by him made known to the Senate for its information, together with the treaty, when the latter is submitted to that body for ratification.

T. F. BAYARD.
WILLIAM L. PUTNAM.
JAMES B. ANGELL.

WASHINGTON, February 15, 1888.

Whereas differences have arisen concerning the interpretation of Article I, of the convention of October 20, 1818, the United States of America, and Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, being mutually desirous of removing all causes of misunderstanding in relation thereto, and of promoting friendly intercourse and good neighborhood between the United States and the possessions of Her Majesty in North America, have resolved to conclude a treaty to that end, and have named as their plenipotentiaries, that is to say:

The President of the United States, Thomas F. Bayard, Secretary of State; William L. Putnam, of Maine; and James B. Angell, of Michigan.

And Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, M. P., the Honorable Sir Lionel Sackville Sackville-West, K. C. M. G., Her Britannic Majesty's envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the United States of America; and Sir Charles Tupper, G. C. M. G., C. B., minister of finance of the Dominion of Canada;

Who, having communicated to each other their respective full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

The high contracting parties agree to appoint a mixed commission to delimit, in the manner provided by this treaty, the British waters, bays, creeks, and harbors, of the coasts of Canada and of Newfoundland, as to which the United States, by Article I of the convention of October 20, 1818, between the United States and Great Britain, renounced forever any liberty to take, dry, or cure fish.

ARTICLE II.

The commission shall consist of two commissioners to be named by Her Britannic Majesty, and of two commissioners to be named by the President of the United States, without delay, after the exchange of ratifications of this treaty.

The commission shall meet and complete the delimitation as soon as possible thereafter.

In case of the death, absence, or incapacity of any commissioner, or in the event of any commissioner omitting or ceasing to act as such, the President of the United States or Her Britannic Majesty, respectively, shall forthwith name another person to act as commissioner instead of the commissioner originally named.

ARTICLE III.

The delimitation referred to in Article I of this treaty shall be marked upon British admiralty charts by a series of lines regularly numbered and duly described. The charts so marked shall, on the termination of the work of the commission, be signed by the commissioners in quadruplicate, one copy whereof shall be delivered to the Secretary of State of the United States, and three copies to Her Majesty's Government. The delimitation shall be made in the following manner, and shall be accepted by both the high contracting parties as applicable for all purposes under Article I of the convention of October 20, 1818, between the United States and Great Britain.

The 3 marine miles mentioned in Article I of the convention of October 20, 1818, shall be measured seaward from low-water mark; but at every bay, creek, or harbor, not otherwise specially provided for in this treaty, such 3 marine miles shall be measured seaward from a straight line drawn across the bay, creek, or harbor, in the part nearest the entrance at the first point where the width does not exceed 10 marine miles.

ARTICLE IV.

At or near the following bays the limits of exclusion under Article I of the convention of October 20, 1818, at points more than 3 marine miles from low-water mark, shall be established by the following lines, namely:

At the Baie des Chaleurs the line from the light at Birch Point on Miscou Island to Macquereau Point light; at the Bay of Miramichi, the line from the light at Point Escuminac to the light on the eastern point of Tabisintac Gully; at Egmont Bay, in Prince Edward Island, the line from the light at Cape Egmont to the light at West Point; and off St. Ann's Bay, in the Province of Nova Scotia, the line from Cape Smoke to the light at Point Aconi.

At Fortune Bay, in Newfoundland, the line from Connaigre Head to the light on the southeasterly end of Brunet Island, thence to Fortune Head; at Sir Charles Hamilton Sound, the line from the southeast point of Cape Fogo to White Island, thence to the north end of Peckford Island, and from the south end of Peckford Island to the east headland of Ragged Harbor.

At or near the following bays the limits of exclusion shall be 3 marine miles seaward from the following lines, namely:

At or near Barrington Bay, in Nova Scotia, the line from the light on Stoddard Island to the light on the south point of Cape Sable, thence to the light at Baccaro Point; at Chedabucto and St. Peter's Bay the line from Cranberry Island light to Green Island light, thence to Point Rouge; at Mira Bay the line from the light on the east point of Scatari Island to the northeasterly point of Cape Morien; and at Placentia Bay, in Newfoundland, the line from Latine Point, on the eastern mainland shore, to the most southerly point of Red Island, thence by the most southerly point of Merasheen Island to the mainland.

Long Island and Bryer Island, at St. Mary's Bay, in Nova Scotia, shall, for the purpose of delimitation, be taken as the coasts of such bay.

ARTICLE V.

Nothing in this treaty shall be construed to include within the common waters any such interior portions of any bays, creeks, or harbors as can not be reached from the sea without passing within 3 marine miles mentioned in Article I of the convention of October 20, 1818.

ARTICLE VI.

The commissioners shall from time to time report to each of the high contracting parties, such lines as they may have agreed upon numbered, described, and marked as herein provided, with quadruplicate charts thereof; which lines so reported shall forthwith from time to time be simultaneously proclaimed by the high contracting parties, and be binding after two months from such proclamation.

ARTICLE VII.

Any disagreement of the commissioners shall forthwith be referred to an umpire selected by the Secretary of State of the United States and Her Britannic Majesty's minister at Washington; and his decision shall be final.

ARTICLE VIII.

Each of the high contracting parties shall pay its own commissioners and officers. All other expenses jointly incurred in connection with the performance of the work, including compensation to the umpire, shall be paid by the high contracting parties in equal moieties.

ARTICLE IX.

Nothing in this treaty shall interrupt or affect the free navigation of the Strait of Canso by fishing vessels of the United States.

ARTICLE X.

United States fishing vessels entering the bays or harbors referred to in Article I of this treaty shall conform to harbor regulations common to them and to fishing vessels of Canada or of Newfoundland.

They need not report, enter or clear, when putting into such bays or harbors for shelter or repairing damages, nor when putting into the same, outside the limits of established ports of entry, for the purpose of purchasing wood or of obtaining water; except that any such vessel remaining more than twenty-four hours, exclusive of Sundays and legal holidays, within any such port, or communicating with the shore therein, may be required to report, enter, or clear; and no vessel shall be excused hereby from giving due information to boarding officers.

They shall not be liable in any such bays or harbors for compulsory pilotage, nor, when therein for the purpose of shelter, of repairing damages, of purchasing wood, or of obtaining water, shall they be liable for harbor dues, tonnage dues, buoy dues, light dues, or other similar dues; but this enumeration shall not permit other charges inconsistent with the enjoyment of the liberties reserved or secured by the convention of October 20, 1818.

ARTICLE XI.

United States fishing vessels entering the ports, bays, and harbors of the eastern and northeastern coasts of Canada or of the coasts of Newfoundland under stress of weather or other casualty may unload, reload, tranship, or sell, subject to customs laws and regulations, all fish on board, when such unloading, transshipment, or sale is made necessary as incidental to repairs, and may replenish outfits, provisions, and supplies damaged or lost by disaster; and in case of death or sickness shall be allowed all needful facilities, including the shipping of crews.

Licenses to purchase in established ports of entry of the aforesaid coasts of Canada or of Newfoundland, for the homeward voyage, such provisions and supplies as are ordinarily sold to trading vessels, shall be granted to United States fishing vessels in such ports, promptly upon application and without charge; and such vessels, having obtained licenses in the manner aforesaid, shall also be accorded upon all occasions such facilities for the purchase of casual or needful provisions and supplies as are ordinarily granted to the trading vessels; but such provisions or supplies shall not be obtained by barter, nor purchased for resale or traffic.

ARTICLE XII.

Fishing vessels of Canada and Newfoundland shall have on the Atlantic coast of the United States all the privileges reserved and secured by this treaty to United States fishing vessels in the aforesaid waters of Canada and Newfoundland.

ARTICLE XIII.

The Secretary of the Treasury of the United States shall make regulations providing for the conspicuous exhibition by every United States fishing vessel, of its official number on each bow; and any such vessel required by law to have an official number, and failing to comply with such regulations, shall not be entitled to the licenses provided for in this treaty.

Such regulations shall be communicated to Her Majesty's Government previously to their taking effect.

ARTICLE XIV.

The penalties for unlawfully fishing in the waters, bays, creeks, and harbors, referred to in Article I of this treaty, may extend to forfeiture of the boat or vessel, and appurtenances, and also of the supplies and cargo aboard when the offense was committed; and for preparing in such waters to unlawfully fish therein, penalties shall be affixed by the court, not to exceed those for unlawfully fishing; and for any other violation of the laws of Great Britain, Canada, or Newfoundland relating to the right of fishery in such waters, bays, creeks, or harbors, penalties shall be fixed by the court, not exceeding in all $3 for every ton of the boat or vessel concerned. The boat or vessel may be holden for such penalties and forfeitures.

The proceedings shall be summary and as inexpensive as practicable. The trial (except on appeal) shall be at the place of detention, unless the judge shall on request of the defense, order it to be held at some other place adjudged by him more convenient. Security for costs shall not be required of the defense, except when bail is offered. Reasonable bail shall be accepted. There shall be proper appeals available to the defense only; and the evidence at the trial may be used on appeal.

Judgments of forfeiture shall be reviewed by the governor-general of Canada in council, or the governor in council of Newfoundland, before the same are executed.

ARTICLE XV.

Whenever the United States shall remove the duty from fish-oil, whale-oil, seal-oil, and fish of all kinds (except fish preserved in oil), being the produce of fisheries carried on by the fishermen of Canada and Newfoundland, including Labrador, as well as from the usual and necessary casks, barrels, kegs, cans, and other usual and necessary coverings containing the products above mentioned, the like products, being the produce of fisheries carried on by the fishermen of the United States, as well as the usual and necessary coverings of the same, as above described, shall be admitted free of duty into the Dominion of Canada and Newfoundland.

And upon such removal of duties, and while the aforesaid articles are allowed to be brought into the United States by British subjects, without duty being reimposed thereon, the privilege of entering the ports, bays, and harbors of the aforesaid coasts of Canada and Newfoundland shall be accorded to United States fishing vessels by annual licenses, free of charge, for the following purposes, namely:

1. The purchase of provisions, bait, ice, seines, lines, and all other supplies and outfits.
2. Transshipment of catch, for transport by any means of conveyance.
3. Shipping of crews.

Supplies shall not be obtained by barter, but bait may be so obtained.

The like privileges shall be continued or given to fishing-vessels of Canada and of Newfoundland on the Atlantic coasts of the United States.

ARTICLE XVI.

This treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and by Her Britannic Majesty, having received the assent of the Parliament of Canada and of the Legislature of Newfoundland; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington as soon as possible.

In faith whereof we, the respective plenipotentiaries, have signed this treaty, and have hereunto affixed our seals.

Done in duplicate, at Washington, this 15th day of February, in the year of our Lord 1888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the next article of the treaty.

The EXECUTIVE CLERK. Article II——

Mr. TELLER. And before that is done—I do not desire to make any remarks of my own, but inasmuch as the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] has quoted Mr. Edward Everett on this question, I desire to read from his letter to Lord Aberdeen, dated May 25, 1844, in which he says, speaking of the British contention:

An examination of the map is sufficient to show the doubtful nature of this construction——

Mr. GIBSON. If the Senator will yield for a moment, I wish to submit a motion which I desire to have read without being acted on now.

Mr. COCKRELL. Would not the Senator from Colorado like to yield to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. TELLER. I desire first to read this extract so as to have it go in the RECORD.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it go in the RECORD without being read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] has forwarded to the desk a paper which he desires to have read. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. Does the Senator from Colorado yield?

Mr. TELLER. Yes, sir.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the pending treaty be committed to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with instructions either to frame and report such amendments thereto as shall appear meet to remove any ambiguities, and to remedy any defects of said treaty, if any there be; or

To frame and report a plan for arbitration by which all differences between the Government of the United States and the Government of Great Britain, in respect of the rights and liberties of the people of the United States, and of the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty respectively, in the North American fisheries under the treaty of 1818, shall be determined and settled, and by which it may be further determined and settled whether citizens of the United States, engaged in the business of fishing on the eastern coast of British North America are or are not justly entitled to all the advantages and benefits of the mutual arrangements of 1830 and the mutual rights of transit under the treaty of 1871.

And by which it may be further determined and settled what, if any, damages, indemnity, or compensation may be due for the alleged unlawful treatment, detention, and seizures of the fishing vessels of citizens of the United States, and violation of rights and privileges of said citizens of the United States, under the treaties, arrangements, and conventions above recited.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not understand whether the Senator from Louisiana desired to have this as the pending motion or not.

Mr. GIBSON. I submit it to be the pending motion.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be printed.

Mr. TELLER. If there is no objection, I will insert in the RECORD, without reading, so much of the letter of Edward Everett to Lord Aberdeen as I intended reading in the first instance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

The extract is as follows:

An examination of the map is sufficient to show the doubtful nature of this construction. It was notoriously the object of the article of the treaty in question to put an end to the difficulties which had grown out of the operations of the fishermen from the United States along the coasts and upon the shores of the settled portions of the country, and for that purpose to remove their vessels to a distance not exceeding 3 miles from the same. In estimating this distance the undersigned admits it to be the intent of the treaty, as it is itself reasonable, to have regard to the general line of the coast, and to consider its bays, creeks, and harbors—that is, the indentations usually so accounted, as included within that line. But the undersigned can not admit it to be reasonable, instead of thus following the general directions of the coast, to draw a line from the southwesternmost point of Nova Scotia to the termination of the northeastern boundary between the United States and New Brunswick, and to consider the arms of the sea which will thus be cut off, and which can not on that line be less than 60 miles wide, as one of the bays on the coast from which American vessels are excluded. By this interpretation the fishermen of the United States would be shut out from the waters distant, not 3 but 30 miles, from any part of the colonial coast. The undersigned can not perceive that any assignable object of the restriction imposed by the convention of 1818 on the fishing privilege accorded to the citizens of the United States by the treaty of 1783 requires such a latitude of construction.

It is obvious that (by the terms of the treaty) the further distance to which fishing vessels of the United States are obliged to hold themselves from the colonial coasts and bays is 3 miles. But owing to the peculiar configuration of these coasts, there is a succession of bays indenting the shores both of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia within the Bay of Fundy. The vessels of the United States have a general right to approach all the bays in Her Majesty's colonial dominions, within any distance not less than 3 miles, a privilege from the enjoyment of which they will be wholly excluded, in this part of the coast, if the broad arm of the sea which flows up between New Brunswick and Nova Scotia is itself to be considered one of the forbidden bays.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, it does not seem that there is to be much more debate on this treaty. There is to-morrow after the morning hour or after 1 o'clock—for my impression is that I shall not move to go into executive session before 1 o'clock and let the Calendar take its place until that time—and then Saturday and Monday. Some Senators desire to be away on Saturday and not to be back until Monday night. I have this proposition to make: I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this treaty and proposed amendments shall close on Monday night, and that the votes on the amendments and the treaty shall commence at 12 o'clock on Tuesday next.

Mr. MORGAN. We will take that under advisement until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama objects.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 51 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, August 17, 1888, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, August 16, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

YANKTON AND MISSOURI RIVER RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7547) granting a right of way to the Yankton and Missouri River Railroad through the Yankton Indian reservation in Dakota; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

ABOLITION OF CIRCUIT-COURT POWERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 3234) to abolish circuit-court powers of certain district courts of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. ROGERS. I would request the indulgence of the House for a few minutes in order to make a brief explanation of this bill preparatory to asking its present consideration.

Mr. SAYERS. I must insist upon the regular order.

Mr. ROGERS. I hope my friend from Texas will not call the regular order now.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman can ask to withhold the bill and take it up after a while.

Mr. ROGERS. Then I ask that it be withheld for the present.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the bill will be retained on the table for the present.

There was no objection.

REFERENCE OF SENATE BILLS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House Senate bills of the following titles; which were read twice, and referred as follows, namely:

The bill (S. 2715) for the relief of certain parties who have paid $2.50 per acre for United States Government lands reduced in price to $1.25 per acre by the act of Congress approved June 15, 1880—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill (S. 3432) for the erection of a public building at Martinsburgh, W. Va.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

RAILROAD BRIDGE, FORT SMITH, ARK.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 2823) to authorize the building of a railroad bridge at Fort Smith, Ark.

The SPEAKER. A bill identical with this has been already passed by the House, and if there be no objection the Senate bill will be indefinitely postponed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BARRY, for two weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. HUTTON, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. GEAR, until Saturday next.

To Mr. MCCLAMMY, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. FINLEY, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. PEEL, indefinitely.

Mr. WEAVER. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WEAVER. I want to know, these leaves of absence being granted by unanimous consent, whether a majority of the House would be competent at any time to revoke the leaves of absence so granted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SAYERS. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the question on the passage of the bill coming over from yesterday under the operation of the previous question, the title of which the Clerk will now report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10998) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, and for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.

Mr. STRUBLE. I was just going to ask the attention of the Chair to the fact that there is a special order pending for to-day.

The SPEAKER. This comes up immediately after the Journal.

The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

Mr. SAYERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MRS. GENERAL WARD B. BURNETT.

Mr. STRUBLE. I now call up the special order fixed for to-day, being the consideration of the Senate bill No. 681, granting an increase of pension to Mrs. General Ward B. Burnett.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

Mr. STRUBLE. I am just advised, Mr. Speaker, by the chairman of the Committee on the Territories that he desires to call up the Oklahoma bill for consideration to-day. It was understood when consent was given that this bill should not antagonize the Oklahoma bill. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the consideration of this bill may be postponed for one week from to-day immediately after the reading of the Journal, to be then taken up for consideration on the pending motion.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Will it be in order to move as an amendment that all of the other bills on the special Calendar, with th previous question ordered upon them, be taken up immediately after this bill is disposed of?

The SPEAKER. Except by unanimous consent no motion can be made in reference to a bill unless it is actually up for consideration.

Mr. STRUBLE. I ask unanimous consent, in view of my statement in regard to the business of the Committee on the Territories, that this bill be postponed for one week from to-day immediately after the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. It can be done by a motion.

Mr. STRUBLE. Then I make that motion.

The motion was adopted.

MARGARET STAFFORD WORTH.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill under the special order.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 867) granting a pension to Margaret Stafford Worth.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I make a similar motion in reference to this bill, that its consideration be postponed for one week, to come up immediately after the disposal of the other bill just postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. ROGERS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order to ask unanimous consent of the House to consider the bill (S. 3234) which was withheld a few moments ago at my request?

The SPEAKER. But the regular order has been demanded.

Mr. MCRAE. I think the gentleman from Texas, who demanded the regular order, did it for the purpose of passing the fortifications bill. That has been disposed of.

The SPEAKER. But the demand has not been withdrawn, and the Chair must respect it until it is withdrawn.

Mr. ROGERS. Is it insisted upon?

The SPEAKER. It has not been withdrawn, and the Chair must assume that it is insisted upon.

Mr. ROGERS. May I inquire who demanded the regular order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS].

Mr. ROGERS. But since that time he has passed his measure, and is not now present in the Hall. If the Chair will permit me, therefore, I will make a further request for unanimous consent to take up the bill to which I have referred.

Mr. WEAVER. How much time will it take?

Mr. ROGERS. Ten minutes at the outside.

Mr. WEAVER. If it does not consume more time than that I shall not object.

ABOLITION OF CERTAIN CIRCUIT-COURT POWERS.

Mr. ROGERS. Then I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to take up for present consideration the bill (S. 3234) to abolish certain powers of the circuit courts, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. TAULBEE. I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. DOUGHERTY rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Florida has objected.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. The recognition of the Chair all this session upon unanimous consent seems to have been confined to a few statesmen on the other side of the House, and unanimous consent seems to have been given to several gentlemen upon different occasions. It seems to me that this thing of unanimous consent should be more evenly distributed. There are important local measures in my State that ought to be considered and we have been unable to get recognition either to consider or unanimous consent to call up, and I object to any general legislation by unanimous consent until we can have those measures considered.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman from Florida withhold his objection until he hears what I have to say upon this bill for two minutes?

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I will yield to the gentleman to make a statement.

Mr. ROGERS. Now I hope the gentleman will listen to what I have to say.

Mr. TAULBEE. Before the right to objection is waived I want to ask the gentleman having charge of the bill if the section of the statute which the bill proposes to repeal applies to courts generally or to the courts mentioned in that bill.

Mr. ROGERS. Only to those mentioned in the bill. If the House will give me its attention, I will place the matter before it in a word or two. The courts named in that bill stand upon a different footing from any other district courts in the United States. By section 571 of the Revised Statutes these three district courts named have circuit-court power. One of the incidents of that jurisdiction is this, that in these three courts where parties are tried for a capital offense they have no right to have their cases revised by a higher tribunal. In one of these courts, namely, that which refers to Arkansas, I can not state the exact number of cases, but in the last fifteen years approximately one hundred capital cases have been tried, and the parties have been sentenced to death without the right of revision by any other court. The whole object of this bill is to put these district courts on the footing of other district courts and give these unfortunates the same chance for life that others enjoy who are similarly situated elsewhere.

I have said this much, Mr. Speaker. It seems enough to shock our sense of justice and to commend this bill to the confidence and support of us all.

Mr TOWNSHEND. Has this bill been considered by the Committee on the Judiciary or any other committee of this House?

Mr. ROGERS. I answer that question in the negative; but will state the history of this bill is this: It was introduced in the Senate by Senator JONES to correct this evil which I have just mentioned, and which is a burning shame. Senator HOAR took up this subject and went all through it, and he draughted this bill as a substitute for the bill of Senator JONES. It was then submitted to the Senate. Senator EDMUNDS gave it very careful attention. It went into the Senate, having met the approval of the Judiciary Committee, passed the Senate with one single amendment and without a single question or one single adverse vote or criticism.

It creates no new courts, but divides the jurisdiction of these three courts, and makes no other alteration of public law. It is in the interest of humanity.

Mr. SYMES. By what other judge is the case under appeal to be tried?

Mr. ROGERS. Either by the justice of the Supreme Court assigned to that district or the judge assigned to that circuit.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to ask the gentleman from Arkansas if it will not suit him to postpone this matter until a certain day, with the view of having at least an informal examination of it by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. DOUGHERTY] has already objected to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. ROGERS. In my own city there are some forty persons confined in jail subject to trial at the session of the court just begun, and I am anxious that this right shall be guarantied to those unfortunate persons.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. If the gentleman asked unanimous consent for the consideration of any local measure of importance to his district I would not object; but there are numbers of gentlemen upon this floor who have measures of local interest which do not take any money out of the Treasury of the United States, but for which they are unable to get consideration or recognition.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The gentleman from Florida has objected and the bill is no longer before the House.

Mr. ROGERS. Then I ask that the bill be retained on the Speaker's table. I desire that the Judiciary Committee may have an opportunity to examine it. There is no quorum of the committee here, or it would have been examined by them before now.

CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. LEE. I desire to present a privileged report from a committee of conference.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5863) authorizing the Richmond and Danville Railroad Company to lay tracks in the District of Columbia having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

W. H. F. LEE,
JAMES E. CAMPBELL,
Conferees on the part of the House.
JOHN W. DANIEL,
JOHN C. SPOONER,
Conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is there a statement accompanying the report?

The SPEAKER. There is no statement.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then I hope the gentleman from Virginia will make an explanatory statement.

Mr. LEE. The Senate objected to the provision in the House bill giving the Danville Railroad Company in the District of Columbia all the terminal facilities which they might have in the State of Virginia. The Senate objected to that and struck it out, and the House conferees agreed to the amendment. That is all.

The report of the committee of conference was adopted.

Mr. LEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE TENSAS, LOUISIANA.

Mr. CRISP, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. 3285) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tensas River at or near Kirk's Ferry, La.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SUSAN B. HOPKINS.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. 1813) for the relief of Susan B. Hopkins; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

C. M. SCHAFFER.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. 3015) for the relief of C. M. Schaffer; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

GERMAN EVANGELICAL CHURCH, MARTINSBURGH, W. VA.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. 2740) for the relief of the trustees of the German Evangelical Church at Martinsburgh, W. Va.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL TATE.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. 100) for the relief of Samuel Tate; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ALFRED J. WORCESTER.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. 2163) for the relief of Alfred J. Worcester; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

GREELY RELIEF EXPEDITION.

Mr. STAHLNECKER, from the Committee on the Library, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. 961) for the presentation of badges to the officers and men of the Greely relief expedition; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts, was granted leave of absence for ten days.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the consideration hour for to-day be dispensed with.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I object. I believe that we should have the hour for the consideration of business from committees. There are many committees of this House that have never been called at all under this order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to inquire what is the next committee to be called.

The SPEAKER. The clerk at the Speaker's desk, who usually keeps memoranda of these matters, is not now present. The Chair is under the impression—some gentleman on the floor may be able to give definite information—that during the last consideration hour the Committee on Invalid Pensions was called, and that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON], chairman of the committee, being absent, the committee was passed over informally.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the Committee on Patents was also passed over informally at that time, but is not certain about that matter.

Mr. WEAVER. Which comes first, the Committee on Invalid Pensions or the Committee on Patents?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] desire that the Committee on Patents be passed over this morning?

Mr. WEAVER. I do, provided it does not lose its place.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Committee on Patents will be passed over this morning without losing its place. The Committee on Invalid Pensions is the first committee to be called. The hour begins at thirty-five minutes past 12 o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE COMMITTEE ON PENSIONS.

Mr. MORRILL. The Committee on Invalid Pensions has directed me to call up the resolution which I send to the desk, to which I wish to offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That it is hereby ordered by the House that Wednesday, May 2, and Thursday, May 3, immediately after the hour for the consideration of bills by committees, be set apart for the consideration of bills and measures reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions in such order as may be designated by said committee, but not to interfere with revenue bills, appropriation bills, or prior orders; and if displaced by these or by any cause the same days on each subsequent week shall be substituted for those herein named until two days, or so much thereof as shall be necessary, are devoted to the consideration of measures reported by said committee.

The amendment proposed by Mr. MORRILL was read, as follows:

Strike out "May 2" and "May 3" and insert "August 29" and "August 30."

Mr. ROGERS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Does this resolution change the rules of the House?

The SPEAKER. It interferes with the usual order of business under the rules, but it does not change permanently any rule of the House.

Mr. ROGERS. Does it come in during this hour under the regular order?

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Invalid Pensions has been called under the rules for the presentation of measures heretofore reported from that committee; and the gentleman from Kansas——

Mr. BLAND. Can a report of this kind be called up under this order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas calls up this resolution under the direction of his committee, it having been heretofore reported and being on the Calendar.

Mr. MORRILL. The resolution upon its introduction was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions and has been by them reported back.

The SPEAKER. So the Chair understands.

Mr. BLAND. I raise the question of order whether this resolution does not belong to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The resolution has already been referred by order of the House to another committee and by that committee has been reported back; and it has taken its place on the Calendar. The question is not now on the reference of the resolution; if it were the gentleman's point of order might be well taken.

Mr. BLAND. I understand that the simple reference of a proposition to a committee does not under the rules of the House give that committee jurisdiction of the subject-matter.

The SPEAKER. Still this resolution has been reported back from a committee; the report has been received by the House, and has taken its place on the Calendar.

Mr. ROGERS. I wish to ask—I am not sure that it is a parliamentary inquiry—whether the Committee on Invalid Pensions has directed the calling up of this measure?

Mr. MORRILL. They have, by a unanimous vote.

Mr. ROGERS. I move to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL] has the floor at the present time.

Mr. MORRILL. In support of this resolution, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say in reference to this subject of pensions, more bills probably have been introduced and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions than to any other committee of the House. One hundred and ninety general pension bills have been introduced and have been referred to our committee. Some thirty or forty Senate bills of similar character have been referred to us. These bills included one passed by the Senate increasing the pension for deafness (a bill which was passed the other day), and a bill providing for those who are now dependent—a bill passed by the Senate and referred to our committee. There is also a bill equalizing the pensions of those who are totally disabled, which has also passed the Senate. As the law now stands a certain class of pensioners who formerly received $50 a month now receive a pension of $72 monthly, while another class, equally disabled, are still receiving only $50.

Another of these bills provides for pensioning those who were prisoners of war, without their proving specifically (which is utterly impossible) that their disability was incurred in a rebel prison. Another bill provides for the payment of arrears of pensions, placing all upon the same footing. Another provides that any person who is receiving a pension under a special act may, upon making proper proof at the Pension Office, receive his pension under the general law as if he had not received the benefit of a special act. This of course applies to a small class—perhaps not fifty persons in all will be affected. But, sir, under the laws as they now exist it is held that a person who has once received a pension by special act, although he may produce all the proof required by the Pension Office, can not receive arrears of pension, nor can he be pensioned under the general law.

Numerous other bills, perhaps of less importance, have been reported by our Committee on Invalid Pensions after days of arduous investigation and labor on the part of members of that committee; and we have made repeated efforts to obtain a day for their consideration, but it has so far been refused. We now ask of the House toward the close of the session, after the tariff bill has passed and all of the appropriation bills have been disposed of, with nothing practically pressing the House, by the pending resolution to have these two days set apart, August 29 and August 30, for the consideration of the pension business.

Mr. FARQUHAR. That is it; now demand the previous question.

Mr. MORRILL. If the House understands the proposition and is ready to vote upon it, I will now demand the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 64, noes 2.

Mr. CRISP. I raise the point of no quorum.

Mr. MORRILL. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOOKER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOOKER. I would like to have the gentleman from Kansas state to the House whether he has enumerated all the business coming from the Committee on Pensions which will be proposed to be considered on the two days he has indicated, if they are set apart under the pending resolution, or whether, sir, other pension business will be included which so far has not been enumerated by the gentleman.

Mr. MORRILL. While I have enumerated all the bills which have been reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, it does not necessarily follow that on those days designated by the resolution those bills will be taken up. It is intended that the Committee on Invalid Pensions, if the resolution be adopted, shall hereafter designate the bills which shall be taken up for consideration on those two days, and shall also indicate the order in which that business shall be considered under the terms of the resolution. As they have carefully investigated and acted upon these matters they perhaps are better informed on the subject and better able to arrange the matter properly for the action of the House.

The question was taken; and no quorum voted, there being—yeas 117, nays 7, not voting 200; as follows:

No quorum voting.

Mr. MORROW. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. BIGGS, but voted on this call, having reserved the right to do so in order to make a quorum.

Mr. LYNCH. I have voted "ay" on this question, but am paired with the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. STONE. He would have voted "no," if present.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire to withdraw his vote?

Mr. LYNCH. I have just been informed that Mr. STONE is paired with another gentleman. I will therefore allow my vote to stand.

Mr. RICHARDSON. My colleagues, Mr. ENLOE and Mr. WASHINGTON, are detained at their homes on account of sickness.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am paired with the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. STONE, on all political questions. I have voted "ay" on this question, having reserved the right to vote to make a quorum, and believing this to be a patriotic question.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I am paired with the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. TILLMAN, but reserved the right to vote to make a quorum.

Mr. YOST. I am paired with the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. SNYDER, with the understanding that the pair should not prevent a vote if necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. RICE. I am paired with the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. BROWNE, and withdraw my vote.

Mr. WARNER. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. MANSUR, but voted to make a quorum.

Mr. BREWER. I desire to inquire whether the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. BLOUNT, has voted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. BREWER. I suppose he considers that our pair is still existing, although I understand he has returned. I will withdraw my vote, however.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I was not present when my name was called or I should have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. WEAVER. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I think we had better have the vote recapitulated.

The Clerk recapitulated the names of those voting.

Mr. BREWER. Mr. Speaker, I find upon an examination of the pair between the gentleman from Georgia and myself that the right is reserved to vote to make a quorum. I will, therefore, permit my vote to stand.

The following pairs were announced for this day:

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, with Mr. HOUK.

Mr. WHITTHORNE with Mr. PERKINS.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, with Mr. HOPKINS, of New York.

The following were announced as being paired on all political questions until further notice:

Mr. MCCLAMMY with Mr. WOODBURN.

Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL with Mr. COOPER.

Mr. MCSHANE with Mr. YARDLEY.

Mr. WASHINGTON with Mr. FINLEY.

Mr. HUTTON with Mr. SEYMOUR.

Mr. WILKINS with Mr. PUGSLEY.

Mr. CATCHINGS with Mr. MCCORMICK.

Mr. PEEL with Mr. RUSSELL, of Connecticut.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi, with Mr. DE LANO.

Mr. HATCH with Mr. STEWART, of Vermont.

Mr. HUDD with Mr. ARNOLD.

Mr. MCMILLIN with Mr. BURROWS.

Mr. JONES with Mr. BOUND.

Mr. BUCKALEW with Mr. BAYNE.

Mr. LANE with Mr. KERR.

Mr. YOST with Mr. SNYDER.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, with Mr. BROWN, of Ohio.

Mr. HEMPHILL with Mr. GALLINGER.

Mr. HOGG with Mr. HOLMES.

Mr. VANCE with Mr. WICKHAM.

Mr. CUTCHEON with Mr. TARSNEY.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL with Mr. BOWDEN.

Mr. MCKINNEY with Mr. OSBORNE.

Mr. HALL with Mr. LAIDLAW.

Mr. CARLTON with Mr. MOFFITT.

Mr. HARE with Mr. PLUMB.

Mr. HOWARD with Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois.

Mr. CRISP with Mr. ROWELL.

Mr. MANSUR with Mr. WARNER.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia, with Mr. REED.

Mr. FORD with Mr. STEELE.

Mr. LODGE with Mr. BURNETT.

Mr. MORSE with Mr. WHITING, of Massachusetts.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Alabama, with Mr. PATTON.

Mr. COLLINS with Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts.

Mr. MONTGOMERY with Mr. HUNTER.

Mr. BLANCHARD with Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois.

Mr. ROBERTSON with Mr. DORSEY.

Mr. WILLIAMS with Mr. STONE, of Missouri.

Mr. PERRY with Mr. SPOONER.

Mr. CLARDY with Mr. WADE.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas, with Mr. DUNHAM.

Mr. ROWLAND with Mr. NICHOLS.

Mr. LATHAM with Mr. KENNEDY.

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia, with Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR.

Mr. DARGAN with Mr. WEST.

Mr. BOUTELLE with Mr. WISE.

Mr. RANDALL with Mr. KELLEY.

Mr. GROSVENOR with Mr. ENLOE.

Mr. HAYDEN with Mr. HERBERT.

Mr. COX with Mr. BAKER, of New York.

Mr. BLOUNT with Mr. BREWER.

Mr. COTHRAN with Mr. LONG.

The following were announced as being paired on all questions until further notice:

Mr. GREENMAN with Mr. SHERMAN.

Mr. COMPTON with Mr. GOFF.

Mr. FISHER with Mr. KEAN.

Mr. CLEMENTS with Mr. KETCHAM.

Mr. BIGGS with Mr. MORROW.

Mr. BELMONT with Mr. DAVENPORT.

Mr. SCOTT with Mr. CLARK.

Mr. OATES with Mr. GUENTHER.

Mr. PIDCOCK with Mr. HIRES.

Mr. GRANGER with Mr. ROCKWELL.

Mr. GLOVER with Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana.

Mr. TILLMAN with Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas.

Mr. O'FERRALL with Mr. MASON.

Mr. TARSNEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a brief statement.

Mr. MORRILL. Regular order.

Mr. TARSNEY. I wish to state that I am paired with my colleague [Mr. CUTCHEON], who is absent on account of sickness. I did not vote when my name was called; but wish to state that I should have voted in favor of the resolution if permitted to do so.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. No quorum has voted.

Mr. COOPER and Mr. PAYSON. I move a call of the House.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, who made the point of no quorum?

The SPEAKER. The point of no quorum was not made; it appears of record by the vote which has just been taken. The gentleman from Illinois moves a call of the House.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following-named members failed to answer to their names:

Mr. PAYSON. I offer the following resolution——
The SPEAKER. The Chair will announce the result of the call of the House.
Mr. BREWER. I desire to announce that my colleague, Mr. CUTCHEON, is absent on account of sickness, and has leave of absence.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman has leave of absence.
Mr. MCADOO. I desire to answer to this roll-call. I was not present when the last vote was taken, and consequently did not vote. If I had been present, I should have voted "ay."
The SPEAKER. Upon this call of the roll 174 gentlemen have answered to their names.
Mr. SPRINGER. I move——
The SPEAKER. The hour for the consideration of the resolution called up by the gentleman from Kansas has expired, and a quorum has answered to this call.
Mr. SPRINGER. I move——
The SPEAKER. The House is operating under a call of the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that all further proceedings under the call of the House be dispensed with.

The question was put, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to offer a privileged report.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. As I understand, the previous question was ordered on the resolution which was called up.

The SPEAKER. The previous question was not ordered; it was demanded, and the point of no quorum was made, and when the question comes up again the question will be on ordering the previous question.

Mr. CANNON. I rise to a question of privilege on the resolution which has been reported and considered in the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state the ground upon which that is a question of privilege.

Mr. CANNON. It is a proposition to change the rules of the House pro tanto in so far as it goes, and therefore I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that all propositions touching the rules shall be referred to the Committee on Rules under Rule XI. Then in the Digest it is stated that reports from this committee touching the rules are privileged questions.

Mr. McMILLIN. But this does not come from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CANNON. Propositions coming from the committee lay over a day under clause 1 of Rule XXVIII. The question of a day for the consideration of business reported from particular committees is in order at any time as a privileged question for the reason "that the adoption of the resolution would be pro tanto a change of the rules, and that the proper method of making any such change is upon a report from the Committee on Rules." This I find in the Journal of the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress, which I hold in my hand, and I will read so much of it as bears upon this subject. This is from the Journal of July 10, 1886:

Mr. Morrison, as a privileged question from the Committee on Rules, to which was referred a resolution fixing a day for the consideration of business reported from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported the same with the following amendment in the nature of a substitute therefor, namely:

Resolved, That Tuesday, the 13th day of July, immediately after the reading of the Journal, be, and is hereby, set apart for the consideration of such business as may be presented by the Committee on Ways and Means, not to include any bill raising revenue; and if any bill shall be under consideration and not disposed of when the House adjourns on that day the consideration of such bill shall continue from day to day immediately after the reading of the Journal until disposed of.

Mr. Hewitt made the point of order that the report of the committee was not of a privileged character, being a proposition to set apart a single day for the consideration of a certain class of business, and therefore not a rule which must be general in its character.

The Speaker pro tempore (Mr. CRISP) overruled the point of order upon the ground that the adoption of the resolution would be pro tanto a change of the rules, and that the proper method of making such a change was upon a report from the Committee on Rules.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is true that this resolution which I have just read was not reported by the Committee on Rules, but the resolution now under consideration was regularly introduced in the House and by a majority of the House was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, although under the rules of the House and in the absence of the action of a majority it would have gone to the Committee on Rules. The Committee on Invalid Pensions considered the resolution, and they reported it back. It is the proposition to change the rules that is privileged—it is the subject-matter, not the particular committee that may report it. Although the resolution may have gone to the Committee on the Militia, or any other committee, when it is reported back and contains a proposition to change the rules it at once becomes a matter of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has had occasion to decide this question before. Propositions which relate to a change of the rules are in order at any time for presentation; but the Chair decided in the Forty-ninth Congress, upon a resolution in relation to a report from the Committee on Education, that although they were in order for presentation, yet they must go to the Committee on Rules, and if they were reported back by that committee, then they were privileged for immediate consideration, but if they went to any other committee this privilege did not attach to them.

The Chair also decided, in the case of the oleomargarine bill, which was reported from the Committee on Agriculture, although it was a revenue bill, that while the committee had the right to have it considered as a preferred measure when the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, yet the privilege of reporting it for immediate consideration did not belong to that committee, but belonged to the Committee on Ways and Means. The Chair will cause that clause of the rule to be read, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will observe that the privilege of reporting for immediate consideration in the cases alluded to is a privilege which belongs to the committee under the rule, and the uniform practice has been to give the same privilege to the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk will read the forty-ninth clause of Rule XI.

The Clerk read as follows:

The following-named committees shall have leave to report at any time on the matters herein stated, namely: The Committee on Elections, on the right of a member to his seat; the Committee on Ways and Means, on bills raising revenue; the committees having jurisdiction of appropriations, the general appropriation bills; the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors; the Committee on Public Lands, bills for the forfeiture of land grants to railroads and other corporations, bills preventing speculation in the public lands, and bills for the reservation of the public lands for the benefit of actual and bona fide settlers; the Committee on Enrolled Bills, enrolled bills; the Committee on Printing, on all matters referred to them of printing for the use of the House or two Houses; the Committee on Accounts, on all matters of expenditure of the contingent fund of the House. Any commission authorized by law to report by bill to the House shall have leave to report such bill at any time, and may call the same up for consideration as provided in the fifth clause of Rule XXIV.

The SPEAKER. Even if this resolution had been referred to the Committee on Rules and had been reported back from that committee in the morning hour, which is set apart for reports under the rules of the House, then, under another rule, it would have lost its privileged character and would have gone to the Calendar. This resolution was in fact reported back from the Committee on Invalid Pensions in the morning hour, and took its place on the Calendar, under the rule which the Clerk will now read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Rule XXIV, clause 3:

"On all days other than Monday as soon as the business on the Speaker's table has been disposed of, and on all Mondays (except the first and third in each month) after the call of States and Territories, there shall be a morning hour for reports from committees, which shall be appropriately referred and printed, and a copy thereof mailed by the Public Printer to each Member and Delegate."

The SPEAKER. "Which shall be appropriately referred"—that is to say, whenever a resolution, even though it might otherwise be privileged, is reported during the morning hour, under the positive language of this rule it must be referred and must take its place on the Calendar; and, under another rule, bills and resolutions upon the Calendar are to be called in their regular order. In other words, they lose their privilege by being reported in that hour, even if they would otherwise be privileged. The Chair therefore holds that this is not now a privileged matter.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced the approval of bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. 1612) to provide for holding terms of the United States district and circuit courts in the State of Nebraska;

An act (H. R. 5067) establishing additional aids to navigation at the mouth of the Mississippi River;

An act (H. R. 5259) to relieve Jacob B. Bostatter from the charge of fraudulent enlistment; and

An act (H. R. 1508) to relieve certain appointed or enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps from the charge of desertion.

The list of approved bills was accompanied by the following note:

The following bills, heretofore by clerical mistake reported to the House of Representatives as having been approved by the President, were presented to him on July 31, 1888, and not having been returned to the House of Congress in which they originated within the ten days prescribed by the Constitution, the same have become laws without his signature:

H. R. No. 9595, an act granting a pension to David A. Yeaw; and

H. R. No. 9731, an act granting a pension to William A. Humes.

PURCHASES OF FELT FOR GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to submit a privileged report from the Committee on Printing.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee have considered the resolution of Mr. BUCHANAN introduced into the House on August 13, and referred to this committee. It is as follows:

"Whereas the New York Press of August 8 makes the following allegations:

"BUYING PRINTING FELT OF ENGLAND.

"Not content with buying their blankets abroad the Press is reliably informed that the Democratic Administration is now buying its felt for printing of England. Here is what Dr. J. B. Thompson, a manufacturer of chemicals and dye stuff, says on the subject:

"'This Democratic Administration imports a poor quality of felt for printing use from England, and pays more than it would to home dealers. The facts are these: The felt used to be purchased of Tingue, Howe & Co., of Port Chester, N. Y. The place of purchase has undergone a change within a year or so, and the Government Printer buys of Englishmen. He pays $1.60 a yard more than he would here for a much inferior article. Of course the Government has to pay no duty on its own purchases, and perhaps it is for this reason that it turns aside from helping the manufacturers of its own country.'

"Therefore,

"Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be, and hereby is, directed to investigate the facts in the case, and make report thereof to this House."

The committee addressed a letter at once to the Public Printer, inclosing the resolution, and asked for the facts in the case. He promptly appeared and submitted a statement in writing in reply to the resolution. His statement is as follows:

"GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE,
"Washington, D. C., August 16, 1888.

"SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication, inclosing a resolution of the House of Representatives, of August 13, 1888, introduced by Mr. BUCHANAN, of New Jersey, in which is quoted an article from the New York Press of August 8, which article alleges that 'the Democratic Administration is now buying its felt for printing in England,' and further 'that the place of purchase has undergone a change within a year or so, and the Government Printer buys of Englishmen,' and 'he pays $1.60 a yard more than he would here for a much inferior article.'

"In response to the resolution of Congress, I would state that the only 'felt for printing' (or any other purpose) purchased by the Public Printer during the fiscal year past was as follows, as shown by the books of this office:

March 8, 1888, five rolls 2½-inch felt	$22.50
April 3, 1888, six yards 55-inch felt	40.50
April 18, 1888, one blanket, 84x72 inches	23.92
June 6, 1888, five yards 72-inch cloth	43.57
Total	130.49

"In explanation of the above accounts, it may be said that felt blankets have practically gone out of use on modern printing presses, and that but a few yards of felt blanketing are purchased each year for use in this office on a half dozen or so hand-presses used in taking proofs. A small quantity of narrow felt rolls is also purchased for use in wrapping angle rollers where a heavy ink is to be used. All of this felt was purchased from the house of R. Hoe & Co., 504 Grand street, New York, who are among the largest and most reputable dealers in printing material in this country.

"As the resolution referred to, with the appended quotation from a partisan newspaper, seems to call in question the practice of this office under the present administration in the matter of patriotic regard for American interests, I desire to state in the most emphatic manner that I have endeavored to make the Government Printing Office thoroughly representative of American skill, progress, and intelligence; and that I have not only declined to purchase any material whatever of foreign manufacture, where the purchases of this office came under my especial direction, but that I have abolished the distinction in favor of English book-cloths that prevailed under my predecessors, by which the contract specifications of the office required bidders upon several grades of cloth to bid yearly upon English cloth as the standard of quality.

"In the yearly-contract specifications prepared by me the word 'English,' heretofore used in the specifications prepared by my predecessors, was stricken out, thus doing away with a discrimination disadvantageous to American manufacturers and disparaging to American skill and enterprise. In the small matters of writing-inks, lead pencils, and various small goods, which in the aggregate amount to a considerable sum, I have also insisted upon the disuse of imported goods and the purchase of the native article, believing that the interests of economy and efficiency would both be promoted thereby.

"As also bearing upon the subject of inquiry by the committee, I will state that, in the necessary reductions of force in this office since assuming charge of it as Public Printer, I have been careful to give preference to citizens, either native born or naturalized, in the matter of retention, and that a number of aliens were selected for discharge solely for the reason that their neglect or failure to take the proper steps to become citizens was, in my opinion, a disqualification for position in the public service. I have observed the same principle in the case of all appointments, insisting upon citizenship as a necessary qualification for any position within my control.

"Trusting that this brief statement of facts may meet the purpose of your committee, and of Congress in adopting the resolution of inquiry, I have the honor to be,

"Your obedient servant,

"TH. E. BENEDICT, Public Printer.

"Hon. JAMES D. RICHARDSON, Chairman Committee on Printing, House of Representatives."

The committee have examined into the question. This letter of the Public Printer gives all the facts in the case. The committee are of opinion that the adoption of the resolution is altogether unnecessary, as they do not believe any other facts exist or could be developed by further investigation. They recommend that the resolution lie on the table.

Mr. CANNON (interrupting the reading of the report). I wish to call attention to the fact that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN], who offered this resolution, is absent from the House to-day, but will be back, I understand, within a day or two.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not think the resolution will provoke any discussion.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know anything about it.

A MEMBER. Let the report be printed in the RECORD and lie over. [Cries of "Read!" "Read!" and "Regular order!"]

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the report.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I make the motion that the resolution lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. KILGORE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 4659) for the relief of George M. Ochiltree;

A bill (H. R. 1321) for the erection of a marine hospital at Evansville, Ind.; and

A bill (H. R. 1060) prescribing the time for sales and for notice of sales of property in the District of Columbia for overdue taxes.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. ARNOLD, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence indefinitely, on account of important business.

MARY M. BRIGGS.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. I rise to submit a privileged report. I present the report of a committee of conference, and ask its consideration now.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 899) for the relief of Mary M. Briggs, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment and agree to an amendment as follows: Before the word "pension," where it last occurs, insert the word "widow's;" and the Senate agree to the same.

CARLOS FRENCH,
A. C. THOMPSON,
Managers on the part of the House.
PHILETUS SAWYER,
C. K. DAVIS,
D. TURPIE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Does any statement of the House conferees accompany this report?

The SPEAKER. There seems to be none.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The rules require such a statement, and it is desirable we should have it that we may understand the effect of the amendment recommended.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. Unless the written statement is insisted upon, I can state the case very briefly.

Mr. MCMILLIN. That will be sufficient.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. THOMPSON] will make his statement.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. This lady is now receiving a pension of $12 a month as the widow of a soldier; but she was an army nurse, having served as such through the war. She is now sixty-seven years of age, and the committee of conference believe it no more than just that her present pension should be increased to $25 a month, being $12 as the widow of a soldier, and $13 as an army nurse, the latter sum being the amount usually allowed to army nurses by the Committee on Invalid Pensions of this House.

Mr. MCMILLIN. What was the amendment of the House?

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. The amendment of the House proposed to cut down the amount from $25 to $12 a month; but I do not think the House committee knew at the time—certainly I did not—that this lady was the widow of a soldier and was receiving a pension as such. We simply undertook to pension her as an army nurse. The committee of conference believe that, in view of the circumstances, and by reason of her services as a nurse during the war, her total pension should be $25 a month.

The question being taken on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference, there were—ayes 52, noes 11.

Mr. HOOKER. No quorum.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw this report for the present; we will endeavor to assist him after a while in getting the matter through.

The SPEAKER. The point being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. THOMPSON] and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER].

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw this report for the present. It can be presented at any time.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. I will withdraw the report for the present. I ask that it lie on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. It is privileged; and the gentleman can call it up at any time.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, on the vote taken a few moments ago, I voted in the negative; but I did so inadvertently, being paired with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]. I desire that my vote be withdrawn and the correction made.

The SPEAKER. The change will be made.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. SPRINGER, there were—ayes 32, noes 28.

Mr. LYMAN. No quorum.

Mr. SPRINGER. I want to make a statement to the House.

Mr. BAYNE. I trust the gentleman will withdraw his proposition. [Laughter.]

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. SPRINGER and Mr. LYMAN were appointed as tellers.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. The regular order having been demanded, the Chair can not recognize the gentleman.

The tellers proceeded to make their count.

Mr. SPRINGER (before the result of the count by tellers was announced) said: I desire to make a statement. [Cries of "Regular order!"] I withdraw the motion to go into Committee of the Whole. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] desires to make the motion that the House go into Committee of the Whole on general appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] withdraws his motion.

Mr. BURNES. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BURNES, there were—ayes 54, noes 5.

Mr. LYMAN. No quorum.

Mr. HOOKER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being—ayes 13, noes 36; more than one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

The question was taken; and no quorum voted, there being—yeas 142, nays 3, not voting 179; as follows:

No quorum voted.

During the roll-call,

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Alabama, and Mr. MCKENNA asked whether a quorum had voted, and, finding that no quorum had voted they recorded their votes, although they were paired.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BURNES. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. HOOKER. Is the point of no quorum insisted upon?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The fact no quorum has voted is a matter of record, and the Chair is compelled to take notice of it. It does not require that anybody shall insist upon the point of no quorum.

Mr. BURNES's motion was agreed to; and a call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. One hundred and fifty-five members only have responded; not a quorum.
Mr. WEAVER. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. WEAVER. I wish to ask if it would be now in order to move to revoke all leaves of absence granted by the House.
The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is always in the power of the House to compel the attendance of its absent members.
Mr. WEAVER. Then I give notice that I will make that motion immediately after the reading of the Journal in the morning as a privileged motion.
Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as we are so near a quorum, I feel that it is proper to resort to the usual means to see if we can not secure the few members necessary to enable us to proceed with the public business.
The SPEAKER. But three motions are now in order—to dispense with further proceedings under the call, to compel the attendance of absentees, or to adjourn.
Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. I wish to ask that Mr. BLANCHARD be excused from attendance on account of sickness.
There was no objection.
Mr. BURNES was recognized.
Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask a further question.
Mr. BURNES. I now send to the desk a resolution which I ask to have read.
The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.
The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms take into custody and bring to the bar of the House such of its members as are now absent without leave of the House.

Mr. MCMILLIN. If my friend from Missouri will hear me for a moment——
Mr. BURNES. Certainly.
Mr. MCMILLIN. It is now within five minutes of 3 o'clock, and I think it very unlikely that we could secure the attendance of a quorum much before 5 o'clock. By order of the House we must adjourn at that hour; and unless the gentleman is anxious to press the motion, I would suggest that he yield to a motion to adjourn. I will not of course press the suggestion against his wishes.
Mr. BURNES. My great respect for the gentleman from Tennessee makes me very desirous of accepting his suggestion, but, as I understand it, we lack but about ten of a quorum, and we may get that number in a few minutes by an effort.
Mr. MCMILLIN. I have no desire to press the suggestion.
Mr. WEAVER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry: To know whether a motion would be now in order to revoke all leaves of absence?
The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is always a matter of privilege. The House has the undoubted right at all times to take such steps as are necessary to secure the attendance of its own members.

Mr. WEAVER. Then I make the motion that all leaves of absence heretofore granted to members of the House, except in cases of sickness, be revoked; and that the Sergeant-at-Arms be required to give notice immediately to all members of this action of the House.

The SPEAKER. If the leaves of absence are revoked, then the resolution of the gentleman from Missouri will cover the remainder of the motion.

Mr. WEAVER. Very well.

Mr. CONGER. Is such a motion in order now, or is it in order to consider the motion without a quorum?

The SPEAKER. It is. That is the very purpose sought to be accomplished by the motion. The House finds itself without a quorum and takes such steps as are necessary to secure the attendance of its absent members. It is always within the power of the House to take the necessary steps to enable it to proceed with the public business.

Mr. DIBBLE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DIBBLE. What is the pending motion? Is it not the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES]?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] is of higher privilege than the motion made by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I would suggest to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] that there is a quorum in the city, and that we may have a sufficient number to-morrow. Many members have gone away with the leave of the House, and I think it would be an injustice to them if we can get a sufficient number present to proceed in the course he suggests.

Mr. WEAVER. We are unable to transact the public business in the present condition of the House. If there is a quorum in the city it is the duty and business of the members to be here; and it is the duty of this House to require the attendance of those members. Therefore I shall insist on this motion.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I do not believe it is necessary to send the Sergeant-at-Arms all over the United States to bring back members to this House if a quorum is within the city. I think to obtain those who are in the city will serve the purpose just as well——

Mr. WEAVER. No, it will not.

Mr. MILLIKEN. As to bring them here from all over the country?

Mr. WEAVER. It will not, sir. Suppose we have a quorum here, and one, two, or three, or half a dozen members refuse to vote, they can absolutely tie the proceedings of the House and stop the business in which sixty millions of people have the deepest interest. They are doing it now.

Mr. MILLIKEN. There has never been an entirely full House here since this Congress convened, and I do not think it is necessary to bring every member of this House here from all over the country. It is not necessary and never has been necessary.

Mr. WEAVER. If you have the right to require one to be present you have the right to require all to be here.

Mr. MILLIKEN. It is entirely impracticable.

Mr. MCKENNA. Mr. Speaker, I desire that my colleague [Mr. THOMPSON] be excused, because he has recently recovered from sickness and is yet indisposed.

There was no objection, and Mr. THOMPSON, of California, was excused.

Mr. CRISP. I hope the House will consider the matter before a vote is reached upon the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa. Desirable as it is to have all the members here, and necessary as it is, we ought not to be unjust. We have granted to those gentlemen leave of absence. They have gone home upon that leave, and now, without any notice whatever, to revoke that leave of absence and put them in the attitude of being absent from the House without its leave strikes me as unjust, and so unjust that I do not think it ought to be insisted upon.

Mr. WEAVER. I would state that I presume my motion is amendable, and you can make it so that it will operate five days hence; so that the leave of absence will be revoked and members be required to appear within five days.

Mr. DIBBLE. I would ask my friend from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] to withdraw his motion until the prior motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] is put; because while we are discussing this probably we will get ten more members present, all required to make a quorum. If the motion to instruct the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring in absent members should pass, then the gentleman from Iowa could renew his motion while a quorum is being obtained, and we will save the remaining two hours of this day.

Mr. WEAVER. As my motion is a privileged motion I could do that; but if we had a quorum here we could not hold them five minutes. Such has been our experience here for a week. Upon a call of the House a quorum appears. Such was the case to-day and yesterday, and then immediately upon a yea-and-nay vote on an important pending measure we had no quorum.

Mr. DIBBLE. I would suggest to my friend from Iowa, with his leave, that if a quorum is obtained and afterwards the resolution offered by my friend is adopted we will hold them here.

Mr. PETERS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PETERS. Is the motion of the gentleman from Iowa subject to amendment.

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. PETERS. Then I move that it be amended so as to take effect on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa, as the Chair understood him to say, modified his motion, that if it be agreed to, it is ordered to take effect in five days. The gentleman from Kansas moves that it be so amended that it shall take effect on Monday next.

Mr. PETERS. As the gentleman from Iowa has agreed to amend his motion so that it takes effect five days hence, I withdraw my motion.

Mr. BLOUNT rose.

Mr. WEAVER. I have the floor I believe, have I not, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. WEAVER. I will yield the floor to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] to make a statement.

Mr. BLOUNT. The suggestion I wanted to make was that I do not think it right to adopt the harsh measure proposed by the gentleman from Iowa. We are now in the middle of August. If an adjournment were to take place at this time it would have been an extraordinarily long session. This House would now be prepared to adjourn were it not for the question of the tariff now pending in the Senate in all probability. We have done a vast amount of work during the session. The condition of the business of the House and the lateness of the session has brought about many leaves of absence. It does seem to me that, because we find ourselves just now unable to get a quorum, it would be a harsh measure to compel the presence of members now absent, and I do trust that we are not going to revoke these leaves of absence. As has been suggested by my friend, Judge PETERS, many of these members have gone to their homes; many on important business, and others on account of sickness, and to force them back here I do not think would be just; and the exigencies surrounding us now do not require any such action. We could get through with the remaining appropriation bills and adjourn in three days if it were not for the condition of business in the Senate.

Mr. MCMILLIN. We can do it at any time in three days.

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly; the House can put itself in condition to agree to an adjournment in three days. To adopt such a resolution as that proposed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] strikes me as unseemly at this time, and for one I will not vote to send for absent members under such circumstances.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, the suggestion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] that it is unseemly for this House to require the attendance of its members to transact important business is certainly not the result of due reflection upon the part of that gentleman. Why, sir, we have any amount of important business here. If this House were ready to adjourn it would adjourn, or it would pass a resolution inviting the Senate to concur in fixing a day for adjournment; but it is not ready. The idea that there is no important business to transact! Why, sir, the one bill in the interest of which I am making this motion, the bill to organize the Territory of Oklahoma [laughter]—yes, it sounds well to hear gentlemen laugh, when there are five hundred thousand homeless people in this country who are praying for an opportunity to settle upon the public domain in accordance with law; who are seeking a home and a shelter for their little ones. It is a nice thing for gentlemen to sneer and laugh.

Mr. PETERS. And when citizens of the United States are being killed in No Man's Land, where there is no law to punish the murderers.

Mr. WEAVER. Yes. Mr. Speaker, I undertake to say that no more important bill than this has been before this House, and the passage of it has been petitioned for by five hundred thousand of the laboring people of this country who are without homes and who want to obtain them in this country which is now fenced and occupied by cattle syndicates. This House is now in a position where three or four men who are fighting here, not in the interest of the people, but in the interest of prejudices—to draw it mildly—have it in their power to prevent the consideration of this bill, and I want the country to understand that many of its Representatives who are drawing their salaries are absent at their homes trying to secure a re-election instead of attending to the business that demands our attention now.

I now withdraw my motion in order that the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] may be first put, but I give notice that I shall then renew my motion.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES].

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I was struck with the justice of the remarks made by my friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT]. This has been an extraordinary session. Much hard work has been done, and we are now at the usual time for adjournment. Gentlemen who are away are most of them paired, and there is no doubt that we have a quorum in the city, so that I think we ought to be able to do business without disturbing gentlemen who have obtained leave of absence after having been in close attendance and hard at work here for six months. I am opposed to the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER], and I shall move to lay it on the table, however it may be amended.

Mr. WEAVER. I will take a yea-and-nay vote on that.

Mr. COGSWELL. You can have it. You kept us here filibustering for days on the funding bill.

The motion of Mr. BURNES was agreed to—ayes 70, noes 3.

Mr. WEAVER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion.

Mr. COX. I move to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. DIBBLE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DIBBLE. How many members have leaves of absence?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised by the Clerk that sixty-five members of the House are absent on leave.

Mr. PARKER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PARKER. Can this motion be adopted, under objection, without a quorum?

The SPEAKER. The very object of the motion is to secure the attendance of a quorum. The Constitution provides that the Speaker and fifteen members of the House may adjourn from time to time and compel the attendance of absent members.

Mr. PARKER. I mean the motion to revoke leaves of absence.

The SPEAKER. That is simply one method of compelling the attendance of absent members.

Mr. FELTON. It is fair to say to the gentleman from Iowa that if his resolution should pass it would be very unjust to some of the absentees. For instance, my colleague, Mr. BIGGS, has returned home by leave of the House on account of sickness, and he could not get back here in five days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] moves to revoke all leaves of absence, the revocation to take effect at the expiration of five days from this time. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] moves to lay the motion of the gentleman from Iowa on the table.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from New York can not take the gentleman from Iowa off the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is off the floor.

Mr. SPRINGER. But he has a right to debate the motion.

The SPEAKER. Yes; but the gentleman has not proposed to debate it.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] rises now to debate it.

The SPEAKER. Then he is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WEAVER. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I am in favor of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Iowa, to revoke all leaves of absence after five days from this time, except those granted on account of sickness. It seems to me that no more reasonable proposition could be made to this House. We find ourselves in the middle of August, toward the end of summer, with a bare quorum of members in the city, so that whenever one or two members desire to obstruct the business of the House, they have it in their power to do so by demanding a quorum. We are in a condition where we can not do anything except by unanimous consent, whereas if the members who have been elected to this House would give us their presence, we could have a quorum to transact the public business, which is necessary to be done and which could be done in a short time.

Mr. BLOUNT. Can the gentleman tell us how many members have leave of absence?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has just stated that there are 65.

Mr. BLOUNT. I asked the gentleman from Illinois to state how many there are absent, because he had just stated that two or three men could prevent the transaction of business here.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is not that true?

Mr. BLOUNT. If there are only 65 members who have leave of absence it is a very plain proposition that it is not true.

A MEMBER. Where are all the rest of our members?

Mr. SPRINGER. I think the gentleman's inquiry is very pertinent. I think it is time we were inquiring where the members of this House are.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I presume they are at home seeking renomination or looking after their fences.

Mr. JACKSON. Where were they when the pension question was voted on?

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the Assistant Sergeant-at-Arms that there are at least 150 members of this House who are not now in the city. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. DOUGHERTY] says they are at home seeking renomination.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I desire to have the gentleman quote me correctly. I said I presumed that most of them were at home seeking renomination or looking after their "fences." And in that connection, and in the line of the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] I would suggest to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] that when he makes an exception in favor of members absent by order of the House, he should also except those who are at home seeking renomination or looking about to keep up their "fences."

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope no such exception will be made.

Mr. WEAVER. I have "fences" as well as other gentlemen; but my friends will look after my "fences" while I am here.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish that gentlemen who are desirous of renomination could realize that the best course for obtaining a renomination is to remain on this floor and attend to the public business. I have been renominated by acclamation eight times; and I never left this House one moment to seek a renomination. [Applause.] I hope that example will be followed by gentlemen who have gone home thinking that they can get a renomination by disregarding the public business and looking to their private affairs.

Mr. BLOUNT. My friend from Illinois will allow me to suggest to him that he may do great injustice to many honorable gentlemen by throwing out this reflection on absentees. Many of those who are away have already been renominated, and they are absent on account of important business or by reason of sickness. I think it is about time that this sort of stuff should stop.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not desire to reflect on anybody, and I have uttered no "stuff." [Laughter.] If the gentleman from Georgia will possess his soul in patience he will find me as far from doing injustice to honorable gentlemen as himself.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think probably the gentleman does not understand himself so well as others do who have heard his late remarks.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman from Georgia were as courteous as his long service here ought to have taught him to be——

Mr. BLOUNT. I certainly do not mean any discourtesy, unless it is discourteous to say that my friend has made an error in his statement. That is the extent to which I have gone.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is certainly discourteous to say that a member of the House talks "stuff." [Laughter.] I have to teach these old members parliamentary propriety.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think the gentleman needs instruction himself in many matters.

Mr. SPRINGER. And it is also discourteous to continue to interrupt a gentleman occupying the floor, when he has only a few minutes.

I was about to say that, in the interest of the dispatch of the public business, I do hope that the proceedings which have taken place here this afternoon will admonish all members of this House who are absent from their seats here that they owe it to themselves and to the public service to return as soon as their "important business" will permit them to do so.

I do not suppose the revocation of these leaves of absence will do anybody injustice, while it may have the effect of suggesting to these gentlemen to put in some other excuse, and to see whether they can not make the same sacrifices which we here are all making and return to this Hall. I am satisfied there are quite a number of gentlemen who might be here, but who are now taking their ease at the sea-shore or at some country places. I hope those gentlemen have sufficiently recovered their health by this time to enable them to return to this House, and allow us to discharge the business which remains to be done; for there are many things here which ought to be attended to before the adjournment of Congress. I am very anxious that the public business should be dispatched as early as possible, and that we may return to our constituents; and then, if there are any "fences" to be mended or renominations to be looked after, we shall have our own time in which to attend to such matters.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman will allow me to say that there are 260 members of the House who have not leave of absence.

Mr. WEAVER. I yield now to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. JACKSON. Before the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIAMS] proceeds, I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] whether he can suggest any excuse for members on his side who this morning sat in their seats and declined to vote, and left us without a quorum, when the question of fixing a day for the consideration of general pension legislation was before the House?

Mr. CARUTH. That has "nothing to do with the case." [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I agree with the gentleman from Georgia that there has been a great deal of important legislation passed during this session of Congress. I also agree with the gentleman from Iowa that there are now pending important bills which ought to be attended to, and one among such bills, I concede, is the bill to organize the Territory of Oklahoma.

Among the number of bills, Mr. Speaker, now pending in this House are the pension bills reported by the Invalid Pensions Committee. Our petition-box is full of petitions from all over the nation asking for the passage of the dependent-pension and the service-pension bills. But when the question comes up and the Invalid Pensions Committee asks the House to designate a day for the consideration of these pension bills, how do we find our friends on the other side voting? Some of them, who are very quick to oppose the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] when the question comes up in reference to the consideration of setting apart a day for these pension bills, remain silent in their seats in order to break a quorum, and when questioned as to their conduct reply by saying that it is a matter of no consequence, and that it has nothing to do with the best interests of the country. There are a number of gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber who believe that pensioning the old soldiers of the war of 1861 "is a matter of no consequence" and has nothing to do with the public business.

We on this side of the House expect to emphasize their opposition in that regard. Call in your members therefore from the sea-side. Call in those who have gone home to their districts to canvass for their renominations and their re-elections to seats on this floor. I am told in the "solid South" the "political fences" do not need much fixing, that it is only a matter "of counting out," but that is a question I will not now discuss. Bring back your absent members. Let them remain in their seats, and let them record their votes like men. If they are opposed to more liberal pensions for the old soldiers, let them say so. Let them vote against the bills, and then let the Democratic party remain forever silent on the subject of their friendship for the Union soldiers. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, it is our duty upon this floor to take a calm, considerate, and dispassionate view of the circumstances by which we are confronted, and to take such action as may be deemed just and proper. It is true we are beset here in this hot season of the year by precisely the same difficulties which have met all other Congresses which have been in session during the month of August. We must take cognizance of that fact when we consider the question which has been presented. In my judgment it is not at all necessary to indulge in any unseemly criticism of members who for one reason and another are absent temporarily from the sitting of the House.

What is the condition in which we find ourselves? Reference has been made to the number of members who are absent by leave of the House. And it is proposed to revoke that leave of absence. But there are 240 members of the House who have no leave of absence, and many of whom are absent without leave.

Several MEMBERS. Two hundred and sixty.

Mr. McMILLIN. The number I am told is 260. If we adopt this order of revocation in reference to leaves of absence already given, it can not affect those members who have no leave of absence.

It is clear we are here for three or four weeks yet of this session, and there is ample time in which to do a good deal of work if we are only so disposed. The day before yesterday we had no quorum, and yet yesterday we managed to do a good deal of work, although there was no quorum present. All we have to do is to act calmly and we will be able to get along much better, and probably will do more work, than by attempting to force the presence of members who are temporarily absent by leave of the House.

The fact that some members have declined to vote has been commented upon by different members. I am, for one, paired with a distinguished member of the other side of the House, who is off making political speeches. I have not seen fit during his absence to violate my pair with him, and I will not do it.

Mr. WEAVER. Has not my friend in express terms agreed in his pair to vote when it is necessary to make a quorum?

Mr. McMILLIN. I do not remember exactly what the language of the pair is, but I have paired with him, and when I paired with him I did so under the impression that I would not vote, and I have not therefore done so.

Mr. WEAVER. That is all right, of course.

Mr. McMILLIN. I am not going to violate my pair; that is not my way of doing business.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I saw you vote this morning.

Mr. McMILLIN. Yes, you did see me vote this morning, forgetting my pair, and you also saw me a minute afterwards, when I remembered it, going up and having my vote withdrawn.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I did not see the gentleman make the correction, but I have no doubt it is as he states it.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman ought to have taken pains to see all that occurred before he undertook to make the statement he has done.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I can not afford to watch you all the time. I saw you vote, but I did not see you afterwards make the correction which you say you did make. I have no doubt it was just as you state it.

Mr. McMILLIN. You saw me vote, and I am glad the gentleman called attention to that fact, because I want to show now that I called the Speaker's attention to it immediately on recollecting that I was paired.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Your word is entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. McMILLIN. I rose to ask the correction of the RECORD at once, explaining that I was paired and desired to withdraw the vote, notwithstanding the vote was only viva voce.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I do not question it.

Mr. WEAVER. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield to me for a question?

Mr. McMILLIN. Certainly.

Mr. WEAVER. The Sergeant-at-Arms says there are sixty or sixty-five pairs that are absent and the other sixty-five are here, making, say, 130 members who can not vote.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think the gentleman is mistaken. I know many members have voted, notwithstanding the pairs, to make a quorum. I know personally several who have done so.

Mr. McMILLIN. I was going to say that if the gentleman will not insist upon pressing his resolution to-day the probability is that we can have a quorum to-morrow. As I said some time ago, we had the same difficulty the day before yesterday, and on yesterday, notwithstanding that fact, we did a good day's work.

Mr. Speaker, we have a long hot summer before us, with every prospect of Congress being in session for an indefinite period yet. Now, to keep 325 men here I undertake to say will not be a success; and while the gentleman from Iowa and myself may be able to stand the strain upon us, and I expect to, yet if his plan is insisted upon and carried to its legitimate results I fear we will see some of our colleagues carried out of this Hall feet foremost.

Mr. WEAVER. Oh, there is no danger of anything of that kind. If men are sick they can get leave of absence.

Mr. COX. I move to lay the motion of the gentleman from Iowa on the table.

Mr. WEAVER. Upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays, and 36 members voted in favor thereof; more than one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. COX. Count the other side.

Mr. SOWDEN. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SOWDEN. Or rather I wish to ask for information whether those absent by reason of sickness are excepted from the operation of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. They are.

Mr. COX. As the call of the yeas and nays may disclose the presence of a quorum, I will not call for the count of the other side, but let the roll be called.

The SPEAKER. But the Chair understood that some gentleman insisted upon the count of the other side.

Mr. COX. I insisted upon the count of the other side myself, but withdraw the demand. I believe the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The SPEAKER. They have been, more than one-fifth of the last vote seconding the demand.

Mr. CANNON. Can we not have a standing vote? Evidently there is a quorum here. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. It is evident that we can do no business this afternoon, and I therefore move that the House adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 81, noes 59.

Mr. WEAVER, Mr. SPRINGER, and others, demanded the yeas and nays.

The demand for the yeas and nays was seconded by 25 members only.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays are not ordered, there being less than one-fifth of the last vote seconding the demand.

Mr. WEAVER. Let us have the other side.

The other side being counted, 89 members voted in opposition.

So the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the entire vote, the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 58, nays 85, not voting 181; as follows:

The following additional pair was announced:

Mr. MCADOO with Mr. HARMER, on all political questions, until further notice.

On motion of Mr. SOWDEN and Mr. DIBBLE the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] to lay the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] on the table, and upon that question the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 77, nays 55, not voting 192; as follows:

So the motion was laid on the table.

During the roll-call, on motion of Mr. RICHARDSON, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WEAVER. The House has refused to comply with the motion I made. I give notice that on next Monday, should there not be a quorum present, I shall renew my motion.

Mr. BURNES. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to make a statement. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURNES. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that I propose to move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with, and that the House do now adjourn; and in doing so I desire to express regret that a general appropriation bill asking for consideration at this period of the session should be denied that hearing. I blame no one on the other side, but it is important to us all. It is important to the country, and it is specially important to me in my present condition, that this bill, which I have in charge, should be disposed of. It is a general appropriation bill. The country expects its passage. It is in the interest of thousands. Soldiers all over the country expect the early consideration and passage of this bill, and a wrong is being done, to my certain knowledge, to tens of thousands of worthy suffering soldiers by the refusal to pass this bill. I need not say a quorum has been demanded. I blame no one. Each member has the same right here; but I only express my sincere regret that this wrong has been done to the worthy, meritorious class to which I have alluded. Now, as the hour of 5 o'clock is near at hand, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with and that the House adjourn; and I state, on the suggestion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER], that I shall day by day persistently and without yielding to any solicitation demand consideration of this appropriation bill.

Mr. LYMAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a word or two. Of course what has been said by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] is to some extent a direct reflection upon the course that I have pursued to-day. I did not commence this course of procedure. This morning under the call of the Committee on Invalid Pensions a resolution was introduced from that committee and reported on by the committee, simply setting aside two days for the consideration of general pension legislation. It is a matter for which the friends of the veteran soldiers have been striving ever since the first day of this session. The question of no quorum was raised upon the other side of this House. Only four or five members present voted against the adoption of the resolution called up by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL].

The gentleman has said that by the course I saw fit in my judgment to pursue to-day I have denied to tens of thousands of veteran soldiers their rights. That certainly is a very serious matter, but I will state that this injury to their rights was done long before I demanded a quorum upon this floor; and I desire to say now, that until by unanimous consent or by other means the resolution which was called up by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL] this morning shall have been considered and either adopted or rejected, I shall continue to pursue the course that I have pursued to-day in the interest of the Union soldiers of this country, thousands of whom I represent. [Applause.]

Mr. BURNES's motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 16 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below:

By Mr. BACON: A bill (H. R. 11184) for the relief of Jessie Isherwood—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL: A bill (H. R. 11185) for the relief of Thomas E. Mullally—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MORSE: A bill (H. R. 11186) for the relief of Charles H. Bingham—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11187) for the relief of Albert C. Andrews—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. STONE, of Kentucky: A bill (H. R. 11188) for the relief of L. D. Scroggins—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11189) for the relief of J. S. Lowey—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11190) for the relief of Matilda Cook—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11191) for the relief of Sarah F. Dickson—to the Committee on War Claims.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. J. A. ANDERSON: Petition of 40 citizens of Saline, Kans., for amendment to the interstate-commerce law—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. CHIPMAN (by request): Joint resolution relative to a winter bridge across the Detroit River—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. MCMILLIN: Petition of J. A. Tyree, of Eliza O. Prince, of R. N. Miers, of heir of William H. Fugua, of Wesley Hancock, of executor of D. C. Hibbits, and of heir of Turner Vaughn, of Tennessee, for reference of their claims to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

The following petition, indorsing the per diem rated service-pension bill, based on the principle of paying all soldiers, sailors, and marines of the late war a monthly pension of 1 cent a day for each day they were in the service, was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

By Mr. NUTTING: Of D. W. Kerand and 29 others of Cayuga County, of A. A. Pallester and 38 others of Wayne County, and of William A. Cole and 58 others of Oswego County, New York.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, August 17, 1888.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PAY OF TERRITORIAL ASSOCIATE JUSTICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Comptroller of the Treasury requesting an appropriation of $841.67 to pay the additional associate justice created by the act of February 28, 1887, for the Territory of New Mexico, from the date of his qualification, March 21, 1887, to June 30, 1887, no appropriation having been made for that period; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of Josiah N. Jones, of Waterborough Centre, Me., praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MANDERSON presented a petition of citizens of Washington County, Nebraska, praying for certain amendments to the interstate-commerce law; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. SPOONER presented the petition of William C. Armstrong and other citizens of Oshkosh, Wis., praying for the passage of the bill pensioning prisoners of war at $2 per day; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. VEST. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3222) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at a point between Kansas City, Mo., and a point 5 miles below said city, to report adversely thereon. I desire to remark, in connection with the action of the committee, that the same bill has come from the House of Representatives and been passed by the Senate. I move that the bill be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3126) to authorize the construction of a free bridge across the Missouri River at the most accessible point at or near the mouth of the Kansas River, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11118) to authorize the construction and operation of a street railway and wagon bridge across the Rio Grande, between the city of El Paso, Tex., and Paso del Norte, Mexico, reported it without amendments.

Mr. VEST. I am also instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3408) to authorize the construction and operation of a street railway and wagon-road bridge across the Rio Grande, between the city of El Paso, Tex., and Paso del Norte, Mexico, which is identical with the bill just reported, to report it adversely. I move that it be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3146) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Missouri River at or near Kansas City, Kans., and not over 10 miles above the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railway bridge at Kansas City, Mo., reported it with amendments.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 793) for the relief of William Collins, reported it without amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon; which were agreed to, and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 3254) granting a pension to Sanford A. Beach;

A bill (S. 2503) to increase the pension of Mrs. Mary L. Scott, of Lincoln County, Kentucky;

A bill (S. 3253) granting a pension to Harriet B. Coflin;

A bill (S. 3238) granting a pension to Sarah Vantine;

A bill (S. 3232) granting a pension to Adam Velten;

A bill (S. 3313) granting a pension to Lewis Dolby; and

A bill (S. 3062) for the relief of Mary Ann Hough.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3310) to place the name of John Tobin on the pension-roll, submitted an adverse report thereon, and moved that it be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that that bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3306) granting a pension to Mary K. Richards, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3249) for the relief of Zo. S. Cook, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2765) granting a pension to Adaline A. Smyth, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3047) granting increase of pension to William Bittinger, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Education and Labor, reported an amendment providing for an increase of compensation to certain employés on the night force of the Government Printing Office, intended to be proposed to the general deficiency appropriation bill, and moved its reference to the Committee on Appropriations; which was agreed to.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8534) granting a pension to Jacob Copes, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9372) granting a pension to John Dean, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10418) granting a pension to Hannah L. Irwin, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PADDOCK, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 5525) granting a pension to Mrs. Jane Potts;

A bill (H. R. 8889) granting a pension to Charles Molseed;

A bill (H. R. 6501) to grant a pension to Joseph F. Garrett;

A bill (H. R. 4575) granting a pension to Michael Hargain;

A bill (H. R. 10789) granting a pension to Philip Neuman;

A bill (H. R. 204) granting a pension to Frederick C. Shaw; and

A bill (H. R. 10275) granting a pension to Joseph Hunter, M. D.

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8719) to amend the "act giving the approval and sanction of Congress to the route and termini of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad, in the District of Columbia," reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. EVARTS, from the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the memorial of the Saratoga Monument Association, requesting an appropriation for the completion and dedication of the monument commemorating the surrender of General Burgoyne at Saratoga, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. 3460) to appropriate $10,000 for the completion of the monument commemorating the surrender of Burgoyne at Saratoga; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 6344) granting a pension to William J. Toncray, of Tennessee;

A bill (H. R. 6001) granting a pension to Sarah J. Fraily;

A bill (H. R. 8494) granting a pension to Gilbert Reed;

A bill (H. R. 10906) granting a pension to Fidel Gates; and

A bill (H. R. 8545) for the relief of Samuel Purcell.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 3455) granting a pension to Lucy D. Hooper; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CHANDLER introduced a bill (S. 3456) granting a pension to David O. Sanborn; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SPOONER introduced a bill (S. 3457) granting a pension to Abigail Farley; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. STEWART introduced a bill (S. 3458) for the relief of General George Stoneman; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HARRIS (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3459) to incorporate the Columbia Central Railway Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

AMENDMENT TO THE DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. MANDERSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the deficiency appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. BECK, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers in the case of William Cash.

OVERHEAD ELECTRIC WIRES.

Mr. EDMUNDS introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 105) to restrain the erection or maintenance of overhead electric motive-power and electric-light wires in the cities of Washington and Georgetown; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I wish to say on the question of the reference of the joint resolution to the Committee on the District of Columbia that it is now limited (although I think very likely it ought to be extended) to electric motive power and electric lighting powers overhead, and does not prohibit and make a nuisance of the existing telegraph and telephone wires. Whether it may not be better to put into the same measure provisions in regard to those in aid of what is in the District appropriation bill may be a matter of consideration, but I omit it now. My inclination is to hope that the committee will report the joint resolution in order to see if Congress can not agree to definitely put a stop to the overhead electric-lighting and electric motive-power constructions, which everybody agrees are extremely dangerous to human life.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is the Senator from Vermont willing to have the communication from the District commissioners referred without further debate?

Mr. EDMUNDS. He is not. He wants it referred with instructions.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; then I will reserve my remarks. I do not wish to say anything about the reference of this joint resolution; and if the Senator from Vermont will consent to refer the communication of the District commissioners without any more debate, I have no desire to say anything further in regard to the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PLUMB. I desire to call up the resolution I submitted yesterday.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is a matter to come before the Senate in advance of that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] concerning the deposits in the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company was under debate yesterday and was laid over, the Chair believes, to be resumed this morning, by unanimous consent, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] having made remarks thereon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What I ask the Senate to consider is the motion to refer the letter of the commissioners of the District on the subject of overhead electric wires to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Both subjects have the same attitude before the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But pending the discussion on the letter of the District commissioners, the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] desiring to go on with his speech, I asked unanimous consent, I think, that that case should stand over just as it was yesterday morning, without losing any of its rights. So I supposed it would come up now, if I am correct. I think that is what is shown in the RECORD.

Mr. BECK. I will state to the Senator from Vermont, if he will allow me, that on the matter in relation to the Freedman's Bank the bill will be over here with the House amendment, when the subject can be acted upon just as well as by sending the resolution to the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; but first I want to dispose of this District of Columbia wire business, if I can.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the communication from the commissioners of the District of Columbia, which was under consideration yesterday morning when the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] took the floor. Having been read, it will not be read again, unless it be so requested.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The pending motion, I believe, is to refer the communication to the Committee on the District of Columbia, with instructions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. With instructions.

Mr. EDMUNDS. With instructions to report a resolution requesting the District commissioners substantially to suspend operations in regard to the overhead electric wires. I do not wish to occupy any further time at present on the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs upon referring the communication to the Committee on the District of Columbia, with instructions.

Mr. HOAR. Let the instructions be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts desire the letter to be read with the instructions?

Mr. HOAR. Let the proposed instructions be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The instructions will be read from the RECORD.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They were journalized correctly, and appear in better shape than in the RECORD, because they are condensed in the Journal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal entry will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

On motion by Mr. EDMUNDS, to refer the said communication to the Committee on the District of Columbia, with instructions to report a resolution requesting the commissioners of the District of Columbia to revoke any permit granted for the erection of such overhead electric wires.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the peculiar nature of this motion. Upon a letter received from the District commissioners in the beginning of the morning hour, without any chance to even read the communication or to have it printed or laid before us, without any reference to a committee, the Senator from Vermont proposes to refer the communication to the committee and to instruct them to do a merely gratuitous act without any inquiry whatever.

If anybody had proposed that besides the Senator from Vermont I should not have been so much surprised, because no one has been more careful, and properly so, in the orderly proceedings of the Senate to do nothing in a hurry, but to consider and inquire and examine through committees and otherwise every bill that is reported, and even when a committee has reported in favor of a bill our rule provides, and the Senator from Vermont has uniformly insisted upon enforcing that rule, that it shall not be considered until it is laid over one day to take its place in the ordinary course of business.

Now, it is proposed to instruct the committee to report back a resolution of the Senate alone to suspend a law which has been passed by the unanimous vote of both Houses, which already involves vested rights, and in which private parties have already invested large sums of money and made extensive contracts; and it is proposed to make the instructions peremptory, leaving the committee nothing to do except upon the desire and will of the Senator from Vermont to change the plan of this improvement, to violate contracts and nullify the law.

I take it that the Senate will not do that except for extraordinary reasons. When this matter was up yesterday all I desired was that it might take the usual course, that the communication should be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, the opinion the Senator from Vermont expressed in regard to it going to that committee with the other information that had been had, and that the committee would take it up and consider it, to hear the parties interested, and act upon it and report it back in due time.

If that course is adopted, I have not the slightest objection; and if it should appear that either by neglect or oversight legislation was had which is injurious to the public at large the committee can report such amendments of the law as to prevent injury to the public. But to have an instruction of this kind of a mandatory character, as the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] very properly suggested yesterday, is to take away all consideration, all examination by the committee, and simply upon the motion of one Senator, without any hearing, to act upon this matter of instructions which would nullify a law.

Since the debate yesterday I have inquired about this matter. Mr. Truesdell, who is president of this railroad company, called upon me in regard to it. I will state the facts as he gave them to me. He is a man, as I am informed, of high character and standing here, and well known probably to many Senators. At all events, I never met him before in my life, that I know of, until last night when he called to see me. He said he was the president of the railroad company, and that this is a suburban road. It is true, it starts at the corner of Seventh and K streets and passes through six blocks to North Capitol street, but that is rather in the nature of a suburban street, it is a street without pavement, or even without proper grading. Although New York avenue west of Seventh to the President's House is a very important street, beyond, eastward, it is not even improved, is not even properly graded, as any Senator who drives over it will know. After you pass over these blocks, from North Capitol street the route is entirely suburban. It follows along the line of New York avenue extended until it strikes the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, thence along the line of that road until it strikes Fourth street east, and it is projected northward to what are called the Catholic university grounds, the object being to construct a line of railroad to accommodate what is supposed to be the large travel there will be between the city of Washington and the university when it is built, the university being now in process of construction. So it is purely a suburban road; indeed most of it has to be graded by the incorporators.

The law granting the charter was passed in June last, before the proposition in the District appropriation bill was even pending, at any rate before the appropriation bill was passed. The company received the charter, which was reported from the appropriate committees of the two Houses unanimously, and that charter gave them the right to build this road with any kind of motive power at their discretion, the kind of rail only to be approved by the commissioners of the District. They had the charter right; but they applied to the commissioners for the use of the motive power which they thought best, though such consent was not necessary. That was the electric motive power of the kind most commonly used; indeed, two or three roads use this kind to one of any other. They applied to the commissioners, and the commissioners approved that motive power. They have proceeded to make their contracts. They made their contracts with a firm in Massachusetts, and have actually some of the materials on the way; perhaps some are here for aught I know. At any rate they have contracted for them. Many of the contracts are executed, and they are required by the terms of the law to complete the road in a very short period of time; I think in six or eight months; precisely what time I do not know; at least a certain portion of it has to be completed very promptly and the rest as soon as the streets are graded.

Under the circumstances to deprive them of this right would be wrong. Besides that they have taken the advice of engineers, and they have the approval of the very engineer who made the report read here by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] yesterday, Capt. Eugene Griffin, said to be an officer of experience.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Have you it here?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I have not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to see it.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was given by this gentleman, and you must take his statement.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why not produce the papers?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not got them here. Captain Griffin says in this report that while there may be objection to the use of overhead wires in cities, yet in suburban regions there is less objection or but little objection to them. In the first place, has such a wire ever killed a man? There are many of these wires scattered in many places. I do not know any other kind of a railroad that has not killed a man.

Mr. DAWES. It killed a woman in New York.

Mr. SHERMAN. An overhead wire?

Mr. DAWES. I suppose so.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think they have these overhead electric wires there. I do not know how that is.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will allow me, I will say that if he had looked in the newspapers he would have seen a great many deaths from these hanging wires, telephone wires as well as street-car wires, where they have had them.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the very thing I want to have examined by this committee. In my judgment they will find that this mode is the best which has yet been devised, especially for suburban regions and in smaller cities. This is purely a suburban region, only passing through six blocks where a single house has been built.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator whether he refers to the electric system or the system of using the wires overhead as the best.

Mr. SHERMAN. I speak of the latter.

Mr. TELLER. Of the electric system?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, the latter.

Mr. TELLER. Putting the wires overhead?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; the best yet devised.

Mr. TELLER. Does the Senator say that it is less dangerous than putting the wires under-ground?

Mr. SHERMAN. There is just as little danger as in putting them under-ground, because to use the rail as a mode of conduit it may be touched with the foot of a horse.

Mr. TELLER. But it is dangerous.

Mr. SHERMAN. To some extent, but they do not use what is called the cable chamber; they use a wire connecting with the rail. The system of wires overhead in the mode that has been proposed by this company is in my judgment the best that has yet been devised. They erect a pole in the center of the track from 25 to 30 feet high. They attach to the pole a branch or arm, and on those arms are suspended these wires, which convey electricity, which is not dangerous, according to the statement of this gentleman, who is interested, but he is ready to furnish the proof, and all he wants is an opportunity to furnish it to the committee to show that this is charged with electricity of insufficient power to kill either man or horse.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator if he has ever seen the system of moving cars by electricity with wires overhead in actual operation?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is in actual operation in the town in which I live.

Mr. PLATT. And in the town in which I live.

Mr. HALE. I was going to say that yesterday I saw it in practical operation in the city of Richmond, where the heaviest grades are surmounted.

Mr. HARRIS. We can not hear what is going on upon the other side of the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will please be seated and refrain from conversation.

Mr. HALE. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator from Ohio if it in any way interferes with him.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all.

Mr. HALE. I was saying that I saw for the first time in my experience yesterday in the city of Richmond this system of electricity applied through wires overhead as a motive power to propel the street-cars over the ordinary track. There are 12 miles of track laid, and posts are raised along the side of the street at the outer edge of the sidewalk. I shall not go into any description of it, but with the greatest ease those cars surmount all the grades. A car filled with twenty or thirty people is taken up what would be called a steep hill and moved steadily and strongly over it, going down the same declivity with entire safety. To me it was very novel, very strange, but it is said there to be a complete success. How much of danger there is in the wire of course I do not know.

Mr. DAWES I should like to add to what the Senator from Maine says——

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to go on.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio declines to be interrupted.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator——

Mr. SHERMAN. I decline to be interrupted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio declines to be interrupted.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know that the system is in successful operation.

Mr. DAWES. I wanted to tell what I saw.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will yield.

Mr. DAWES. Within two or three weeks I was in Richmond and saw this performance come to a dead halt on a grade. Some accident happened, and off went the current of electricity to the air, creating quite a blaze up in the air, and the whole train was brought to a stop on a grade. I thought that ought to be added to the statement of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. SHERMAN. As the colleague of my friend from Massachusetts says, it probably came to a halt as I did, by an irresistible power. [Laughter.] I have seen locomotives come to a halt—a great many other things come to a halt.

Now, Mr. President, the testimony of quite a number of engineers is cited here, but a man's own testimony about what he saw is probably better than to cite the testimony of others. I will say that in the town in which I live, as I said yesterday, there are five miles of this road. It ascends steep grades, because the grades are very steep there, and it was impracticable to use horse-cars. I have seen them going up there every day and every hour of the day, moving along by an imperceptible power, much faster than a horse can travel up those high grades, where it would take two horses and probably three to pull the car up the hill at a walk, while with electric power the car moves up and down the hill with unchanging speed.

It is said that sometimes the electric power gives out. There is no doubt about it. So it is in what is called the rail or surface power, and so it is in regard to what is the most interesting process in development, which I hope some time will prove to be a good one, that is, the process of storing electricity. Strange to say, electricity can be stored in a solid mass of metal, and sometimes they can store enough in a block of metal of this kind to carry a train of cars or a car through its whole course and back again. But it is found that from unknown causes sometimes this power gives up at once and the car stops dead, and it has proved difficult to restore the electricity. Although that experiment was tried four years ago and has been practiced upon in various ways since that time, and no doubt improved upon, finally they will find some way of preventing the electricity from escaping; but at present it is an impractical scheme, and I believe is not in operation anywhere now, so far as I know.

Mr. President, is it right that we should interfere when these parties, men of high character in this city, have undertaken to try this experiment at their own cost, without asking the public to contribute a cent, when it is palpable that for several years it will be a doubtful and costly enterprise to them, probably without yielding them anything? They wish to try this experiment here in the city of Washington, and why should they not do it? You may find fault and laugh at any proposition that is made. Nearly every invention that was ever designed to benefit mankind has been the subject of ridicule; and it may fail sometimes, because in the beginning of a new invention the perfect way may not be found. Time and experience alone can perfect any new process.

What I want is that the Committee on the District of Columbia shall hear these gentlemen, well-known citizens here. Let the committee send for scientific men if they please, and if they find that Congress has been imposed upon, and that this is not a proper system, then we can arrest it immediately. These men do not want to invest their money unless this is done. But to have the instructions imperative, so that there will be no power in the committee to inquire into the matter, would be a mere mockery of justice and would deprive all these men of their rights, of vested rights to the value of thousands of dollars, because they must fulfill their contracts even if Congress should revoke its contract with them. It is not just, it is not right, and it is not in accordance with the wise maxim which my friend from Vermont has so often preached to us about hasty and inconsiderate legislation.

We should not seek to revoke an existing act of Congress by a resolution of the Senate. The commissioners may disregard your resolution. Your resolution is not worth the paper upon which it is written. You may in a proper way change the law, but you can not do it by a resolution of the Senate. There is no force or potency in your request. When the committee shall have reported it will be easy for the two Houses to act upon the subject.

Now, Mr. President, all I ask is that this matter be referred without instructions to the committee, and I think they will find that this is a very interesting subject, and they will find that the experiment being made by these men is of great public advantage, that they ought to be allowed to pursue it; and if they can make a model railroad upon this plan in the city of Washington it will be one of the greatest blessings which has been conferred upon this people for a long time. If I had the power I would make the existing railroads change their form of locomotion and compel them either to adopt the cable or the electric system on the railroads here. I believe in any other city where the governing power is closer to the people than here that would be done. Congress is too far removed from the mass of the people here. If Congress would legislate for the people of this District as their own representatives would do, probably the existing railroads would be required by a wise law after full experiments to adopt some more rapid mode of transit in this city.

This company, without any hope or expectation of reward, propose to try this experiment. But it is no longer an experiment. It has been adopted in at least fifteen or twenty cities in the United States. This company propose it in a better form than any other I know of, because the plan is to put in iron posts in the center instead of wooden posts on either side, when the wires stretching across look cumbersome and ugly. They proposed a different system. Let them try the experiment.

Captain Griffin speaks here of the roads in this city and outside of the city. He states, as I said, that this is a suburban road, and it is treated by him as such. Nine-tenths of the whole length of this road is outside of any house whatever. I do not think there is a single house on the line of this proposed railroad from its crossing of North Capitol street until it reaches the proposed buildings of the university, and that is about 4 miles. The part that goes through the city of Washington is comparatively suburban. The extension of New York avenue from Seventh street to North Capitol is not largely built upon, and is not at all improved by the ordinary city improvements of pavements or even gradings.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I find in the Post of this morning, August 17, the following statement under the head "At the District building:"

Major Raymond has approved the application of the United States Electric Lighting Company to erect overhead wires on the following streets, because they are necessary for the public lights: C street, between Seventh and Tenth streets; Thirteenth street, between D and E streets; K street, between Seventh and Ninth streets; Ninth street, between Pennsylvania avenue and B street; B street, between Sixth and Ninth streets, and Seventh street, between Pennsylvania avenue and B street.

When, as the result of the provision in the District appropriation bill, we thought that we had at least provided against the erection of any more of these deadly wires in the streets of this city, it seems that they are being continually extended in every direction, and that this company, every one of whose wires carries with it a deadly current, is being allowed to extend those wires through the streets of this city on the ground that it is necessary to perfect a system of public lights, when $30,000 and upwards was appropriated by the District appropriation bill in order to enable the District commissioners to put the public wires under-ground.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio has done me the honor to say that I have sometimes been conservative and reluctant to do things in a hurry, and I am almost inclined to believe that I deserve the compliment, in respect of which I have no doubt he was entirely sincere; and it is because I am conservative according to the extent of my strength that I wish to do the very thing that I am now asking the Senate to do; and that is to cause a resolution, properly framed by the Committee on the District of Columbia so as not to work any injustice to the public interest which may be entirely promoted by some two or three of the little grants that these commissioners seem to have made, to be passed. I am so conservative as to desire to have the Senate express its opinion to these commissioners that they had better cease to go forward in this line instead of making haste and running a race with the almanac from now until the 15th of September to expand these overhead electric motive powers and electric wires in every direction before that day when the law says they shall stop; and the day having come when they are to stop the whole mischief on every side of the city is accomplished, and what my honorable friend from Ohio calls vested rights of syndicates and corporations and real-estate speculators and every other means of concentrating private capital into one force will be pleaded. That concentrated power will be brought to bear upon Senators and committees of the Senate and upon Congress to blockade any retraction or retreat, and to say that here are vested rights which Congress has allowed to go on. "It was brought to your attention," it will be said, "gentlemen, on the 15th of August, and you chose to be silent, to express no opinion about it. Meantime we have made haste and our poles are up, and our great iron frames spreading from the center of New York avenue and Seventh street to the Boundary," not to North Capitol street, as the honorable Senator says, if I read the charter right; but that is immaterial.

Mr. SHERMAN. I spoke of the part built on.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is what has been built on. If the Senator would ride out to the races some day, as I have done on holidays, along New York avenue, he would find that New York avenue is graded, is built on, is curbed clear to the place where you turn up the hill, and is partly graded beyond; and that this line, therefore, going from Seventh street, not from K, but from Seventh street northwest along New York avenue to Third street northeast. This certainly covers all those blocks, and is in the city. Beyond North Capitol street the line of New York avenue would very soon leave the city boundary and would be in the county, as it is called, and there perhaps, according to Captain Griffin and according to my honorable friend, it might be called suburban; but it goes from Seventh street northwest (which is as near the geographical center of the city as it can well be, and is as near the business and popular part of the city as is possible). From Seventh street northwest it goes until it strikes the boundary on the northeast, and all the way, except the two or three last blocks, through a part of the city that is already graded, paved, curbed, sidewalked, trees put up, and houses built along there the whole of that distance. And yet my friend says because the line goes 3 or 4 miles beyond it is a suburban road, for the proportion of exterior to interior is great. On the same principle this line might be extended to Baltimore and begin at Rock Creek, and the proportion of the 4 miles through Washington to the 40 miles to Baltimore would be nothing at all, and still it would be suburban, though crossing the whole city. That, it appears to me, is not sound.

Now, let us see where are the vested rights of this corporation that we are invading by asking the commissioners to stop going ahead, to suspend what they tell us they have only granted at their pleasure, with the right to suspend at any moment.

Let us see what the powers of this corporation are. According to the commissioners in their letter, according to the third section of the charter, it is provided that these people shall have the right to use any one of the three kinds of power named, and to make the arrangements, etc., "all to be approved by the commissioners of the District." A friend of mine on my right a little while ago called my attention to this third section and expressed a doubt whether that authorized the commissioners, there being a right to use electric appliances, to require that they should be of a particular kind, under ground rather than over ground, storage rather than real forces. I do not think there is any doubt about that. It was the evident intention of the charter that every part of the manipulation of the scheme in the public streets should be subject to the approval and control of the commissioners, just as all other uses of the public streets for private enterprises or quasi public ones in private hands have to be. Of course if there were any doubt the construction would be against the corporate grantee in favor of the people, at least everywhere except in the Senate of the United States, and I believe so here.

Then, Mr. President, on the subject of vested rights, Congress did have the foresight to provide even in this charter that everything granted to these grantees should be subject to the right of Congress to "alter, amend, or repeal this act at any time." But the construction put by the commissioners and by the company itself upon the method of this electric operation is in favor of my construction, for the company applied to the commissioners to use this avenue and these streets in the manner proposed by overhead electric motive power and the commissioners have granted that application subject to revocation at any moment of time, as they tell us.

Now, the enterprise is just inaugurated, and the Senator from Ohio, commending my usual conservatism, wishes that the Senate shall be so conservative as to say nothing until the company can go ahead and have more vested rights, put out more money, and then turn around and tell us, "why did you not express your opinion when it was before you; we have gone in on the faith now that nobody was going to complain and that we were to be allowed to put up death-dealing contrivances overhead instead of being required to put them under-ground," as they are in Baltimore, as the Senator from Maryland told us yesterday, working with perfect success and with as perfect safety as it is possible to have in any case where these enormous forces of nature are concentrated as they have to be in electric wires for motive power. Why not? I think it is the true conservatism that tries to have the Senate express its opinion as soon as it may on a question as to what ought to be done.

My honorable friend says that the commissioners are not bound to regard it. Grant it; but I suppose they are not so great that it would be considered insulting to them for the Senate of the United States to prefer a respectful request that they should hold up in the exercise of the discretion which they claim to have, and which in respect to this road they probably do have, and that is to regulate the use of the public streets. That is all. So they say they have only granted it at their pleasure. I think, therefore, that we should not make ourselves entirely ridiculous if we ventured in an humble, respectful way to address that body of gentlemen with a request that they would so exercise their discretion as to preserve the status quo, not go ahead any further until Congress can act on the question of a law which shall bind everybody. To that end I have this morning introduced a joint resolution to prohibit the erection of electric motive-power wires and electric light wires overhead, and have put in, as I hope, the proper penalties and safeguards, so as to see whether it is possible that the wishes of the people of this city and District, and of probably three-quarters of all the members of both Houses, can be brought to bear for the attainment of a public good for the public safety.

I am just as much in favor of increasing the modes of travel and conveniences of the public in this town as anybody. I am as ready to vote money for it as anybody, although I do not happen to own any suburban real estate. I am not one of the proprietors of Eckington, from which the railway takes its name. I do not own any land just at the Soldiers' Home line, where this railroad is to go. I am entirely, I think, without any other motive to be generous and to be promotive of the increase of these enterprises here except that of a person who lives in this town. But I want to see a good electric railroad run to Eckington and to the Soldiers' Home and to the northwest and to the north and over into the beautiful hills of Virginia at Arlington, but I do not want to see it put up in a way that is injurious to the public welfare, that destroys the beauty of your avenues and at the same time threatens with death every person who goes along it, when there is a better and more convenient and safer way to put it under-ground, only that it requires the men of vested rights and concentrated capital to spend a little more money in the first place to do it. Therefore it is that I have proposed to instruct the Committee on the District of Columbia to frame a suitable resolution so as wholly to accomplish what is indispensable in respect of our request, and thus let us act upon it.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, if the instructions contained in the motion of the Senator from Vermont are to be given by the Senate, I see no necessity whatever for referring the communication to the committee. If the opinion of that committee based upon careful investigation of the questions involved is desirable by the Senate, let the communication go to the committee with authority to investigate, to exercise its judgment, to report to the Senate its opinion as to what ought to be done in the premises. But if the object be, as unmistakably it is from the motion of the Senator from Vermont, to formulate a resolution simply in the language of his motion with every phrase and feature of it prescribed and directed by the Senate, I do not choose to enter upon the performance of such duty. No one is more capable of formulating a resolution to carry out the views of the Senator from Vermont than that Senator himself; and if he desires the Senate to take action such as his instructions prescribe in the present state of information or rather the want of information in respect to many phases of the question, let him introduce his resolution and ask the action of the Senate. Why refer his instructions to formulate a resolution every phase and feature of which is already prejudged and the Senate directs the committee the exact form and character of resolution that it shall report?

I beg, sir, that the instruction be not given, or that the communication be not referred to the committee, and when we come to a vote I shall ask a division upon the question as to the reference and as to the instructions.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, upon two propositions I think there would be very little difference of opinion in the Senate. The one is the unquestionable superiority of the electric or cable system over this miserable system that at present obtains in the city of Washington of horse-railways. In the far West we have found by actual experience that there is no sort of comparison in city railways between one system and the other. In the city where I live and in the city represented in part by the Presiding Officer of the Senate we have tested this question thoroughly. There are now four cable and one electric railroad in operation in Kansas City, Mo., and the horse-railroad has ceased practically to exist, and even business men are willing to go two or three blocks out of their way in order to reach these cable or electric railways.

So much we may take for granted. The horse-railroad, as I think, is like the flint-lock musket; it is a relic of the past. It is gone, and it is a mere question of time when the system which is proposed in the bill that has been cited, either with the motive power of electricity or otherwise, will take the place of the horse-railroad system throughout the country.

The second proposition is, that so far as we have gone with this new system of electricity as applied to city railroads, we can safely say that to a certain extent it is actually dangerous to life and limb. It is true that the instances are to a certain extent now sporadic, because it has been only in the very recent past that this system has obtained at all. But in this very city of Washington the chief of the fire department is to-day a disabled and ruined man, physically, without hope of recovery because in attempting to extinguish a fire upon Pennsylvania avenue, and when directing the firemen, the adjacent building being in full flame, his foot touched one of these wires and he was struck senseless, and dropped upon the roof. He called upon me a year ago, a poor paralyzed cripple for life. Whether he is living to-day or not I do not know, but his case seemed hopeless.

I might cite numerous instances where telephone and telegraph wires (because the same motive power would apply in this case as in the case of the telephone and the telegraph) have by accident become detached and struck men and animals, and it goes without saying that when this occurs there is either a destruction of life or permanent disability.

Mr. President, it is equally certain that we can obviate this danger to human life and limb. It is certain that these wires can be put under-ground without any diminution of the motive power. It has been done in Baltimore, done in New York, done in Kansas City, and it can be done here. Ought any intelligent legislator to hesitate one minute when he can obtain the end in view without endangering human life, which should be above all other considerations in the mind of every humane man? I stand here to-day protesting, as I have done for ten long years, against the outrages committed upon the people of this whole country in the railroad system of their capital, Washington City. It is the most infamous system—and I use the word deliberately—that was ever devised. In as beautiful a city as the capital of the United States to-day is such a system should be no longer tolerated. The damage to vehicles alone from the present system is enormous. As estimated by the different carriage manufacturers of the city, the damage alone yearly to vehicles is $100,000 by the miserable construction of the iron-track horse-railroads, to say nothing of the inhumanity and cruelty to animals which is daily going on under this system and the insufficient service and the defacement of the streets.

I say now, again, for the tenth time, that here is one of the most beautiful streets in this city, one of the most important, Fifteenth street to Pennsylvania avenue, running in front of the Treasury building, that is almost rendered dangerous; it is dangerous by reason of the three railroad tracks put down there by the consent of Congress, and with the present rails, across which no vehicle can go except when the horse is at a walk and——

Mr. EDMUNDS. And at right angles at that.

Mr. VEST. And at right angles; and yet we go on in this way with resolutions and bills from year to year and from session to session with no responsibility, no action taken, and "vested rights" are hurled in our faces, and we are told now that these railroad companies here are above Congress, above the people, and above the legislative department of the Government. Sir, it is a commentary upon the power of corporations that this should be flaunted in our very faces in the Capitol. That is the most potent argument to be found anywhere now in this country.

I have no disposition to reflect upon this Committee on the District of Columbia; I do not want to assume their prerogatives, but what information can they give us on this question? What expert testimony or knowledge is necessary? We know what I have stated here to be true. We have a right to instruct these commissioners. I should like to see the board of commissioners, if Congress requested them not to put these overhead wires here, that would dare to violate that request even of one branch of Congress. I should like to see that thing done, and I would like to make "a few feeble remarks" upon it after it was done. It will not be done.

We know these facts. We know these electric wires ought not to be put up. I do not know a man connected with this enterprise, and do not want to know one. I care nothing about it myself. I have for months and years felt that the system in this District was an outrage, not only upon this city, but upon the people of the whole country, to whom this city belongs. If we intend to do anything let us do it now. There is no necessity for delay. It is no disrespect to this committee, for Congress has the right to act and we have the right to instruct the committee. Is there any disrespect in that? Do we not do it from session to session? For one, I shall, without the slightest hesitation and with the greatest possible satisfaction, vote for the resolution of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] in what he has said in reference to cable-road power. I do not agree with him with reference to what he has said in regard to electric roads. I do not believe, notwithstanding the statements made here the other day, that there has been a successfully operated electric road in the United States. So far as my observation has gone, there has not been. They are not satisfactory. They will not render good public service; and I wish to say that if I had noticed when the bill incorporating the company referred to was under consideration that it had a provision for an electric road I should have moved to strike it out.

Independent of the question of their danger they will not satisfy the public wants. But the half has not been told of these roads. The most carefully constructed electric road is a menace to the public at large. There is one in the city of Denver, to which there has been probably as much learning, ability, attention, zeal, and money applied as to any railroad in the United States; it was in charge of capable men, with abundance of wealth back of them, and it is a failure in every sense of the word; and while it is probably less dangerous than the road referred to here, it is dangerous to human and other lives. This is one with a slot and with an adjusted rail. I do not know exactly how the power is applied, but I know it is powerful enough to knock down a horse coming near it. I do not know how other people travel over it, but I know that I always approach it with a good deal of caution and step pretty wide, and I have known other people to do the same.

There is not anything that is better understood than that the overhead wires are dangerous whenever there is sufficient power applied to them to run a car. They are bad enough for telephones and telegraphs; but when you put on the immense power necessary to carry on traffic upon one of these roads, they are dangerous and can not be made otherwise. I do not know of any way of fastening them and keeping them up, and no material of which they can be constructed which will prevent their being liable to drop down and kill people who are unwary and unsuspecting. Recently an unfortunate bootblack leaned against a pole in New York City, and he was dead in a moment. A boy in Atlantic City put his hand on a pole and was dead in an instant. These things are occurring wherever this system is tolerated; and I agree with the Senator from Missouri that it is an outrage upon the people here to continue the wires already hung, and a still greater outrage to put up new ones. I do not care what the rights of these corporators may be or what they claim them to be, I am prepared to vote to put every one of the wires under-ground. Everybody knows that in the end that is the cheapest thing to do, and that the wires can be better protected. While the outlay may be greater at first, in the end it will be profitable for the companies to do it. But these corporations do not propose to do that. They propose to live from hand to mouth and make what they can make to-day, and they are utterly disregardful of the wishes and welfare of the people interested in the matter.

In the first place these wires are a great, ugly, unsightly thing to be hung across a street, and you can hardly turn the corner of a street without seeing three or four great poles with this immense weight of iron hanging to them, and in storms they are breaking and dropping; and heavily charged with the electric current as they are all the time, they are liable, if they fall across a man or a horse, to kill him instantly; and small children, unacquainted with the danger which lurks in them, and ignorant people, touch them and they are gone in an instant.

Mr. President, this railroad company has not invested any money that amounts to anything in this enterprise, but even if it has, I think it is time we should put a stop to these things. The public good is paramount to the interests of corporations in this matter. For one, I repeat I am for putting every one of these wires, no matter to what company they belong and no matter for what purpose they are used, under-ground. I am not connected with any committee that is charged with this subject, but I should welcome this resolution or anything else that will get rid of these unsightly and dangerous wires.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I agree fully with what has just been said by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] as to the danger of the system of collecting electric wires above the surface within the reach of a man's hand or of the body, or that may at any time fall. When I attempted to describe what I saw yesterday at Richmond the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] was naturally and fittingly rather impatient at being interrupted, and I did not go on to say what I desire to say now, that while as a power in propelling the cars and transporting passengers it seemed to be successful, it did to me present features of dangers of the kind that has been adverted to by Senators. The truth is that with these electric wires strung overhead in all parts of a populous city, more especially when they are applied to the tracks of street railways lying upon the ground, thereby taking complete possession of the surface of the earth and all the wires overhead and of all the communicating space between, there is something demoniac about their existence in the constant menace that they present to life and limb, and to me it is plain that we have more of a duty here devolved upon us in keeping Washington, its approaches, its streets, its methods of transportation, not only good but safe, than falls upon any municipal government of any city.

It is just as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] has said, that we are made the trustees for the comfort and safety of the American people here in Washington. The habit of visiting Washington, of making it a winter residence and winter harbor, a place of winter visitation, has grown immensely within the last twenty years. The American people are pouring through Washington for the entire winter and spring season, remaining here a longer or a shorter time, according to the will or business or pleasure of those who travel; and we ought to make this city a safe city for them in every way, to beautify it and adorn it, making it what in thirty years will be the finest city on the habitable globe. And we are culpably and criminally neglectful as to the methods that are pursued with reference to the streets and to the transportation over them.

Whilst I am up, Mr. President, as it is germane generally to this subject, I should like to ask whether the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom the Senate has given the general power and duty of overlooking this matter, are considering in any way the most lamentable and disgraceful condition of the streets generally in the city of Washington? I have had occasion heretofore more than once—not as often as the Senator from Missouri has stated that he has—to call attention to some of these things, but more than once to complain of the general condition of the streets in this great capital city.

I venture the assertion that there is to-day no city in America of the population of Washington where the general transportation over the streets is as subject to danger and inconvenience and hardship as in the city of Washington. It has become an ever-present fact before the mind of every Senator here that if he desires to go from his place of residence to any of the Departments or to the Capitol, as his duty calls him here each day, the only comfortable method of transportation is to get into a street car, because there you are jarred and jolted and tossed about and endangered less than in any other means of conveyance. Bad as they are, imposing upon us as they do, as the Senator from Missouri has said, yet it is the only comfortable way of being transported about this city.

No man to-day can start from the Treasury Department and drive or be driven down the broad avenue, that ought to be the pride of the nation, that lies between the Treasury Department and the Capitol gate, without being sore in limb and body before he gets there, and seasick besides, as the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] well suggests. You may travel over that broad avenue of a morning after there has been a shower in the night, and it is nothing but a succession of pools of water spread out from sidewalk to sidewalk, and every time that the carriage drops into one of those on one side of the avenue the people in the carriage are tossed to one side, and then when upon the other side to the other side, and men are glad to get out and take to the street cars. It is unsafe for an invalid to drive over Pennsylvania avenue, and so it is of almost every other street leading from that part of the city to this part of the city. Somebody ought to take charge of this business, and see that this cumbrous evil is cured.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to inquire of the Senator why the Committee on Appropriations, of which he is a very able and distinguished member, does not look after the raising of money for this purpose, rather than the extension of streets and all that?

Mr. HALE. I was coming to that very point, and I am going to treat of that, and I might as well treat upon it now.

Mr. SPOONER. I shall be glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. HALE. That adds to the grievance. I do not know at whose door the fault lies, but I do know and was going to say when the Senator from Wisconsin arose that we appropriate money freely. The Committee on Appropriations of this body, engaged in constant contest with the committee in the other branch of the legislature, is always adding to the appropriations. It receives deputations from the citizens of the District, hears them and their wants as presented before it, and almost always grants them. It has the commissioners of the District before it from time to time, and is most liberal in its appropriations. Congress adjourns after the bills have passed, and then the Committee on Appropriations has no more jurisdiction or power than if we lived upon the further shores of the European continent, and nothing is done, or if anything is done, at best patchwork is done, instead of going to the foundation and building us good streets that we and the American people might be proud to ride and drive and walk over.

It is time that somebody took this up. We are going to be confronted with an unusual condition next winter. I suppose there has been no season when as many American people have visited Washington and staid here from a few days to a few months as will be shown the next winter. All through the winter and into March and afterwards the American people will be trooping to Washington as though it were a holy shrine; and unless something is done to relieve the infamous condition of the streets here now they will be treated to what will send every man and woman and child of them away with indignation, and that ought not to be so. When next winter comes, too, whoever has this in charge ought to furnish us a street system that is safe, comfortable, easy to get over. I do not want to let this discussion pass—though this is not strictly connected with the subject before the Senate, it is germane to the general consideration of what we shall do here—without entering once more what the Senator from Missouri calls a feeble protest against the present condition.

Mr. DAWES. I am afraid the Senator from Maine and myself, so far as committees are concerned, are more responsible for the subject-matter that has caused this debate than the Committee on the District of Columbia. I do not want to be considered as a defender of the Committee on the District of Columbia——

Mr. HALE. I do not wish to be considered as assailing the Committee on the District of Columbia. I doubt if the responsibility is there. I do not think it is there. Neither do I think it is in the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator inquired why the Committee on the District of Columbia had not taken the streets under their care and done something more for them. There I think the Senator and myself, if any committee is responsible for this, are more responsible than the Committee on the District of Columbia. When the bill making appropriation for the District of Columbia came over to this branch it had this provision in it:

Provided, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia shall require all telegraph, telephone, and other wires to be removed from all streets, avenues, and alleys wherefrom the District wires have been or may be removed, and to require all wires to be placed under ground at the expense of the body corporate, company, or person now maintaining, owning, or using the same. The location of conduits, the trenching, excavation, and relaying of pavements in streets and alleys of the cables and devices used to be subject to the direction and approval of the said commissioners.

When it became a law it was in these words:

The commissioners of the District of Columbia shall not, after the 15th day of September, 1888, permit or authorize any additional telegraph, telephone, electric lighting, or other wires to be erected or maintained on or over any of the streets or avenues of the city of Washington; and the said commissioners are hereby directed to investigate and report to Congress at the beginning of its next session the best method of removing all electric wires from the air or surface of the streets, avenues, and alleys, and the best method of interring the same under ground, and such legal regulation thereof as may be needed; and they shall report what manner of conduits should be maintained by the city of Washington, if any, and the cost of constructing and maintaining the same, and what charge, if any, should be made by the city for the use of its conduits by the persons or corporations placing wires therein, and upon what terms and conditions the same should be used when required so to do; and for such investigation $1,000 is hereby appropriated.

I stated yesterday, in the absence of the Senator from Maine, what induced the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate to make this change. The committee of the Senate made this change, or recommended this change to the Senate, and the Senate were induced, I suppose against the opposition of some members of the Senate who were very anxious to have the House provision remain, to adopt this in its stead. If the House provision had remained, we should not have had this debate here to-day. If the Committee on Appropriations had understood that the extension of the time to the 15th of September was for any other purpose than to enable the commissioners to ascertain the best method of putting the wires under ground, it would not have been adopted by the committee, and I think not by the Senate. Therefore, if any committee of this body——

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator if it was not clearly the idea of the Committee on Appropriations that the time would be used as a matter of conservative business for investigation to see how it could best be done, and not to give any additional rights?

Mr. DAWES. I stated yesterday, when the Senator was not here, just as fully as I was able to do that that was the opinion of the committee, that that was the sole purpose. Now, if one committee more than another is responsible for this state of things, the Senator and myself ought to take it on to our committee and off from the Committee on the District of Columbia, on which we are in the habit of casting our delinquencies.

As to the condition of Pennsylvania avenue and the other streets, it is not the Committee on the District of Columbia that is responsible, but it is the two Committees on Appropriations of this Congress that is responsible, and it does not belong to the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate. The Committee on Appropriations of the Senate put nearly $400,000 upon the District appropriation bill as it came from the other House, for the purpose of improving these streets, paving, grading, and regulating the streets, and designating the streets to be improved, and if that appropriation had remained with that designation, a greater improvement of the streets and avenues of the city of Washington would have been accomplished this year than has been in any five years preceding. It went into the committee of conference, and that amendment was cut down $200,000, and the designation of streets was taken out. It was put in the discretion of the commissioners of the District, short $200,000 of what the committee of the Senate recommended and what the Senate adopted, and the blame, if any there is, and the condition, which nobody can describe more graphically and more truthfully than the Senator from Maine has done this morning, is attributable to that state of things and to no shortcoming of any committee of this body, which has done or attempted to do its full duty to the streets of the city of Washington.

Mr. HALE. Now, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him to get at the exact truth of this matter, the exact condition of affairs?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly there ought to have been more money appropriated; but from what the Senator has stated it is plain that the responsibility for the expenditure of the money that is appropriated rests with the officials who are in charge of the administration of the government of the District. Is it not the fact that from year to year that is its condition?

Mr. DAWES. There is this trouble about that. We have tied their hands; we have by enactments said they shall put down the cheapest possible pavement, a pavement not exceeding $2, I think, a square yard.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the most expensive possible one in the end.

Mr. DAWES. But the cheapest for the time being.

Mr. HALE. But it gives the least for the money.

Mr. DAWES. And the least for the money, and they do not get it finished at one end of the street before they are obliged to turn around to the other end and repair it. We have been doing that by enactment for the last five years. It was $2.25 once; but we have grown more shoddy-like in our appropriations every year, until now, I am informed by my colleague upon the Committee on Appropriations, they are to put down a concrete pavement that shall not cost more than $2 a square yard. Therefore they can not put down anything that is much better than the plastering on the ceiling of a house. If they were permitted to put through Pennsylvania avenue what was put in front of the Arlington Hotel some ten or twelve years ago, and which has never been touched since——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Fifteen years ago.

Mr. DAWES. Yes. The outlay, though larger at first, would have been, in my opinion, a great economy; but here they go on plastering the street as a set of plasterers would plaster the ceiling of a house, and then turn around and go over it again before the other end is hardly dry; and that is under an enactment of Congress!

Mr. HALE. Well, Mr. President, I shall have succeeded in my object if I get attention called to this grievous condition, and we find just where the fault is. Then it is our duty to address ourselves to the task of removing that evil and the causes of it. I suspect and have supposed that the fault does not lie with any committee here. It does not lie wholly, and perhaps not largely, with the commissioners of the District, although I am constrained to believe that with the appropriations of money made even with all the limitations and restrictions that are thrown in, if the commissioners would set themselves to building such pavements as are possible under the restrictions that we lay upon them on all these great streets and avenues which are most traveled, we should get better streets than those to which we are now treated.

Mr. DAWES. I think they do the best they can.

Mr. HALE. The Senator has examined that perhaps more completely than I have. If that is so, then this Congress, this session ought not to be terminated without those restrictions, which are evil, being removed, and without the appropriations, which are inadequate, being supplemented by appropriations that will be ample for the purpose. I hope for one that it is not too late for the Senate to consider the subject, and upon any appropriation bill that may yet come before this body there shall be incorporated provisions giving ample money to put these streets in order between now and next winter and removing any restrictions that cripple the administrative powers of this District.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, there might as well be a general deliverance on this subject, I suppose, while we are considering the question before the Senate. I am sorry to differ with my friend from Maine [Mr. HALE] as to what ought to be first done in this city. I am prepared to say that I do not think the first thing that the citizens of this city require is to patch up or to repave Pennsylvania avenue. I have been on special duty in connection with the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which has had to do with the replacing and repaving of streets in this city, for now some six or seven years, and the bulk of the money that has been spent during that period of time has been to replace pavements put down during what is known as the Shepherd régime, worthless wooden pavements, worthless stone pavements, worthless asphalt pavements, and so on, and during that period of time the great bulk of the tax-payers of this District have been obliged to stand idly by and see improved and reimproved the same streets and the same avenues that have been the subject of improvement for the last thirty years, while their streets, on which they have built their houses and spent their money, remain unimproved, in the mud and in the dirt, just as they have been for so many years.

It will be comfortable of course to the Senator from Maine and all those other Senators who are able to own their own teams, and therefore to drive to and from the Capitol, to have a perfectly smooth roadbed, and I sympathize with the Senator from Maine on account of the jolting which his anatomy has had in going up and down Pennsylvania avenue; but I sympathize more deeply with the three-quarters of the population of this city who have had no benefit from the money that has been expended on streets, because we have been replacing all the while these old and worthless street improvements made during that extravagant régime of some fifteen or twenty years ago, and they have made complaint, and just complaint, that their money has been spent, not only to repave these streets and to keep them in fair condition when once paved, but that the enormous debt that was created during that period also rests upon them equally with other tax-payers, and that they are constantly subordinated to a condition of things for which they were not responsible, and yet which operates not only to their own inconvenience but to their great financial detriment.

Mr. President, Pennsylvania avenue is not in very good condition simply because the work that was done there was not well done. It was not half so well done as the work which is now being done, and yet I understand it was done at a price 50 per cent. greater than is paid for far superior work at the present time. But Pennsylvania avenue will never be made what it ought to be until the street railroads are compelled to take the rough belts which they have put there for their own convenience out of the way. The Senator can now, if he chooses, ride down one side of the avenue, of course jolted by the inequalities of the asphalt pavement, but if he crosses the pavement he will have to cross the mingling of iron and stone, which is worse than anything he finds on either side of the track, in my judgment, and that is permitted to remain there by law. The avenue ought to be repaved, but when it is repaved it ought to be repaved in connection with an entire reconstruction of the street-car tracks whereby they should be compelled to put down a grooved rail, on which is to be operated a wheel and central flange keeping it in place, and which would make the entire space covered by the rail and by the intervening asphalt, or whatever the material may be, as smooth and as unobstructive to carriage wheels as any part of the street on either side of the track. Of course some other means of locomotion than horses must be introduced.

It is true, as stated by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] that the people of Washington are imposed upon by an antiquated system of city transportation which is maintained, of course, in defiance of public opinion, but I suppose to the very great profit of the railway companies, who are not willing to introduce modern methods, but who ought to be compelled to do so.

This question of street improvements is a relative one. It is not a question as to what may be necessary to be done, but is a question of that which is the most necessary to be done; and bad as Pennsylvania avenue is, it is not half so bad as miles and miles of streets in this city on which there has been no pavement at all, and on which there has been neither curbing, guttering, nor sidewalk; and when it comes to the adjustment of the distribution of the funds which are appropriated by Congress, the commissioners, as I think they ought to have done, have taken up in a measure in recent years—they have during the last two or three years—streets which have never been paved, and they have recognized the rights of people who have built houses there, who have paid taxes there for generations, and yet who have never had one single dollar of advantage or benefit out of all the expenditure which has been made.

I have believed ever since I have had any considerbble connection with this matter that there ought to be a very much larger sum spent every year and for years to come than seems to be possible under the existing condition of things. The House of Representatives seem to regard this method of expending the revenues of this District with some disfavor. At all events, they are only willing to agree to a very small expenditure, and even the Senate has not been willing to do as much as it ought to have done, in my judgment. I think it ought to have gone very much further.

In all the suburban portions of this District there are people who for a hundred years have been paying taxes, upon whom the burden of this great debt rests, and yet who have never received a single penny in return in the shape of street improvements, sewers, or anything of that kind, for their benefit or for the purpose of adding to their comfort or the convenience of their property; and the system which has been adopted, and which I take it is going to be perpetuated, is vicious, vicious in that it levies upon the general tax-payers the total cost of these improvements, instead of levying it, or some portion of it at least, if not all of it, as is common in most of the cities of the country, upon the abutting property; but once having been undertaken and carried out in such a comprehensive way and with sufficient rapidity to enable the people who are interested in the extension of streets by reason of the fact that they have built houses and opened up new avenues of travel and so on, to have their portion of the benefit of these improvements, until that time comes, we rest under the burden of doing, or at least consenting to the perpetuation of, a very great injustice.

When the Senator from Maine rides down Pennsylvania avenue and realizes the imperfections of that great thoroughfare, let him reflect that there are thousands of people in this city who are not half as well off as he is while he is engaged in this uncomfortable way of traveling these streets, and let him take into account that while he wants that avenue fixed up, whenever that is undertaken other portions of the city which are still worse off ought to be brought within the purview of his observation and of such legislative propositions as he may make looking to the remedying of their grievances. It ought not to be undertaken in reference to that alone, but to the entire city, of which Pennsylvania avenue is not the most conspicuous example.

Mr. HALE. Let me say to the Senator that I have no doubt he has ridden over Pennsylvania avenue in a carriage during this past winter ten times where I have once, and he knows more about the great inconvenience that the condition of that avenue presents, not only to Senators but to others, than I do. It is not a question of who shall ride in a carriage and who shall not, or who complains of the roads or who does not. That is not the question here. Pennsylvania avenue is an avenue that is used more perhaps than any one avenue in America by the whole American people, and the Senator ought to set himself, and the Appropriations Committee ought to set itself, and I ought to set myself in that committee, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] on that committee, and the District Committee to seeing to it that that avenue be put in proper condition, for it is the great conduit through which pours the tide of people who come here, entirely outside of ourselves, all through the winter and spring months, not one of whom will go home without feeling that either he or she has been abused as it is now.

I do not agree with the Senator in that. I do not believe that in making our appropriations and the District commissioners in expending the money can set themselves to a better task than to putting that avenue in good shape if we will only furnish them the money, and then in due time we will take care—and I do not want to postpone it—of these outlying places. I am in favor of attending to them too, but I would not neglect Pennsylvania avenue.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Maine, who has been beset with such dangers and difficulties in this city, if he has taken any steps toward the introduction of appropriate measures to remedy them?

Mr. HALE. I am getting at the trouble a little nearer than I have ever before. I have not suffered very much. I have not ventured to go on Pennsylvania avenue more than once in the last three months to drive or to be driven over it, but I have heard the complaint coming from dozens and scores and hundreds of people, and I am willing, for one, to help remedy it during the rest of the session.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Maine would not certainly be guilty of the injustice of taking up the imperfect pavement which exists on Pennsylvania avenue and replacing it with a better one at the expense of the people in this District who have never had any benefit at all in the shape of street improvements in front of their residences. I am certain that he would not do that.

Mr. HALE. I would have both attended to.

Mr. PLUMB. If he wants to do this thing in the large way he speaks of, the appropriation ought to come out of the Treasury of the United States; it ought not to come out of the revenues of the District at all if it is taken up in that spirit. I do not believe the necessity exists to quite the extent that the Senator seems to think it does, but I want to say that it can not be done as it ought to be done until the unsightly strip of stone pavement between the tracks and the tracks themselves that go down the center of the avenue are removed, and where grass is growing, as the Senator from Massachusetts suggests, and making it appear as ridiculous as it is unsightly and inconvenient.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the Senator how it is possible to get it removed or rectified? There is a corporation that stands in the center of that avenue that is stronger than Congress is, and that owes the United States to-day a very large sum of money for old assessments of years ago, but there is not courage or pluck enough in the law officers of the Government to collect them, and that is dawdling along while the rest of us, private tax-payers, who are assessed have to walk up to the collector's office twice a year, and if we are a day over the time we have to pay 2 per cent. a month as penalty; but it seems they can not touch this corporation.

Mr. PLUMB. I have no doubt there is a great deal in that, and yet I have no doubt an excuse can be found for it which does not involve that reflection on Congress which has been indulged in so freely.

A good many of us reside here only a portion of the year, and therefore "out of sight out of mind" for a great portion of the twelve months, and many of those who come here come for only a short term. It is therefore not with us day by day and night by night and month by month as if we lived here constantly; and consequently we do not take hold of it in that resolute and determined way we otherwise would.

Then there is another thing about it. It is here and it is better than nothing. The Senator from Maine paid it a magnificent tribute a few moments ago when he said a man traveling on Pennsylvania avenue could travel more comfortably in a car on that thoroughfare than in any other way. That is what I alluded to when I spoke about the discomfort he had had in going down that avenue in a carriage. He might have taken more comfort in one of these ill-smelling cars and find by comparison that the car would be better than the carriage.

Mr. HALE. I take the car.

Mr. PLUMB. So do I.

Mr. HALE. Right on that point, on which I agree with the Senator as to all this raised central line that is occupied by the two tracks of the railroad, I ask, is there anything in the charter of the company that prevents Congress or the administrative officers of the District from lowering that to the bed of the roadway, so that it shall not be all the while there to the prevention of the making of a good street?

Mr. PLUMB. I presume not, and yet there are certain difficulties that are inherent in the motive power of these cars which can not make that anything else but an unsightly place and an inconvenient obstruction to the street in the form of the rail, as the Senator from Massachusetts says; but the whole question of what rail shall be put down is under the control of Congress and especially limited to that control by the original charter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We have allowed the commissioners to do it.

Mr. PLUMB. Very well. I think we have made some mistakes; but after all there is no rail that is in use, none of the ordinary rails, that will answer the purpose; but there is a rail which is in use largely in European cities, and I think perhaps to some extent in this country, on which a surface can be maintained at the flush of the street, a grooved rail on which flies a wheel with a central flange which is held in place by means of the groove; but in order to make that available the horses should be taken away and some cable power or some electric motor or something of that kind used.

The Senator from Vermont says they are run with horses in London, but he will see if we put an asphalt pavement there, the running of the horses would soon wear it out. What ought to be done is the adoption of a system whereby that ought to be as smooth to a carriage wheel as any other part of the street, and it can be done not only with advantage to the public, but with advantage to the company. Of course the company do not like to undertake to make the expenditure, but it should be done, and Congress ought to require that it should be done, and I venture to say that no wise administration of this city will ever compel the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue until that is done in such way as it ought to be—one single smooth ribbon, as it were, from the Capitol to the Treasury building, without obstruction on it anywhere that should interfere with the smooth passage of a carriage wheel.

But while this question was up I only wanted to say a word in favor of that class of people who appeal most strongly to me in regard to the distribution of money for street improvements, people who have spent their money for taxes and for the improvement of their neighbors' property and for whose benefit no money has been in turn expended.

I believe there ought to be a million dollars every year for the next ten years expended to improve the streets in the District of Columbia. If that were done, then there might be an intermission perhaps of many years before any very large sum would need to be again expended. It would be money well spent. But it does not seem to be practicable to have it spent, and so perhaps for all practical purposes, unless it may be with reference to this street-car business and the general question of the locomotion of the cars, this discussion will be of no avail.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer the communication of the District commissioners to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to say a few words on the subject-matter that is now before us. As far as the streets are concerned, I think my friend from Maine [Mr. HALE] has entirely exaggerated their condition. If he had been here rumbling in an omnibus thirty years ago over the only paved street in Washington, Pennsylvania avenue, or walking anywhere in the city, he would see a comparison so great that he would be very well pleased with the present condition of the streets. I believe that the condition of the streets of Washington now is as good as in any city of this Union, although my opinion seems to be different from that of others. But I will not debate that.

So also with the old railroads. I agree with all that has been said about the old rails. That system ought to have been abolished years ago. Horse-cars are superseded by improved systems in small villages and towns of ten, fifteen, and twenty thousand inhabitants. It is a shame that in the capital of this country, which ought to be the finest city in the world, the old system of horse-cars should be continued, traveling along at the rate of 4 or 5 miles an hour, or even less. I hope that this debate will call attention to that matter, and that the Committee on the District of Columbia, or some other committee, will report some measure providing for other means of transportation. But there are difficulties in the way. We have got to have some plan. The only way I know of is the cable road or the electric road. The cable roads have killed five times as many people as the electric roads. Whether the electric system is a perfect system or not I do not know, but it is one of the systems to be considered in the future.

The question here is not what kind of a road we shall adopt, or what is the best form even of the electric road, but the question is whether on the motion of a Senator, without the reference of it to a committee, we shall nullify an act of Congress, set it aside absolutely, wipe it out on the mere declaration of the commissioners, without the examination of a single person interested in the matter, without hearing an expert, without examining an engineer, without inquiry, upon mere haphazard declarations made here on the floor of the Senate.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] described one kind of electric motor—that is the one conducted under ground in the city he described—and so has the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] described the other system, the old-fashioned one with poles and wires hung between and wires hanging on those poles. The system which it is proposed to adopt here is a better one.

Mr. President, remember that only in June last Congress passed a law expressly authorizing certain persons, naming them as incorporators, to build this road, the identical road referred to here. It provides:

> That the said railway shall be laid in the center of the avenue and streets as near as may be, to be constructed of good materials, and in a substantial and durable manner, with the rails of the most approved pattern, all to be approved by the commissioners of the District, laid upon an even surface with the pavement of the street and in such manner as to interfere with the ordinary travel as little as practicable, and the gauge to correspond with that of other city railroads.

The commissioners have the power to approve the places where it is to be located, in the center of the streets, as near as may be, and to see that it is constructed of good material and in a substantial and durable manner, rails of the most approved pattern to be used, and they have already been obtained. Then the same law authorizes the use of any form of motive power. It says, if cable power is to be used, the capital stock shall be so much, "if electric power is to be used, the capital stock for the main line shall not exceed $102,000," and if horse power is to be used the capital stock may be less.

Now, Mr. President, you have the statement made here by the president of this railroad company that they have, upon the recommendation of the engineers, adopted the very highest form of street railway that is known, to be propelled by electric power, and that they have made their contracts to carry into execution this law, and in a suburban region, for notwithstanding what the Senator from Vermont has said, with the exception of five or six squares between Seventh street and North Capitol street, every part of the line is entirely suburban, and indeed I do not recall a single house on the line of this street railway, following the line of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, then out Third or Fourth street east to the proposed university. It is a road fully undertaken by these gentlemen, and they have invested their money in it.

They are the first persons who are willing to invest their money in building a new kind of railroad; the first who ever offered here to build an electric or cable road; and are they to be turned aside and denied the opportunity of making their experiment, and that, too, without an inquiry, without an examination?

I say it would be a gross act of injustice, without speaking of vested rights; because I think vested rights ought to be treated with some respect. When a man has secured a charter, a franchise, unless it be in violation of the public interest, it ought not to be repealed or interfered with except in a proper and orderly manner.

He ought to have the chance to exercise those rights given to him by law, and they should not be taken from him except by law in due course. These gentlemen have gone on and made their arrangements and propose to build this railroad and furnish an example here of the very highest form now known of the electric-motor road. They have adopted improvements that I never heard of until I saw that they had been adopted here. Instead of the old system of wooden supports and posts, they have adopted a new system of granite and stone that will not be unsightly and that will not occupy unreasonable space or be in the way.

As to the suggested danger of electricity in every form, that is found everywhere. It was only the other day that all the people in a great building in New York were startled by the electric fluid coming into all their wires in the building and it scattered them like sheep. As a matter of course, we are dealing and they are dealing in this motive power with the most subtle agency of nature, that which is less known than any other, but undoubtedly this subtle power will in time be brought under the control of man. In the mean time there is more or less danger in it, unless you suggest some other mode, and no other mode has ever been devised. Railroads are dangerous, and there are lives by the wholesale lost upon them. The cable roads are very dangerous, as we know, wherever they have been put in operation. So the electric roads are dangerous; so the horse railroads are dangerous, and they kill people, and have in this city over and over again killed some men and wounded others. Ocean steamers are dangerous, as we know by the accident which occurred only yesterday, where over one hundred lives were suddenly lost almost in the twinkling of an eye. Are we therefore to be deterred because here and there a wire may break or fall on some one? I pause as I see my time has expired.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Ohio be permitted to close his remarks, and I will not say another word; but let us take a vote and have this matter ended.

Mr. BLAIR. I have waited a long time—this debate has taken two days—and I have been anxious to get the floor now to move to lay the whole subject on the table in order that I may ask the Senate to take up the Army nurses bill. They are dying off. These old women are going, one after another. The bill has been pending almost all winter, and it will not cost half as much to pension those who are surviving as it will to pave Pennsylvania avenue, and it does seem to me that this discussion in regard to the streets of this city might well be postponed or might well lie on the table until this bill can be passed.

I have got along very well in this city. It is a splendid city to go on foot in, and I think the American people are tolerably well satisfied with it as it now is. At all events these old women ought to be attended to, and I will ask the Senate immediately after the vote, which the Senator from Vermont says he would like to have taken at once, to dispose of the Army nurses bill. I will say, as I have several times before——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from New Hampshire proceeding? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLAIR. I have nothing more to add except to say that the committee and, I think, the whole Senate will be agreed upon the substitute for the original bill, which has been printed in the RECORD and is all ready to be passed if the Senate will do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] asks unanimous consent that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] be permitted to conclude his observations on the mofion to refer the communication of the commissioners of the District with instructions. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Ohio will proceed.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I have trespassed on the attention of the Senate longer than I intended, and said about all I desired to say. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] has called for a separate vote on the question of the instructions. I will ask for a division of the question, therefore, so that we may vote separately on the reference and on the instructions.

Mr. TELLER. I made an allusion to the Denver electric railway, and I ask that I may be allowed to insert in the RECORD a description of it, without reading it, and also a letter from the mayor and the engineer of the city. I will say that I did not mean to state that anybody had been killed on that road. As I understand, this is the safest of all systems adopted; but there have been some accidents to teams or something of that kind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The papers will be inserted in the RECORD, if there be no objection.

The papers are as follows:

THE SHORT-NESMITH SYSTEM.

The Denver Tramway Company's line (Denver, Colo.) is the only road at present operated on this system.

The cars are in series, like arc lamps, i. e., the motor of each car is in the straight circuit instead of being placed in derived circuit or multiple arc between the main conductors. A conduit is used, similar to a cable-road conduit, but much smaller in size, being only 9 by 12 inches interior opening, with a five-eighth-inch slot. The conductor is a Waring lead-covered cable, buried in the pavement outside of but near the conduit. Current-breakers are placed in the conduit at intervals of 25 feet, and to these the conductor is attached. The circuit is kept closed at the breakers by spring-jacks. The current-collector, attached to the car, moves in the conduit, and by pressing between the jacks it breaks the normal circuit at each breaker and directs the current through the motor. As the car passes, the spring-jacks close and again complete the normal circuit. The conductor is only exposed at the circuit-breakers, and great care must be exercised in securing perfect insulation at these points.

The Denver road is between 4 and 5 miles long, has grades as steep as 350 feet to the mile (6.6 per cent.), crosses numerous street-car and railroad tracks, and is part double and part single track. A test was made with three cars in service, with the following results: Indicated horse-power at the engine, 32; current, 40 ampères; conductor, 5 miles No. 3* wire, (B. and S. gauge); resistance of circuit, 7 ohms. Allowing 90 per cent. efficiency in the dynamo, the electrical horse-power output was 28.8. To maintain a constant current of 40 ampères through a 7-ohm circuit requires $\frac{40^2 \times 7}{746} = 15$ horse-power, leaving 13 horse-power for the three motors—an average of 4.6 horse-power each. This corresponds to about 5 horse-power at the engine. A good engine will deliver 5 horse-power for one hour with the consumption of 15 pounds of coal—3 pounds of coal per horse-power per hour. A full day of sixteen hours would require 240 pounds of coal per hour. At $3 per ton the fuel for each car would cost 32 cents per day. The constant expenditure of 16½ horse-power required at the engine to send the current over the line would cost $1.07 per day for coal at the same rates.

Three thousand one hundred feet of the Denver Railway was built in June and July, 1886, and in 1887 the present line was completed and had seven cars running. The line has been in operation through the severest winter weather. A heavy snow fell soon after the road was opened and snow-plows were put on the cars, which cleaned the track perfectly while making their regular trips. Each car is provided with sand-boxes and sand-pipes, and the track can be sanded from either end of the car by the driver.

The Columbus (Ohio) road is to be constructed on this system. Two trains will be run, the cars having a capacity of 120 passengers each. The speed will be about 10 miles an hour.

The special advantages of conduit systems are:

1. They are less objectionable in cities than the overhead systems.

2. The metallic conductors are buried beyond the possibility of accidental contact, and high-tension currents can be used, if necessary, though it is preferable to keep the potential down to safe limits.

The special disadvantages are their great cost and the fact that bare wires in a conduit are greatly exposed and are liable to leakage, grounds, and short-circuits.

DENVER, COLO., March 1, 1888.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter of inquiry of the 23d ultimo: A plant for an electric railway was commenced in this city two years ago. It has been operated with indifferent success a part of the time since. It is claimed by the owners that the obstacles they have encountered will shortly be overcome. I am not sufficiently familiar with their affairs to give an intelligent opinion as to the future of the road. Up to the present time it certainly can not be considered a success.

Yours truly,

WM. SCOTT LEE, Mayor.

Capt. EUGENE GRIFFIN,
Assistant to Engineer Commissioner, Washington, D. C.

DENVER, COLO., March 1, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Your inquiry of the 24th ultimo is at hand. The experiment of running street cars by electricity upon the Short system has been expensively tried in this city, and has been, I think, finally abandoned.

* * * * * * *

Very respectfully, yours,

H. C. LOWRIE, City Engineer.

Capt. EUGENE GRIFFIN,
Assistant to Engineer Commissioner,
Engineer Corps, Washington, D. C.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio, the Chair understood, asked that the question might be divided.

Mr. CALL. Before the question is put, without delaying the Senate, I desire to make a few very brief observations.

Mr. BLAIR. Is the debate continuing upon this electric motor business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We shall get to a vote in a minute or two.

Mr. BLAIR. Can it be stopped by objection?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can not, unanimous consent having been given.

Mr. SHERMAN. I thought there was unanimous consent that if I would give way we should have a vote as soon as I sat down.

Mr. BLAIR. I thought there was to be an immediate vote as soon as the Senator from Ohio had ceased to speak on the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair knows no way of limiting debate in the Senate. The Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the question of the condition of the people in the different municipalities of this country is one of very great importance. That the government of the District of Columbia in the hands of Congress should be made an example for the benefit of the people throughout the country, as well as in order that the people who are here should receive the benefits of good government, is, I think, an important consideration.

The grant of franchises for transportation over the highways of our cities, and the power of taxation which accompanies it, has become oppressive to the people of this country, until it may be said that, to a large extent, it is not possible for the laboring people of the country to be property owners in any great part within the limits of our great cities.

The franchises to corporations or individuals for illuminating cities, for furnishing light and furnishing transportation, that have been heedlessly granted and are oppressively exercised, have become questions of great public moment, and I do not know of any city in which I have ever passed any portion of my time in which these burdens are more grievously oppressive and more unreasonably exercised than in the city of Washington, with the sanction of ourselves, the members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives. The tax for transportation in this city is an unreasonable one, and the character of the transportation furnished is not such as the public interest and the public convenience demands.

Now, Mr. President, I agree with those who desire to make this a model city, to be equal to the improvements of the age and the improvements in the condition of the people which our civilization requires; but how shall it be done? Shall it be done by a continued reverence and respect for the idea of vested rights in individuals in derogation of the legislative and executive powers of the people in their Government? I think the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] is right that we should limit this idea, that we should prevent its growing any further than it has grown; that we should carefully preserve the people from its future assertion in any exercise of power by the legislature in granting a franchise of any kind.

It is a grave question it seems with this body whether this agency of electricity, which has already produced so much death and which is liable to produce so much more, should be authorized without the most careful consideration as to the conditions under which it is to be used. Why, Mr. President, it seems to me that the least regard for the people and the lives of the people and the comfort of the people will require that Congress shall assert in precise terms that nothing shall be done in the use of this or any other agency, except under conditions that shall be ascertained to be safe for the people and advantageous for the transportation, cheaply and expeditiously and comfortably, of the population that may have to use it. This is the least degree of care for the public interest and the public right which the representatives of the people can exercise.

Mr. President, I think, no matter what the cost to individuals, it is not a question of any concern. If we grant this franchise it should be upon the condition that it shall be at the lowest possible cost, consistent with the proper use of the means necessary and with a reasonable profit to those who engage in the construction of these lines, and with the best method of transportation and the greatest amount of comfort for the people, and that the power of Congress shall continue always over the persons holding these rights, to be exercised at any time in the discretion of those who represent the people, to control the persons who have the grant of this franchise.

I agree entirely with the Senator from Vermont that whatever may be the best method of transportation in street-railways, it should be under the control of Congress and that the conditions of its exercise should be prescribed in some certain and definite form, and I hope that the absence of consideration for the people, and the poor people of this community in this city of Washington, which has characterized the legislation of this Congress in the ten years I have been here, suffering them to be taxed and enormously taxed for the poor gas that is furnished, in order that immense profits may pass into the hands of a few persons without reason, suffering the people to be taxed too largely for transportation in order that a few individuals may become enormously rich—I hope that the indifference which has characterized Congress in the ten years I have been here to the wants of the poorer class of people will come to an end and that we shall be actuated by higher considerations of public duty and greater regard for the people than we have been heretofore.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask the Senator from Florida a question before he sits down, and that is whether during the ten years he has been here he has introduced any bill reducing the rates of fare on any of these street railroads?

Mr. CALL. I do not think I have. I have not been directly connected with the Committee on the District of Columbia, but I will say to the Senator that I do not think there has ever been any movement made in either House of Congress in that direction that has not had my support; and I will further say that I have at this session of Congress introduced a bill to let the right of furnishing gas or lighting the city to the lowest bidder for a term of years.

Mr. SPOONER. Since I have been in the Senate, which is not very long, I have heard very excited and eloquent discussions several times upon the oppressions which the street-car and other transportation companies of the city are guilty of in the exercise of their functions, and Senators indulge in such general talk apparently in the public interest and reflect indirectly, if not otherwise, upon the Committee on the District of Columbia. It seems to be an impression here that that committee and each member of it is charged with the oversight of the streets of this city and with the administration of its affairs generally. I have not so understood the duty of that committee. I know of no committee connected with the Senate which gives more prompt attention, more laborious attention to every petition, every resolution, and every bill which is introduced in the Senate and referred to it than does the Committee on the District. It deals with tedious details and performs thankless tasks.

Under instructions by the Senate we have investigated somewhat this subject of street railways and the cable system and the electric system. We have not yet completed that investigation, but in time the committee will make its report. But it seems to me that those Senators who are constantly complaining of the streets of the city and of oppression on the part of these companies, ought to indicate some further interest in the subject than by merely making eloquent, indignant, and denunciatory speeches. They are at liberty to introduce bills, to make propositions which will call for action by the proper committees of this body. I have not felt it to be my duty to hunt over this city for subjects of reform on which the Committee on the District of Columbia might act.

A great deal has been said here about the streets of this city. There are undoubtedly many places in the city where the streets are in bad condition. It is so of every large city. It is less true of this than any I know of. I had occasion last summer to travel somewhat beyond the sea, and I undertake to say that there is no city in this country or in Europe where, in a general sense, the streets are better, wider, with more adequate and more beautiful shade and in better condition than the streets of Washington are to-day.

We have reported generally at this session in favor of these suburban railways. Several such bills have been reported by the committee and passed. They were given very careful examination and much amended in order to prevent the watering of stock and unfair charges, and to secure the proper discharge of corporate duty. In all of these charters, and I think in all of the existing charters, the right has been carefully reserved to Congress to alter, amend, or repeal. We have reported these bills in the interest of the poorer people, as we thought, in order, now that property has increased in value to such an extent within the corporate limits of the city, that by furnishing easy and rapid communication by a line reaching in every direction beyond the limits of the city the people might find cheaper land upon which to erect their houses and yet not be at an inconvenient distance from their business. I suggest to the Senator that perhaps, if he knows of specific grievances under which the people labor, he might serve them certainly as well as by speech by drawing and introducing some bill upon the subject and having it referred to the appropriate committee.

Mr. CALL. I did not desire to cast any reflection upon the Committee on the District of Columbia, and especially not upon the Senator from Wisconsin, who, I am sure, has been very earnest and assiduous in the performance of his duty. I have, however, as a resident here for a considerable portion of each year for ten years past felt in my own person the negligent character of the Government, the inadequate transportation, the excessive cost, the length of time it requires to pass from one portion of the city to another, and the enormous cost of living here, which practically takes the entire salary of a Senator for the plainest and most economical method of living, which is in some part due to the franchises which are permitted to exist here and to their oppressive and extortionate use.

I am as much to blame myself, perhaps, as other Senators; but as these evils accumulate from year to year and become more and more oppressive to the great body of the people, not only here but everywhere throughout our country, the attention of the people is being attracted to them and the necessity of some action on the part of Congress which shall set an example of a wise, economical, efficient municipal government in this great city, as an example to the whole country, is, I think, a duty that is pressing upon us here. If a franchise to use the public highways—the streets—as private property for the emolument of individuals shall be granted, it should be subject to the public control, and to conditions altogether in the public interest.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I shall vote against these instructions. I know nothing about the merits of the particular question, the safety of the use of this electric power and the method of dealing with wires, but I think the resolution is vicious in principle. I do not think it places the Senate in a proper attitude in relation to executive officers for the Senate to be making what the Senator from Vermont who introduced the resolution calls an humble request to them in matters within their jurisdiction. If there be need of a peremptory interference the way is to have a joint resolution instantly brought forward, which can be done in a single day. The Senator can refer it, or he can ask the Senate to deal with it without a reference.

If we are to inaugurate a system of making petitions on the part of one of the great legislative bodies of the country to executive officers of more or less dignity, I do not see where the Senate is to stop; and it does not seem to me from the opinion of the Senators as it has been expressed in their speeches that such a request from the Senate would alter the duty of the commissioners of the District of Columbia to do exactly what they themselves think the public interests require. The law imposes some new duty upon them, and I believe the Senator from Vermont, if he were an executive officer, would not only refuse, but would delight to refuse and take uncommon satisfaction in refusing to omit the discharge of an executive duty under the law at the request of any body whatever.

Mr. EDMUNDS. According to my promise—and I shall keep it with the Senate—I shall make no reply to what my friend from Massachusetts says now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. HARRIS. What is the question, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A division having been demanded, the question first recurs upon the motion to refer.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Under the rules a motion to refer is amendable—I intended to make it in that form—by adding instructions. I think the question is first whether you will add to the motion the instructions proposed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rules provide that a motion to refer shall not be subject to amendment, except to add instructions. That does not preclude the making of a motion, the Chair thinks, originally to refer with instructions. The proposal for instructions was not offered as an amendment, as the Chair now remembers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely moved a reference with instructions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was the original motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, but I supposed that under the rule it would be journalized as an amendment, because I think the Chair is undoubtedly right, that the only way to add in any form to a simple motion to refer is as the rule provides, but I care nothing about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not confident of the correctness of his opinion, but, if there be no objection, will submit the question as upon the motion to give instructions to the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that is the best way.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BLAIR. I want to ask the Senator from Vermont a question before the vote is taken. Is it not the fact that if here are vested rights which are interfered with and the change should be made of burying the wires, the company would have the right to seek a remedy by damages against the Government?

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no pretense in this resolution of interfering with any vested rights, because it only deals with what the commissioners have done in their discretion. That is all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to add instructions.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] asked for the yeas and nays, in which I concur.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GRAY. I should like to have the amendment read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The instructions will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The motion of Mr. EDMUNDS is "to refer the said communication to the Committee on the District of Columbia with instructions to report a resolution requesting the commissioners of the District of Columbia to revoke any permit granted for erection of such overhead electric wires."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the motion to add these instructions to the reference.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN].

Mr. TELLER. You may vote notwithstanding the pair with my colleague.

Mr. CALL. I vote "yea."

Mr. COLQUITT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think I am authorized to say that my friend from Tennessee may vote. This is not a party question. I do not know myself how my colleague would vote.

Mr. HARRIS. I vote "nay" upon the statement of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. BERRY (when the name of Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, was called). My colleague [Mr. JONES, of Arkansas] is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK]. I do not know how my colleague would vote if he were present.

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

Mr. PADDOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SAWYER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON].

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] on political questions, but as this does not appear to be a political question, I will vote "yea."

Mr. VANCE (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER], and also that my colleague [Mr. RANSOM], who is absent from his seat, is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HISCOCK. I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. BATE. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. SAWYER. I reserved the right to vote to make a quorum. I vote "nay."

Mr. HISCOCK. I vote "nay" to make a quorum.

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—21.

Berry,	Daniel,	Gray,	Teller,
Blackburn,	Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Turpie,
Blair,	Dolph,	Mitchell,	Vest.
Call,	Edmunds,	Reagan,
Cockrell,	Evarts,	Saulsbury,
Coke,	Frye,	Stewart,

NAYS—18.

Allison,	Harris,	Morgan,	Sherman,
Bate,	Hawley,	Payne,	Spooner,
Beck,	Hiscock,	Platt,	Walthall.
Brown,	Hoar,	Pugh,
George,	Manderson,	Sawyer,

ABSENT—37.

Aldrich,	Eustis,	Kenna,	Sabin,
Blodgett,	Farwell,	McPherson,	Stanford,
Bowen,	Faulkner,	Morrill,	Stockbridge,
Butler,	Gibson,	Paddock,	Vance,

Colquitt,	Hearst,	Quay,
Cullom,	Ingalls,	Ransom,
Davis,	Jones of Arkansas,	Riddleberger,

So the motion to add the instructions to the motion to refer the communication to the Committee on the District of Columbia was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on the motion to refer as amended by the addition of instructions.

The motion was agreed to.

PUYALLUP AND OTHER INDIANS IN WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. MITCHELL. On the day before yesterday I offered a resolution of inquiry which, on request, was laid over. It has been read and I ask that it be taken up now. I think it will occupy not half a minute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution offered by the Senator from Oregon will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is provided in the treaty with the Puyallup and other tribes of Indians, ratified by the Senate on the 3d day of March 1855, that the whole or any portion of certain specified lands reserved to such tribe of Indians by said treaty may, under the direction of the President of the United States, be surveyed into lots and assigned to such individuals or families as are willing to avail themselves of the privilege and will locate on the same as a permanent home on the same terms and subject to the same regulations as are provided in the sixth article of the treaty with the Omahas, so far as the same may be applicable; and

Whereas said sixth article of the treaty with the Omahas provides that if any such person or family shall at any time neglect or refuse to occupy and till a portion of the lands assigned and on which they have located, or shall rove from place to place, the President may, if the patent shall have been issued, cancel the assignment, and may also withhold from such person or family their proportion of the annuities or other moneys due them, until they shall have returned to such permanent home and resumed the pursuits of industry; and in default of their return the tract may be declared abandoned and thereafter assigned to some other person or family of such tribe, or disposed of as is provided for the disposition of the excess of said land; and

Whereas it has been alleged that there has been neglect on the part of a large number of persons and families to whom lands have been assigned under such treaty stipulations, to occupy and till any portion of the lands so assigned, and otherwise have failed to comply with the terms of said treaty stipulations: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to inquire and report to the Senate at his earliest practicable convenience whether any persons or families belonging to the Puyallup tribe of Indians in Washington Territory have at any time, and when and for what time, neglected or refused to occupy and till a portion of the lands assigned to them, or any of them, and, if so, what persons or families and what lands, and whether such persons or families, or any of them, have or have not been roving from place to place, and whether in any other respect whatever any of such Indians or families have failed to comply with the treaty stipulations and laws of Congress applicable to the allotment and patenting of lands to such Indians, and, if so, in what respect and to what extent.

Resolved further, That the Secretary of the Interior shall report to the Senate what portion, if any, of the lands of the Puyallup reservation in Washington Territory have never yet been assigned or patented to any of the families or individuals of such tribe, with a description of the location of such lands.

The resolution was agreed to.

CLAIMS FOR COMMISSARY AND QUARTERMASTER'S SUPPLIES.

Mr. SPOONER. I offer a resolution and ask that it lie over:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to the Senate, at the earliest practicable date, a list of the claims for commissary and quartermaster's supplies and stores, and for fuel, fences, and other property, alleged to have been taken and used by the armies of the United States during the late rebellion, upon which there has been adverse departmental action, with the names of claimants, alphabetically arranged, the State of the claimant's residence, and the nature and amount of each claim.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over at the request of the Senator from Wisconsin.

POSTAL CRIMES.

Mr. VEST. A bill passed the Senate a few days ago, and passed the House and went to the President, in regard to postal crimes, and it will be remembered by the Chair and Senators that it was recalled, and when it came back there was a question involved upon the proper action to be taken in relation to it. After consultation, its friends concluded that the shortest way out of the difficulty was to introduce a new bill. That bill was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and has been reported back. It is simply intended to correct a mistake in the other bill, and the Post-Office Department is exceedingly anxious to have it passed. There are infractions of the law going on every day in regard to mailing obscene publications, which this bill is intended to meet. It is a unanimous report, and is entirely correct. I ask the Senator from Maine not to object to taking it up. It will lead to no debate whatever.

Mr. FRYE. I withhold my motion for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be reported by title.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 3447) amendatory of "An act relating to postal crimes and amendatory of the statutes therein mentioned," approved June 18, 1888, and for other purposes.

Mr. VEST. I move to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the last clause of the second section of "An act relating to postal crimes, and amendatory of the statutes therein mentioned," approved June 18, 1888, be, and the same is hereby, so amended as to read as follows, and constitute the third section of said act:

"SEC. 3. That all matter otherwise mailable by law, upon the envelope or outside cover or wrapper of which, or any postal card upon which, any delineations, epithets, terms, or language of an indecent, lewd, lascivious, obscene, libelous, scurrilous, defamatory, or threatening character, or calculated by the terms or manner or style of display and obviously intended to reflect injuriously upon the character or conduct of another may be written or printed, or otherwise impressed or apparent, are hereby declared non-mailable matter, and shall not be conveyed in the mails, nor delivered from any post-office nor by any letter-carrier, and shall be withdrawn from the mails under such regulations as the Postmaster-General shall prescribe: and any person who shall knowingly deposit, or cause to be deposited, for mailing or delivery, anything declared by this section to be non-mailable matter, and any person who shall knowingly take the same or cause the same to be taken from the mails, for the purpose of circulating or disposing of, or of aiding in the circulation or disposition of the same, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, for each and every offense, and upon conviction thereof, be fined not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, or imprisoned at hard labor not less than one year nor more than ten year, or both, at the discretion of the court."

SEC. 2. That section 3892 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of July 12, 1876, is hereby so amended as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3892. Every obscene, lewd, or lascivious book, pamphlet, picture, paper, letter, writing, print, or other publication of an indecent character, and every article or thing designed or intended for the prevention of conception or procuring of abortion, and every article or thing intended or adapted for any indecent or immoral use, and every written or printed card, letter, circular, book, pamphlet, advertisement, or notice of any kind giving information, directly or indirectly, where or how, or of whom, or by what means any of the hereinbefore mentioned matters, articles, or things may be obtained or made, whether sealed as first-class matter or not, are hereby declared to be non-mailable matter, and shall not be conveyed in the mails nor delivered from any post-office nor by any letter-carrier; and any person who shall knowingly deposit, or cause to be deposited, for mailing or delivery, anything declared by this section to be non-mailable matter, and any person who shall knowingly take the same, or cause the same to be taken, from the mails for the purpose of circulating or disposing of, or of aiding in the circulation or disposition of the same, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, for each and every offense, be fined upon conviction thereof not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, or imprisoned at hard labor not less than one year nor more than ten years, or both, at the discretion of the court. And all offenses committed under the section of which this is amendatory, prior to the approval of this act, may be prosecuted and punished under the same in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been passed: Provided, That nothing in this act shall authorize any person to open any letter or sealed matter of the first class not addressed to himself."

Mr. HOAR. I should like to appeal to the Senator in charge of the bill to amend it so as to strike out the minimum punishment wherever it occurs. I think that has been the policy of the Senate for some time.

Mr. VEST. I have not the slightest objection. The bill was drawn in the Post-Office Department.

Mr. HOAR. I may perhaps state, in explanation of the suggestion, that some of these offenses are often committed by children barely within the age of punishment, or by persons of feeble mind, where some slight punishment may be necessary. To get a pardon for that class of persons by coming to Washington from Washington Territory or Oregon is a very serious thing to do; and it seems to me the judges should always have the power to inflict a merely nominal punishment.

Mr. VEST. I entirely agree with the Senator. I have always thought that to be the best form of legislation in our penal statutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts will require a careful scrutiny of each section of the bill.

Mr. HOAR. I think I can state the amendments in a moment, if the clerks will allow me to take the bill. In section 1, line 28, I move to strike out the words "less than $100 nor," and in line 29 to strike out "less than one year nor;" so as to read:

Shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, for each and every offense, and upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned at hard labor not more than ten years, or both, at the discretion of the court.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is that all the amendment to the first section?

Mr. HOAR. It is all the amendment to the first section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. In the second section, line 26, I move to strike out the words "less than $100 nor," and in line 27 to strike out "less than one year nor;" so as to read:

Shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, for each and every offense, be fined upon conviction thereof not more than $5,000, or imprisoned at hard labor not more than ten years, or both, at the discretion of the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there further amendments to the bill as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I am glad that the amendments have been made which were suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, but I sincerely think that we disfigure the criminal statutes by extreme penalties. I think that the other limit should be altered also; I think it is too great. While it is a very mean offense in many cases, I can hardly imagine a case in which I would send any fool of that kind to the penitentiary for ten years and fine him $5,000.

Mr. VEST. That is the provision of the Revised Statutes at present. I think if the Senator knew all the circumstances surrounding these offenses he would not object to the penalty. I do not think it is quite large enough. I have letters in my possession, which are not fit to be read in the Senate, which I can produce, that show offenses committed against the statute now upon the statute-books for which it would be very hard to find any punishment adequate, cases in which these villainous publications have been sent to ladies, to young girls. In one case a female academy was deluged with them. They are most villainous and outrageous things. I would rather see in the hands of one of my children a rattlesnake or a cotton-mouth than to see one of these books. Men have used them in the city of New York, according to the reports of the Post-Office Department, for malicious purposes. A man who had a grudge against a lady would send one of these things through the office directed to the lady, and she would be outraged by tearing off the envelope and finding the publication in her hands. I could go on and give various instances.

They succeeded in evading the law. The present law did not reach the case of written publications; it only applied to print. These scoundrels went to work and used the new stylographic process, frequently used by public men now, giving a fac-simile imitation of your letter and your signature. They took these awful publications, which I shall not name here, and stylographed them from one end to the other and put them in the mail, and they are being sent forth all over the country to young people.

Sir, there is no crime in the calendar, not even murder, that is worse than this. It saps the very foundation of society. It poisons the minds of the young; it outrages the sensibilities of the old. It is to get at that very thing that this bill is being enacted. I do not think the penalty is too great. If I were a judge upon the bench and found a man who had been guilty of this thing, I would put him in the penitentiary for life. He ought to be excluded from contact with society and with his kind. A fine of $5,000 is a mere bagatelle to such a man as that.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to suggest to the Senator that he ought to have made the crime a felony. It is a misdemeanor punishable by ten years in the penitentiary. I suggest that it be made a felony.

Mr. VEST. It is a felony. The punishment fixes the nature of the offense.

Mr. TELLER. The proposed statute declares that the offender "shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor."

Mr. VEST. That simply follows the Revised Statutes as the law is now.

Mr. TELLER. He would be guilty of a felony under this proposed statute; he may have the punishment of a felony.

Mr. VEST. The punishment would fix the nature of the offense; it makes no difference what it is called.

Mr. TELLER. It seems inconsistent to punish with such great severity a misdemeanor, if the crime is, and I have no doubt it is, just as bad as the Senator suggests.

Mr. VEST. The bill was drawn by the attorney of the Post-Office Department. I have not looked over it very carefully, because I took it for granted it was all right.

Mr. TELLER. It does not adjust the character of the crime to the punishment, as ought to be done in all instances, if we declare that it is but a misdemeanor.

Mr. VEST. I do not care what the name is; I have not the slightest objection to the name. All I want to do is to punish the crime.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there further amendments to the bill as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the clause referred to in order to make it symmetrical, if there is no objection. In section 1, line 26, I move to strike out "be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall," and in line 27 to strike out the second word "and," so as to read:

Shall, for each and every offense, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned at hard labor not more than ten years, or both, at the discretion of the court.

Mr. VEST. I have no objection to that.

Mr. TELLER. That will make it a felony.

Mr. VEST. That is all right.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The same language occurs in the second section.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In section 2, line 24, I move to strike out the words "be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall;" so as to read:

Shall, for each and every offense, be fined upon conviction thereof not more than $5,000, or imprisoned at hard labor not more than ten years, or both, at the discretion of the court.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I will make another suggestion to the Senator having the bill in charge. There has been a good deal of serious discussion at one time and another during the history of the Government concerning the sacredness of the post-office, and it is well founded to so treat it, of course. If I have any hesitation about this bill it is not because I would have any more mercy than the Senator from Missouri upon the scoundrels who misuse the post-office, especially for those immoral and indecent purposes. No gentleman has the slightest sympathy for them. I am thinking, however, of the great discretion that you repose in the postmasters of the country. There are some postmasters capable of judging of what is libelous and of course most of them of what is indecent; but there are others whom I should dislike to have full power to throw a postal-card or a paper into the waste-basket. I should rather be inclined in a bill of this sort to require them in such cases to inclose the indecent matter in a sealed wrapper and forward it to the Post-Office Department.

Mr. VEST. That is always done.

Mr. HAWLEY. Is it always done now?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAWLEY. Does the law require it?

Mr. VEST. That is the practice of the Department. I am not so sure about its being the law.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am glad if it is the practice; I should have made it the law.

Mr. VEST. It is always done.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I quite agree with the object that this proposed law has in view. I am myself personally cognizant of some of the enormities which have been committed through the mails, in sending anonymous and indecent letters to persons of character and respectability by those who have some personal enmity towards them. But it is not true, in my opinion, that a very severe and unreasonable penalty will attain the object of enforcing the execution of a law, and there are very serious objections to it.

If we were entirely sure that every judgment of a court would be an honest judgment, and that the evidence which should be adduced would be such as reasonably or certainly proved the crime, then we might affix a severe penalty. But courts of justice are infirm; their processes are uncertain. There are many innocent people who are convicted and condemned in the proceedings of courts. Juries are often very weak—fallible and ignorant men seeking rather to please a prevailing public than to judge fairly and impartially; sometimes they are corrupt men, paid to betray their trust, and make their office an instrument for the punishment of those who have offended the rich and powerful.

You put an instrument in the hands of those whose malice and enmity corrupt the administration of justice. In enacting penal laws we should always have in view the fact that the processes of ascertainment of crime are in themselves very uncertain, and sometimes visit the innocent rather than the guilty. The whole spirit of our better civilization has been to temper mercy with justice, to forbid and exercise the malignant cruelty of a barbarous age, which punished with the severest penalty every departure from right, and made the law and the courts revel in human blood and suffering.

But a more practical consideration is that a very severe penalty defeats and does not enforce the execution of the law. Therefore I move to limit the period of imprisonment to not more than five instead of ten years.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida moves to amend the bill. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 30, before the word "years," it is proposed to strike out "ten" and insert "five;" so as to read:

Be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned at hard labor not more than five years, or both, at the discretion of the court.

Mr. HOAR. I think the Senator from Missouri will agree with me on consideration that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida should certainly be made in the first section of the bill, which only describes an offense of a threatening or defamatory character, and does not relate to the class of publications to which he alluded in his remarks.

I desire to say further that it is very seldom indeed that such an offense as the Senator from Missouri has described will be committed where but one single copy will have been circulated of the article which is made criminal, and therefore each offense is made by the bill separately punishable, so that if a man distributed scurrilous or defamatory or indecent matter in one single instance, five years would seem to be a reasonable punishment certainly. If he has done it in several instances he would have the five years multiplied by every instance of which he should be convicted.

So it seems to me not very important to retain the extreme penalty in the second section. I understand the present motion of the Senator from Florida applies only to the case of having on the outside of the envelope the matters which are therein described. I see that indecent matter is described also in the first section. I was mistaken in my glance at the bill.

Mr. VEST. The Senator will permit me to observe that there are two offenses which are included in this proposed statute.

The first is what is called the blackmailing process, for the collection of debts, being the use of envelopes which have put on the outside, "bad debts." Agencies have been in the habit of writing to a debtor inclosing an account or a demand for money, and they say to him, "If this demand is not acceded to, then a letter will be received by you in the within envelope." That envelope has in large letters "bad debts" or "uncollectible debts." The object of that is to advertise him as an insolvent person or a dishonest man who will not pay his debtor. That is one of the offenses.

In the second place, there are the obscene publications to which I have referred, about which I desire to say nothing here. As to the amount of punishment, as a matter of course I am not disposed to be at all strenuous. I think we could leave it to a judge as to whether it shall be $1 or $5,000 fine, or one day's imprisonment or five years' imprisonment. Every lawyer will agree with me that that is what Congress ought to do.

The observations of the Senator from Florida as to the administration of justice of course will apply as long as human nature exists, but we are bound to use the courts. We have no other instrumentality, and we are bound to vest much discretion in judges. My observation has been that it is a very rare thing to find a judge who abuses the discretion that is given to him by the penal statutes.

Mr. FRYE. Is not the minute about up?

Mr. VEST. That is all I wish to say. I hope a vote will be taken.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I do not propose to delay the Senate——

Mr. VEST. I will agree to make the maximum five years, so as to shorten debate. I promised the Senator from Maine that I would not take up any time. I am not particular about it. Make it five years and let us pass the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 30, before the word "years," it is proposed to strike out "ten" and insert "five;" so as to read:

Or imprisoned at hard labor not more than five years.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida rise to debate the question?

Mr. CALL. I do not intend to say more than a word. I wish to say as a matter of contrary statement to that made by the Senator from Missouri that it has been my misfortune in my life to witness a great abuse of discretion by judges in the exercise of the penal authority given to them. I have seen some drunken judges upon the bench, and I have seen cases in which very depraved men whom I would not trust in private life in any transaction administer judicial power. We should have the protection of the innocent as well as the guilty in view in prescribing severe penalties.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not understand whether the maximum punishment was to be changed from ten years to five years in both sections or merely in the first section.

Mr. CALL. That was my intention.

Mr. VEST. It ought not to be.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida to section 2 will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 2, line 28, before the word "years," it is proposed to strike out "ten" and insert "five;" so as to read:

Or imprisoned at hard labor not more than five years.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to some and disagreed to other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10540) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purpose, agreed to the nineteenth amendment of the Senate to the bill with an amendment, and asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8962) for the relief of Anthony L. Woodson, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the bill and amendment, and had appointed Mr. STOCKDALE, Mr. STONE of Kentucky, and Mr. BROWER managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills:

A bill (H. R. 2190) granting a pension to Jane Smallridge;

A bill (H. R. 5155) granting a pension to John S. Bryant;

A bill (H. R. 5156) for the relief of Andrew R. G. Smith;

A bill (H. R. 5863) authorizing the Richmond and Danville Railroad Company to lay tracks, and so forth, in the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. 9263) granting a pension to Abraham J. Buckles;

A bill (H. R. 9363) granting a pension to Edwin J. Godfrey;

A bill (H. R. 9830) for the relief of Lachlan H. McIntosh; and

A bill (S. 94) for the relief of Perez Dickinson, surviving partner of the late firm of Cowan & Dickinson.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BECK. I move, at the request of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that the Senate agree to the conference asked for by the House on the sundry civil bill.

Mr. HALE. Is there a request for a conference?

Mr. BECK. Yes; but the House has not named its conferees.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the message read.

The Secretary read the action of the House of Representatives on the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There are no conferees named by the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BERRY in the chair). The message asks for a conference but does not name the conferees on the part of the House.

Mr. HALE. It can be sent back and the conferees named, I suppose.

Mr. BECK. The object of my motion was that the Senate insist upon its amendments and ask for a conference with the House, and that the Chair name the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It will need more than the ordinary motion, because as to some of the amendments the House has concurred with further amendments. Therefore I think the proper motion would be, if leaving it open at all, to disagree to the House amendments to the Senate amendments. I believe they have asked a conference on the whole, have they not? Let the Secretary read the last clause again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The last clause will be again read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the House ask a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That raises a question, because it respects the amendments of the House to the Senate amendments, of which there are two or more; and there are others as to which there is no disagreement.

Mr. BECK. An amendment to our amendments is a disagreement.

Mr. HALE. Certainly an amendment to an amendment is a disagreement.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should think not, but I do not know that I care about it. Whenever we have asked a conference on a matter of that kind we have insisted on the amendments we have made, and asked a conference on them, not because the House has disagreed, but we have a right to ask a conference on any proposition that we send to the House. However, I do not care how it is done so that we get the Journal right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Kentucky state his motion again?

Mr. BECK. My motion was that the Senate insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House, which I suppose means those they amended as well as the others.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I would add "and disagree to the amendments made by the House to the Senate amendments."

Mr. BECK. Yes.

Mr. HALE. And that the conferees be named by the Chair, and then the message should be sent back to the House to have the conferees named there.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Of course. If they do not name the conferees, the bill is hung up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK].

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, by unanimous consent, will appoint as the managers of the conference on the part of the Senate Mr. ALLISON, Mr. HALE, and Mr. BECK.

BUST OF GARIBALDI.

Mr. EVARTS. I present a resolution to be passed by the Senate acknowledging the gift to the United States of a bust of Garibaldi, the Italian patriot, and I ask that it lie on the table and on Wednesday next I shall request the indulgence of the Senate to make some remarks upon it.

The resolution is as follows:

Whereas the Italians, residents of the city of Washington and citizens of the United States, have, through the president of the Society for a Monument to Garibaldi, presented to the United States a life-size marble bust of that great patriot and distinguished representative citizen of Italy, Guiseppe Garibaldi; and

Whereas the Joint Committee on the Library have, under authority of the statute (Revised Statutes, section 1831), accepted the same for and in behalf of the United States: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That Congress, through the Senate of the United States, express its due sense of the patriotism and liberality which prompted this noble gift and fine work of art, from these adopted citizens of Italian birth, and extend to them, the countrymen of the great champion of Italian liberty, the assurance of the admiration of the people of this land for his noble life and distinguished deeds.

LOUISIANA ELECTION.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration——

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator from Maine to yield in order that I may give a notice. I desire to give notice that on Wednesday next I shall ask the Senate to take up the resolution in reference to the investigation of the Louisiana election, and that I shall submit some remarks thereon.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate proceed, in open executive session, to the consideration of the fisheries treaty.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is now in open executive session. The reading of the Journal of the last open executive session will be dispensed with, if there be no objection. The Executive Clerk will report the treaty by its title.

The EXECUTIVE CLERK. A treaty between the United States and Great Britain concerning the interpretation of the convention of October 20, 1818, signed at Washington February 15, 1888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON].

Mr. FRYE. I ask unanimous consent that the following arrangement may be agreed to as an order of the Senate:

That at 1 o'clock each day the debate on the treaty shall proceed, and shall close on Monday next at 6 o'clock, the friends of the treaty having the last two hours. On Tuesday at 12 o'clock the final votes shall be taken on all amendments, motions, and the resolution of ratification.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? [A pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MORGAN obtained the floor.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet at 11 o'clock on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. Will it interrupt the Senator from Alabama for me to submit a conference report now?

Mr. MORGAN. Will it take any length of time?

Mr. HALE. That I can not say.

Mr. MORGAN. I should not like to have it taken up for consideration just now.

Mr. HALE. Then I will not urge it.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no objection to its being submitted.

Mr. HALE. I will withhold it for the present.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes the consideration of the fisheries treaty in open executive session. The Executive Clerk will state the motion of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON], which is pending.

The EXECUTIVE CLERK. A resolution to recommit the pending treaty with Great Britain to the Committee on Foreign Relations with certain instructions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question on the motion of the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I am entirely conscious, as I think a majority of the members of the Senate must be, that a great deal of the debate on the pending treaty has been very irrelevant, I might say entirely apart from the real issues that are presented for our consideration. What we desire to know about this matter is whether the treaty is one that should meet the approval of the Senate of the United States representing the American people; but a great deal of the debate that has obtained here has been upon matters totally irrelevant to that particular feature of this case. I have participated in it along with other Senators, because I felt that it was my duty, and the necessity of the situation seemed to require it of me that I should try to meet as well as I could all these extraneous matters, these make-weights, in the debate of this very important question. I have endeavored to get them out of view, so that when the treaty came to be read by articles and we had to consider the real merits of the negotiation our minds might to some extent at least be disembarrassed of those influences which are so calculated to mislead the judgment and to present these grave questions in a false light to the consideration of the American people.

In speaking during this very warm afternoon upon this question I speak with a consciousness that the treaty will not be ratified. I am obliged to admit, after the vote which was taken in the Senate on yesterday, that every feature of this case will be controlled and decided according to the influence of party politics, and those of us who may deprecate that situation can do no more than leave upon the record here the vindication of our own action in support of or in opposition to the treaty, as the case may be.

I trust that I shall be able to speak upon this treaty dispassionately, and with no other motive influencing a word that I shall say or a sentiment that I shall express than merely a desire to serve the country in what I conceive to be a grave emergency.

In looking over the diplomatic correspondence between this country and Great Britain, the vast number of communications which have passed between the two governments, the judicial decisions which have been made in this country and Great Britain and in the provinces touching this vexed question of the construction of the treaty of 1818, and the debates in the Senate of the United States and in the Canadian Parliament upon these questions, I find that there has not been an agreed or conceded fact or principle in respect of any one of the questions which have arisen out of this long historical embroilment.

Nothing has reached the stage of a definite agreement, that has been in real controversy during all these years, until we reach the negotiation now before the Senate.

I can not call to mind now a single question which has ever arisen and been mooted in a serious way between these governments in regard to the proper construction of the treaty of 1818, or, for that matter, of the treaty of 1783, which has received the open and firm consentive sanction of both governments. I do not believe that any Senator on this floor can point out any agreement which has been entered into by these great powers which has finally and forever settled any controversy—involving a matter of principle, I mean—that has risen upon the surface of this vexed sea of discussion and controversy.

The question has been discussed here in all its historical bearings, back to the very foundation of the right about which we are controverting; and I expect that an impartial judgment would be that more has been brought forward in this discussion which is calculated to throw light upon the real merits of this controversy than has ever before appeared either in the diplomatic correspondence of the country, or in the judicial decisions to which I have referred, or in the debates which have hitherto occurred, at least in the Senate of the United States and the Dominion Parliament.

While a good deal of this debate has been attended with partisan acrimony, some of it with unpleasant incidents, there is nevertheless to be found in these debates the most intricate research that I think can be found in any of the papers which have heretofore been written, or in the speeches which have been made upon these questions. I refer with pleasure, along with others, to the speech of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], who bestowed great care in the investigation of these questions, and who has presented here a historical and philosophical view of the origin of the rights and the progress of the controversy about them which I think does very great credit to that honorable Senator, and to which I think the country in after years will refer, if these controversies are to be still kept alive, with a great deal of satisfaction. Others have also presented powerful arguments and earnest and diligent research, for which the country will thank them in time to come.

I make my sincere acknowledgments to all the honorable Senators for the light they have shed upon this great controversy.

I am spared on this occasion any necessity of going back over this long historical journey for the purpose of attempting to throw any ray of light upon any question which has been presented here that has not already reached its most intricate recesses.

In addition to the aid they have given me I shall also be greatly assisted by the sincere and exhaustive presentation of the true issues between the United States and Great Britain found in the labors of Hon. Hamilton Fish while he was President Grant's Secretary of State.

I have said that nothing had been settled as to the fisheries disputes between these countries. Nothing but the nature and limits of the controversy has been settled. A solution of the questions involved in the controversy has never yet been finally reached. I believe that the treaties of 1854 and 1871 were intended to be a permanent settlement and disposal of these contentions, but, unfortunately I think, we inserted an article in each of those treaties whereby either government after the lapse of ten years, becoming dissatisfied, might put a termination to them, and thereby reopen, as has now twice been done, all of this imbroglio clear back to the bottom. We are in that category now where every difficulty, every controverted point that has ever yet arisen out of the construction of the treaties of 1818 and 1783 seems to be presented for the purpose of having its weight in the determination to which we shall arrive. So much have we said and done and so little have we settled.

But in the progress of the negotiations between the two countries, as I have just observed, they have agreed, and solemnly agreed—I do not mean by compact, but they have agreed without a compact between each other—as to what is the real subject-matter of the controversy now presented in issue before the Senate of the United States. I propose to accept the statements of both governments, because they were currently made, as to what is now the real matter in controversy between these two powers, as presenting in a concise and authoritative if not an obligatory form upon both powers the matters of dispute that require to be settled.

I think I may safely assume in the presence of recorded facts and upon their authority that the real merits of these questions do not lead us back beyond a recent date in history, and are fixed by the attitude of this country solemnly and deliberately taken in 1871. Equally it may be affirmed that the real matters in dispute were presented by the British Government in 1871, and nothing has occurred since 1871 to change the attitude of either Government towards the other in the slightest degree. The question is now precisely what it was then.

If I can establish by recorded facts, by the committals of both these Governments, what the real controversy was in 1871, and that it has not been in any degree altered from that time to this, I think I shall be able to present to the Senate and to the country a very distinct view of what the President was called upon to settle when he entered into this negotiation.

In 1871 the Government of the United States, having just emerged from a most unfortunate civil war, found itself embarrassed by events which had occurred during that war, and by unsettled questions which were pending at the time the war began, with the greatest of the European powers, as we think—the Government of Great Britain. There existed toward that Government, in consequence of certain sympathies which had been expressed for one of the contending parties in the United States, and in consequence of certain acts which had occurred during that struggle, a feeling of extreme jealousy, I might say of great bitterness, and it required the control of the very best minds and of the most patriotic men on both sides of the Atlantic Ocean to bring these subjects within reach of negotiation in such form as that they might be settled forever. They were very numerous and very grave subjects of diplomatic settlement, and they were urgent. No time could be safely lost in their settlement.

The Senate of the United States, upon the recommendation and request of the President, took into consideration the whole situation as presented between Great Britain and the United States in that time of great international heat and controversy. It was debated in this body with carefulness, with wisdom, and with patriotism. The whole subject was gone over in the most careful way, and nothing that then remained open between these two Governments was omitted from consideration.

Our Government organized what was called a joint high commission, under the authority of the President of the United States and the Senate, not by an act of Congress; and that joint high commission was intrusted with the preliminary arrangement of all the questions which were then open between the United States and Great Britain. I suppose, sir, indeed I know, that unless it was the commissioners who settled the question of peace between the United States and Great Britain just after the Revolutionary war, no body of diplomatists were ever intrusted with such great questions, and none were ever invested with higher powers of negotiation than the gentlemen who comprised that commission. Mr. Fish was then Secretary of State and General Grant was President of the United States. In a note addressed to Mr. Schenck, the same note being addressed afterwards to each of the other joint high commissioners on our behalf, Mr. Fish says:

You will receive herewith a confidential memorandum or brief, embodying a reference to correspondence of this Department, and to the history of several of the questions which may be discussed by the commission, namely:

I. The fisheries.
II. The navigation of the St. Lawrence.
III. Reciprocal trade between the United States and the Dominion of Canada.
IV. Northwest water boundary and the island of San Juan.
V. The claims of the United States against Great Britain on account of acts committed by rebel cruisers.
VI. Claims of British subjects against the United States for losses and injuries arising out of acts committed during the recent civil war in the United States.

I apprehend there was never grouped together six more important and difficult questions than were presented on that occasion, and I am entirely justified in saying that it was the object of those joint high commissioners, as it was of the Government of the United States and also of Great Britain, that a treaty should result in the settlement of all these questions, and was expected and intended to compose all of the difficulties of any material consequence then existing between the United States and Great Britain.

Our relations with Great Britain, always important and delicate, and requiring the most careful handling, were then extremely sensitive and vitally important.

It therefore became a matter of the very highest consideration that our Government in giving its instructions to Mr. Fish, Judge Nelson, Mr. Schenck, Mr. Hoar, and Mr. Williams, our commissioners, should present the whole question, and all the facts relating to each one of these controversies, in such form as had been determined and agreed upon by our Government in settling its policy, not merely in a tentative form or in an experimental way, but in such form as our Government had solemnly concluded would present the merits of the controversy in respect of each one of these great leading topics, and would eventuate in a full and final settlement that would be acceptable alike to our own people and those who are kindred in blood and language to our people. In the highest sense of unity that belongs to a common origin we are identical, and our divisions are found only in our forgetfulness of our race alliance.

So the Secretary of State, after the Senate and the President had authorized this joint conference, proceeded to give his instructions at length separately upon each and every one of these various topics to which I have just alluded; and so on the part of the British Government, with less of detail, but no less of certainty, the instructions were issued to their members of this Joint High Commission. The subjects to which the British Government said their attention would probably be directed were—

1. The fisheries.
2. The free navigation of the river St. Lawrence and privilege of passage through the Canadian canals.
3. The transit of goods through Maine, and lumber trade down the river St. John.
4. The Manitoba boundary.
5. The claims on account of the Alabama, Shenandoah, and certain other cruisers of the so-styled Confederate States.
6. The San Juan water-boundary.
7. The claims of British subjects arising out of the civil war.
8. The claims of the people of Canada on account of the Fenian raids.
9. The revision of the rules of maritime neutrality.

Copies of all the correspondence which have been presented to Parliament respecting these questions will be forwarded for your use.

Here we shall find the two Governments concurring as to every one of the subjects that were made a matter of discussion, doubtless, in the Senate, certainly in the State Department, that were to be settled in regard to all of these unsettled points of controversy between the United States and Great Britain, except that in respect to the Fenian raids, which was never considered by that commission because our commissioners had no instructions which reached to that point in the case.

When the British Government came to state in respect of the fisheries

what the particular question in controversy was, they presented it as follows:

The two chief questions are: As to whether the expression "three marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions" should be taken to mean a limit of 3 miles from the coast line, or a limit of 3 miles from a line drawn from headland to headland; and whether the proviso that "the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays or harbors for the purpose of shelter, and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood, and of obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever," is intended to exclude American vessels from coming inshore to traffic, transship fish, purchase stores, hire seamen, etc.

It occurs to me that there has been a great waste of learning and a great waste of toil and investigation by the learned Senators who have participated in this discussion upon the treaty, to arrive at what was the British contention, when we find that, in respect of the fisheries, it was thus clearly and definitely stated in the instructions to the British commissioners. Not only do I not object to the development of this learning and research with which the Senate has been favored, but I am very much gratified that it has occurred, because as I think it fortifies the position of Senators here on our side of this question very materially by having established the fact, as they have traced it through the history of the fisheries questions, that the British contention from the beginning and throughout the whole line of this history down to the date of these instructions was precisely what it is stated here to be in the instructions to the British commissioners. As I will presently show, the two governments, while arguing to opposite conclusions, have all the time discussed the same points of controversy, and on the same facts.

Before debating that matter any further, I desire to present the inquiry, what is it that we are trying to do here? Occupying, as it has been frequently stated by Senators and without objection from anybody, the position in this Chamber of negotiators, as I term it, of the second degree, but, being engaged here now in the consideration of a negotiation with a view to its improvement, its ratification, or its rejection, what is the real question which is here presented?

It is not what we are disposed to concede to be the absolute, certain, and undeniable right of Great Britain in respect of these various features and forms of controversy, but the question is whether this has been the state of the controversy entertained and presented by Great Britain hitherto, and whether the controversy upon its face is so intelligent, so easy of understanding as that it can not well be mistaken, whether it is definite so that we can meet it with a counter proposition if we choose to do so; and over and above everything else, whether it is entertained with sincerity by that Government.

When one of the great powers of the earth, or the small ones either, is engaged in a diplomatic debate or disputation with the United States upon matters which concern both Governments, we do ourselves excessive discredit if we continue to negotiate with those people when we are compelled by the stress of the truth to say that the pretensions they set up are false, insincere, and are not advanced in good faith. Whenever a government negotiating with another occupies such an attitude that the motives which influence its pretensions are liable to this sort of questioning, there is nothing remaining to be done but to terminate the negotiation at once, and that upon the ground that the government has stultified and defamed itself by the presentation of a false clamor or a false question, knowing that it has no foundation in truth or justice.

I believe, Mr. President, that we have not quite advanced to that condition in respect of any controversy which Great Britain has ever yet presented to us. I would not choose, if I could prevent it, to be a party to inflicting upon the reputation of the men to whom we are of so close kin as we are to those of Great Britain such a scandal as would necessarily result from a declaration on the part of the Senate of the United States or the President of the United States that that Government was presenting an unfounded, a false, a simulated, a fraudulent, an insincere pretension, and of putting that down as the basis of diplomatic negotiations with us. If I had the power and felt that it was my duty to say such a thing as that about the British Government, I should prefer to have it said with closed doors; and immediately upon that declaration having been avouched by a vote of this body I should contend that that Government should never any more hold diplomatic relations with the United States Government, and that after that hour the controversy between them should be settled only by wager of battle.

Here is a statement which I have just read from the instructions to the joint high commissioners in 1871 of the full measure, the full outline and substance of the British contention as they presented it through their instructed agents to our diplomatic agents on this side. It is as simple as anything can be. It is as direct and as plain as anything can be. It involves, first of all, what is called here the headland theory, which, by the way, is such an indefinite expression that sometimes it is very misleading in its application; but it involves the question here so clearly stated, whether it is called a headland theory or by some other name.

I will again read the statement of the question as it was stated by the British foreign office to their diplomatists on the Joint High Commission of 1871:

The two chief questions are: As to whether the expression "3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions" should be taken to mean a limit of 3 miles from the coast line, or a limit of 3 miles from a line drawn from headland to headland—

You see that is the first question that they present. That is what they insist upon. Also—and whether the proviso that "the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays or harbors for the purpose of shelter, and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood, and of obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever, is intended to exclude American vessels from coming inshore to traffic, transship fish, purchase stores, hire seamen, etc.

I do not believe that a pleading was ever presented in a court of justice that more distinctly set forth the rights of the complainant or the defendant, as the case might be, than this statement of these instructions to their commissioners set forth what was in 1871 the British contention; and, now, for Senators to say that that was not then the British contention is simply to stultify Great Britain, or else it is to impugn the veracity of that great power, and more than that, to cast odium upon its respectability.

This matter is fully confirmed and as clearly stated on the other side of this great controversy by the instructions which we gave to our commissioners. Of course the British Government had nothing to do with our instructions, nor had we anything to do with their instructions, but here was a concurrence of statement between these two governments as to its own understanding of the history of the controversy about the fisheries.

I do not know that truth has a greater support than when its substance is stated in almost identical terms by the opposing parties to a great controversy, they not having had any conference or debate that would bring their conclusions into the same channel and produce the same results, while each was acting for itself and both are found arriving at the same conclusion.

Mr. Fish, in the conclusion of his instructions to our commissioners on June 3, 1870, made this statement:

Mr. Thornton communicated officially to the Department the instructions issued to the commander of the British naval forces, by which it would appear that, notwithstanding the decision of the umpire in 1853, Her Majesty's Government in 1866 were "clearly of the opinion that by the convention of 1818 the United States have renounced the right of fishing, not only within 3 miles of the colonial shores, but within 3 miles of a line drawn across the mouth of any British bay or creek; but that they are not disposed, for the present, to enforce what they regard as their rights."—Foreign Relations, 1870, page 419.

Mr. Fish makes that quotation from Foreign Relations of 1870, page 419, and hands it to the commissioners as presenting a phase of the British contention which they were expected to meet.

The whole correspondence—

He proceeds to say—in the book last cited, from page 407 to page 434, bears directly upon the issues now raised.

And so it does.

Mr. Thornton—

Continues Mr. Fish—

informed Mr. Fish that he had "received instructions from Earl Granville to explain to Mr. Fish that the instructions respecting the limits within which the prohibition of fishing is to be enforced against the United States fishermen are not to be considered as constituting an arrangement between the Governments of the United States and of Great Britain, by which Canadian rights are waived or the United States fishermen invested with any privilege.

Can anything be more distinct than that?

Based upon that statement, drawn largely from the communication of the British minister to our Government, Mr. Fish proceeds to give a summary of the conclusions for the guidance of our diplomatists to whom these high powers were intrusted.

SUMMARY OF THE CONCLUSIONS ESTABLISHED BY THE FOREGOING REVIEW.

I. That the acquisition of the right to American fishermen to fish on the inshore fisheries, from which they are now excluded, is more important as removing danger of collision than as of great intrinsic value. Its money value is probably overestimated by the Canadians.

That is his first conclusion in the summary.

II. That the British headland doctrine has no foundation in the treaty, has been decided against Great Britain in a cause where it was the only issue, and is now insisted upon theoretically rather than practically.

III. That the right now asserted to exclude American fishermen from the open ports of the Dominion; to prevent them from purchasing bait, supplies, ice, etc.; to prevent them from transshipping their fish in bond, under color of the provisions of the convention of 1818, is an assumption and a construction of that instrument which was never acquiesced in by the United States; and is carrying out in practice provisions which were proposed to the United States commissioners by the British commissioners in 1818, and were rejected by the former.

IV. That the mackerel fishery, out of which the trouble mostly comes, is a matter that has come into existence since the negotiation of the treaty, and it is a subject for consideration whether the terms of the convention are fairly applicable to it.

If the "British headland doctrine" had been abandoned before 1871, why should Mr. Fish be then found controverting its soundness, thereby admitting its existence?

There we have the issue made up. Mr. Fish states no less distinctly than the British secretary of state what was the British contention, but he takes care in making that statement to show how far we controvert it. We do not, according to his statement, controvert it absolutely and entirely, but in certain points we do. There is the issue joined between the two governments in 1871. As to the fisheries, it was upon the basis of that issue that the arrangement of 1871 was made.

The treaty of 1871 was predicated upon that with some slight modifications—not of principles, but with a provision by which the question which had been in controversy, admitted to have been in controversy, between the two governments were—not settled, but passed and substituted by another arrangement which involved upon our part payment at least of $5,500,000 and during the whole period of the prevalence of that treaty the surrender on our part of all duties upon fish and fish-oil of every description I believe, or almost every description.

Now, let me ask why this consensus, why this concurrence of opinion and statement thus solidly made and presented by each Government to its commissioners, does not amount to such an understanding between the two Governments of what the real controversy was as that it could be the subject of negotiation—that they might take up the question where the Government left it in 1871 and proceed to base their negotiations on those conceded facts?

Where is the use on the part of either Government or her statesmen, jurists, or publicists to go into the depths of ancient history on these questions? Why are they reaching back to the date of the first origin of the controverted rights, tracing them down through all the mutations of affairs, all the changes of government, all the different causes that might have affected their presentation with more or less of force at one period or another? Why do they examine all of the different shades and shadows that have been thrown upon these questions by the opinions of different men—for men will differ not only in their opinions but in the manner of expressing their opinions—where was the necessity for a diplomatist who undertook to represent the American side of this question to go back through these ancient archives, to traverse these hidden, dust-covered paths of the past, with a view to see whether he could not find something that might alter the British attitude, prove its absurdity or its insincerity, when our own Government in the statement of it to her own commissioners had presented the British contention in the identical form in which it was presented by Great Britain to her commissioners in 1871?

Can not the American people get their consent to consider at least that in 1871 the issues were formed about which future diplomacy or future controversy might be conducted?

I shall therefore, Mr. President, base the argument that I have to make in this case upon the fact—I shall not call it an assumption, for it is no assumption at all—I will base my argument upon the fact that these instructions thus given to the commissioners present in the very clearest form, with the most distinct outline, and in absolute perfectness, what was the issue between Great Britain and the United States in respect of the interpretation of the treaty of 1818.

On the British side was the issue called here in debate and in Mr. Fish's instructions the "headland theory," a theory that we denied, at the same time stating in our denial that that was what we denied. That was the British contention, upon which we took issue. We set out the plea, sir, upon which we took issue in our papers in order that it might be definitively understood by our own commissioners precisely what the issue was.

This term "headland" or the "headland theory" has had a sort of application from time to time in the dispatches and papers that have passed between the governments, and even in the courts, which is somewhat misleading and confusing. In the first instance, the headland theory, as it was termed, was presented by the British Government when the Java commenced making seizures before 1818, 50 or 60 miles from the coast of New Brunswick, when she was roaming about in the seas there, capturing American or French ships that were found anywhere prepared to fish within 50 or 60 miles of land.

Why was the Java there? What was the British idea at that time? Why, it was the idea that was so clearly stated by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], and argued with so much force and clearness and upon such authentic and indisputable historical facts, that in the ancient times there prevailed in that part of the world precisely the same idea that prevailed later in Russia in relation to the Behring Sea, that any great power had the right to extend its jurisdiction out over any sea within the power of its military and naval control, or had the right, in the first instance, to possess itself, and after awhile, when it should grow into a prescriptive right, to claim against all the powers of the world the exclusive privilege of taking fish within vast areas of broad open waters that were appurtenant—not those that belonged within the jurisdiction of the country absolutely, but belonged as a sort of appanage of power. The Senator from Mississippi claimed in his speech that it was within a very late date that the British Government, in treating with the French Government, provided a limitation of 60 miles from land——

Mr. GEORGE. Ninety miles.

Mr. MORGAN. Ninety miles from land, across which a Frenchman did not dare to go with his fishing vessel unless he dared to beard the British lion and take the consequences.

As the question was presented here yesterday—it was first explained by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE]—we became a party to the admission of this ancient theory in regard to the control of the fisheries and fishing rights when in the treaty of 1783 we accepted from the British Government the right of fishing on the Banks of Newfoundland. Senators get up here and make great declamation, fulminate oratorical periods, powerful and round, and reverberating throughout the earth, in respect of the absurdity, as they call it, of Great Britain having passed to us in 1783 the right to fish on the high-seas—a right they say that had been possessed by the people of all nations from time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. We have got to the point, though it is only a modern instance, where we say that the people of every nation on earth have a right to fish in the great oceans and seas, provided they do not come within the jurisdictional limits of some other power; but the jurisdictional limits always mark the rights of fishing and have always done so.

When the Java was going about and picking up American and French ships, 60 or 90 miles from the shore of New Brunswick, carrying them in and having them condemned, she was acting on this old idea which had then not entirely disappeared. There was a reminiscence of it left, strong enough in the contemplation and judgment of the publicists of that day to justify the Java in making these seizures thus far from the coast of the British possessions.

Then the British Government fell back to another line, a line that they called the "headland line," within which they attempted to justify their jurisdictional power and say that their jurisdictional right to control in all matters of civil polity reached beyond the fringe of 3 miles or a marine league out to that part of the sea which might be included in a headland line drawn from promontory points far distant from each other, but still in the direction of the trend of the coast.

As to that, Mr. President, we have never made the slightest concession, but the British Government, assuming what is termed the "headland theory" in subsequent proceedings, afterward applied it to the construction of the treaty of 1818; and they call that a "headland theory" which is, by the way, no theory at all, but a question of mere construction of the words of the treaty. There is no theory of law about it—no theory of general or of international law, but the construction, barely, of the words of the treaty when it is read within its four corners.

Two great contentions were presented by that Government in 1871, and our Government concurred that they were the real contentions between the two governments. The first related to what is termed the headland theory, which is the right to fish within 3 miles of the bays, harbors, creeks, etc., in Her Majesty's dominions; and the other is in regard to the right of the fishermen of the United States to go into Canadian ports and harbors for any purpose other than the purpose of purchasing wood and obtaining water and for repairing damages and gaining shelter.

To show the care with which this conclusion was arrived at by our Government I will call attention to the remedies which were proposed on our part—that our commissioners might suggest or might incorporate in the treaty that they were about to negotiate:

8.—REMEDIES.

It is suggested that this class of questions may be adjusted, either—

I. By agreeing upon the terms upon which the whole of the reserved fishing-grounds may be thrown open to American fishermen, which might be accompanied with a repeal of the obnoxious laws, and the abrogation of the disputed reservation as to ports, harbors, etc.; or, failing that—

II. By agreeing upon the construction of the disputed renunciation; upon the principles upon which a line should be run by a joint commission to exhibit the territory from which the American fishermen are to be excluded.

Before passing from this part of this second suggestion of a remedy, let us recur to the fact that in the treaty of 1854 for the first time it was attempted to mark the boundaries in which the Americans had the full liberty of fishing jointly with the British people and those parts of the coasts of the provinces on which they had no right to fish, and ample provision was made for the demarkation of these boundary lines. So as early as 1854, and long before that, indeed, the necessity existed for having some demarkation, some manner of designation of the line outside of which the Americans might fish. That occurred to all the diplomatists on both sides, and Mr. Fish, approving the idea which Mr. Seward had presented, through Mr. Adams, to the British Government, of having a demarkation or limit of fishing-lines by a joint commission, urged upon our joint high commissioners that that would be one of the available remedies for the then existing difficulties between the two countries. The second point that he refers to under the second head is:

And by repealing the obnoxious laws, and agreeing upon the measures to be taken for enforcing the colonial rights, the penalties to be inflicted for a forfeiture of the same, and a mixed tribunal to enforce the same.

So they followed Mr. Seward again. There was no provision of that kind in the treaty of 1854, but it was evident that there was recognized in these instructions the necessity that I have frequently urged before this body, that the treaty of 1818 was totally defective in respect to the measures to be taken for the enforcement of colonial rights and the penalties to be inflicted, and they were silent as to the tribunal to which these different troubles as they arose might be referred for adjudication.

It was obvious to Mr. Fish, as it has been to every American statesman, until somebody was found who was under the necessity of raking up every manner of criticism and objection that human ingenuity could find for the purpose of visiting disparagement and even contempt upon the present Administration—every American citizen and statesman who ever read the treaty of 1818, and who had followed the course of events which led to the collisions growing out of the imperfections of that treaty, recognized, what Mr. Fish recognized in these instructions, that it was necessary as one of the remedies to be secured; that there should be an agreement upon the measures to be taken for enforcing the colonial rights and the penalties to be inflicted for a forfeiture of them, as well as a tribunal to enforce the same.

Mr. Fish proceeded:

It may also be well to consider whether it should be further agreed that the fish taken in the waters open to both nations shall be admitted free of duty into the United States and the British North American colonies.

Where did this idea originate, or how did it find its way into the treaty of 1871? I have read to you now the British instructions, and they say nothing about free fish, but as far as they go they do, as I have several times now read, state the two grand leading contentions between the two governments, and when they admit the right which was secured to our fishermen by the treaty of 1818 of entering their harbors, bays, and creeks, they deny that we have got any other rights than those of shelter and obtaining wood and water and making repairs, and they resist our claim that our vessels have the right when going inshore for these purposes to traffic, to transship fish, or to purchase stores.

There is the British Government standing on the treaty of 1818 denying what we claimed. We present in these instructions what is the British contention, as we understand it, just as broadly as they present it, and, when our Government came to suggest a remedy, Hamilton Fish says:

It may also be well to consider whether it should be further agreed that the fish taken in the waters open to both nations shall be admitted free of duty into the United States and the British North American colonies.

I should like to know, Mr. President, how any American Senator can get up here and say that the present contention of the British Government in respect of the construction of this treaty is stimulated entirely by a desire to have their fish brought free into the United States when Mr. Hamilton Fish, in the remedies which he proposed for existing evils, in 1871, suggested and imposed as an injunction upon our commissioners that they should propose to the British Government the admission of fish free of duty for the purpose of getting rid of the evils of the time and all this accumulated contention, controversy, friction, collision, seizures, damages, and strife that had affected the history of both nations, and their peace, more or less, then, for a period of about fifty years.

Mr. GEORGE. The British Government did not originate it?

Mr. MORGAN. The British Government did not say anything about it; in its instructions to its commissioners it said not one word about it. The proposition was strictly an American proposition, and came from a Republican administration.

Now, Senators may ignore these statements; they can not deny them; they can not overturn them with facts; logic will not drive them out of this case; rhetoric will not banish them from the minds of the American people; abuse can not be heaped upon them until they be smothered to death. Here they stand like beacon lights to warn the people of the United States that the men who are now making great clamor about fresh fish are the men who made the overtures to the British Government in the instructions to their own commissioners in 1871. That is the state of the case, Mr. President. It is of no use going back sixty or seventy years for the purpose of finding out what were the Canadian motives or what bad or evil things the Canadians have done heretofore, when Mr. Fish, who had a perfect view of the whole case, as I shall show you presently—of every single fact in it—prepared these instructions, and after he had stated what was the British contention, concluded with this advice which I have read, to his commissioners, he being one of them, as to what they should do.

The question was asked of Mr. Fish by Mr. Schenck, I think, whether or not these instructions were to be considered as obligatory. Mr. Fish's reply was this: "I am one of these negotiators; I can not instruct my colleagues. Although I am Secretary of State I can not give you instructions; but these are the views of the Government." And the views of the Government, it must be remembered, had been presented to the Senate of the United States, and here they were thoroughly debated, and that, too, before these instructions went out.

Mr. GEORGE. Had the question of free fish been presented to the Senate?

Mr. MORGAN. Everything, as I understand it, had been presented to the Senate for its consideration before that Joint High Commission was raised.

Mr. GEORGE. That proposition distinctly?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not say in distinct terms, or in distinct form. The record will show. I proceed with the reading:

In addition to the authorities hereinbefore cited there is in the archives of the Department of State a copious and well-arranged memoir upon the subject of the fisheries by Richard D. Cutts, esq., of the Coast Survey, which will be placed at the disposal of the commissioners.

Now, although it looks as if it might take some time, it is worth while, for the sake of the exact truth of history and for the sake of what may hereafter be predicated upon the debates of this body on this occasion and upon their action on this occasion, that this historical summary, which is called "Confidential Memoranda for the use of the Commissioners on the part of the United States in the American and British Joint High Commission, Washington, 1871," title, "Fisheries," should be put into the RECORD. It will appear from an examination of this chronological statement of all the different facts that entered into the consideration of this question that a keen, penetrating, shrewd, statesmanlike eye had passed over every fact and weighed every one which entered into this case and which bore upon that question presented in 1871, which is precisely the same question that is presented now, because it is the question of the proper construction of the treaty of 1818.

I will not read while I stand at my desk all of this, but I will put it in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

1. RIGHTS AS DEFINED BY TREATY.

The convention of 1818, hereinafter referred to, gives to American fishermen—

1. The right, in common with British fishermen, to fish within 3 marine miles of the land on all the coasts marked red, blue, and yellow, respectively, on the annexed map.

A map accompanies these instructions, and the coloring is such as to indicate what we know to be the limits which measure and bound the rights of the respective parties in their joint use of the fisheries.

2. Prior to the negotiation of the treaty of 1818, France had secured for her fishermen, by treaty with Great Britain, a similar right on all the coasts marked red. Hence it follows that the American fishermen, as to that portion of the coast, enjoy the right to fish in common with the French as well as the British fishermen.

That makes three tenants in common there on that part of the coast—the British, the French, and the Americans. It is worth while to observe as we go along here that every statute of the provinces and every act of Parliament and every regulation of the Privy Council which in any wise has affected the rights of the American fishermen has been applied equally to the French fishermen and to all foreigners, but particularly to Americans and French, because these two had the joint right, along with the British subjects, of fishing upon the parts of the coast to which I have just alluded. When we take to ourselves the whole burden of the offense alleged in regard to these provincial laws, the French Government have just the same right to complain of them that we have—just the same in respect to all that part of the coast where they had secured fishing rights by treaty with Great Britain.

But we do not hear of any French complaint about them. Occasionally there is a seizure of a French vessel over there for a violation of these statutes. They go into the provincial courts and have their rights determined, but we do not see French fleets coming over for the protection of French fishermen, or English fleets coming over for the purpose of regulating French fishermen. They do not seem to take the view of the question that we do. Perhaps they are not so aggressive in the assertion of their rights, and yet I believe I have never heard of a Frenchman neglecting any right secured by a treaty.

3. The additional right as to the coast marked blue to land, and dry, and cure fish, so long as the coast is unsettled.

[As to this right, it is to be observed that it is said to be important as to the cod-fisheries, but unimportant as to the mackerel fisheries. The cod are usually split and dried on shore; the mackerel are cured on board.]

4. The "privilege" is also reserved to the American fishermen to enter the British North American bays or harbors, not included within the limits of coast so marked in colors, "for the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood, and of obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever."

[The United States claim that this is a privilege to their fishing vessels to go in and out of those bays and harbors for the purposes named without the custom-house formalities, and is not to be confounded with the right which all vessels which bear the flag of the United States have to enter the open British ports for the purpose of trade, or any other purpose lawful under the customs of nations.]

The word "right" is put in italics there, but it seems to me that an undue emphasis is laid upon it when we come to consider our own doctrine in respect of the liberty, I will call it, of a British ship to enter the port of New York. I do not understand that a British ship, otherwise than by treaty arrangement, has the right to enter the port of New York. Strike out all treaty engagements between us and Great Britain, and she has not got the right to come into the port of New York. She has permission to do so under our laws, but we could repeal those laws any day and exclude her, unless prohibited from doing that by some treaty stipulation. So I think undue emphasis was given to this right of ours—to all vessels bearing the American flag to enter Canadian ports. Nobody, I believe, has ever really designated this as being a right, because we can not say that it was secured to us by compact or by treaty; it is a permission, a liberty. However, that is an immaterial matter.

5. Except as above defined, the United States renounce forever the liberty to take, dry, or cure fish within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of the British dominions in America.

2. CHARACTER OF THE FISHERIES.

The fisheries are known as the deep-sea and inshore fisheries.

The latter are principally for herring and mackerel; and are understood to have been the principal cause of the trouble. The former include, and in fact mainly consist of, the cod and halibut fisheries.

Now we have got to the point where the particular element of trouble came—out of the herring and mackerel claim.

The third item here is as follows:

3. VALUE OF THE BRITISH COLONIAL MARINE FISHERIES.

The value of these fisheries, as given in the latest accessible returns, is—

Quebec	$1,046,240.46
New Brunswick	638,576.00
Nova Scotia	2,501,507.00
Newfoundland	7,005,807.40
Prince Edward Island	169,580.00
Magdalen Islands	71,356.00
Total	11,433,067.00

The total value has gone very much beyond that since; but I shall not now present those facts.

The fisheries of Newfoundland are principally deep-sea fisheries. The consul at Halifax gives it as his opinion that "of the aggregate products of the whole colonial fisheries, the inshore fisheries—which are pursued chiefly for mackerel and herring—constitute the smaller portion; probably not more than one-fourth of the whole."

The next relates to—

4. VALUE OF THE AMERICAN FISHERIES.

Mr. Mortimer Jackson, the consul at Halifax, says: "The number of American fishing vessels engaged in the deep-sea fisheries off the coasts of the British North American Provinces is, as near as can be estimated, about 1,400, with an aggregate tonnage of nearly 100,000 tons, employing about 17,000 men. They pursue the fisheries on the Banks of Newfoundland, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and on the Western Banks. On the Banks the fisheries are pursued for cod and halibut, and in the Gulf of St. Lawrence principally for mackerel.

"The capital employed in these fisheries is estimated at between eight and nine millions. The aggregate annual yield is about $7,000,000. The deep-sea fisheries are exclusive of the inshore fisheries, which were alone affected by the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty. During the existence of that treaty, and subsequently, to a limited extent, under the license system, the inshore fisheries were pursued by our fishermen chiefly for mackerel. The quantity so taken, however, did not exceed, on an average, in any one year, more than one-fourth of the whole catch of that description of fish."—Manuscript dispatch No. 397, January 23, 1871.

Mr. E. H. Derby, of Boston, says: "The fisheries of the State of Massachusetts for whale, cod, mackerel, and herring produce yearly about $12,000,000, of which less than a sixth are usually drawn from our fisheries in the Gulf of St. Lawrence."—Manuscript review of the Ottawa review of the President's message.

Item 5 relates to "markets for Canadian fish," upon which it was remarked as follows:

5. MARKETS FOR CANADIAN FISH.

The Newfoundland-cured codfish find a large market in Spain, Portugal, the Mediterranean, South America, and the West Indies.

With that exception, the United States furnish the best market. This market, especially as to mackerel, has not been injured by the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty.

That is a point worth noticing:

The Newfoundland-cured codfish find a large market in Spain, Portugal, the Mediterranean, South America, and the West Indies.

With that exception, the United States furnish the best market. This market, especially as to mackerel, has not been injured by the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty.

Quoting now from the report of the consul at Halifax:

It was fully demonstrated, during the existence of the reciprocity treaty, that the admission of American fishing vessels to a common participation in the privileges accorded to British vessels, instead of being injurious, was, on the whole, beneficial to the interests of the provincial fishermen.—Manuscript report of the consul at Halifax, January 23, 1871.

Now we commence with the—

6. DIPLOMATIC HISTORY.

The inshore fisheries were acquired to Great Britain by the treaty of Paris (1763), which terminated the French dominion on this continent, and were enjoyed from that time till the Revolution by the inhabitants of the original thirteen States in common with the other inhabitants of the British Empire.

So the British people throughout the world had just the same interest in these fisheries as the people of the colonies, according to this, during the twenty years that we held them before the treaty of 1783 was made. That right of which I speak with so much confidence as being one of the rights of our country, was one enjoyed twenty years before the treaty of 1783, even by the British people, and all of the British people, whether they lived beyond the Atlantic Ocean or lived on this side, had the same right in the colonial fisheries that we had.

Mr. GEORGE. Because they were British.

Mr. MORGAN. Simply because they were British people. The benefits of the treaty of Paris inured to all the subjects of the British crown, it made no difference where they were in the world.

November 30, 1782:

In the negotiations preceding the treaty of 1783 an attempt was made to induce the American commissions to give up the fisheries, which John Adams met by saying, "I will never put my hand to any article without satisfaction about the fisheries." Finding the commissioners firm on this question, the provisional articles were signed November 30, 1782, and

"The definitive treaty of peace" was signed, of which the third article (being identical with Article III of the provisional article) read thus:

"ARTICLE III.

"It is agreed that the people of the United States shall continue to enjoy unmolested the right to take fish of every kind on the Grand Bank, and on all the other banks of Newfoundland; also in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and at all other places in the sea where the inhabitants of both countries used at any time heretofore to fish; and also that the inhabitants of the United States shall have liberty to take fish of every kind on such part of the coast of Newfoundland as British fishermen shall use (but not to dry or cure the same on that island); and also on the coasts, bays, and creeks of all other of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America; and that the American fishermen shall have liberty to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of Nova Scotia, Magdalen Islands, and Labrador, so long as the same shall remain unsettled; but so soon as the same, or either of them, shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such settlement, without a previous agreement for that purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground."

Proceeding, the Secretary says:

The fisheries were among the questions discussed by the commissioners for negotiating the treaty of peace that closed the war of 1812. The United States commissioners claimed that the treaty of 1783 conferred no new rights upon the United States; that it was an agreement as to a division of property which took place on the division of the British Empire after the success of the American Revolution, and was not in that respect abrogated by war. The British commissioners, on the other hand, held that, while the treaty of 1783 recognized the right of the United States to the deep-sea fisheries, it conferred privileges—

Italicizing the word—

as to the inshore fisheries and the use of the shores which were lost by a declaration of war, the parties being unable to agree. (See American State Papers, Foreign Relations, volume 3, pages 732 et seq.).

There the Secretary of State takes the distinction in the settlement that was made of this matter in 1818, between privileges granted us in respect of the inshore fisheries and the rights which belonged to us as was alleged and was admitted of fishing anywhere in the deep sea.

The treaty of Ghent was concluded without allusion to the fisheries.

Lord Bathurst instructed the governor of Newfoundland that "on the declaration of war by the American Government, and the consequent abrogation of the then existing treaties, the United States forfeited, with respect to the fisheries, those privileges which are purely conventional; and, as they have not been renewed by stipulation in the present treaty, the subjects of the United States can have no pretense to any right to fish within the British jurisdiction, or to use the British territory for purposes connected with the fisheries."—Review of President's message, Ottawa, December, 1870.

Making the distinction between the rights that are obtained to fish on the high seas under the treaty of Paris, and the privileges which were conceded to us under the treaty of 1783 to fish and to use the shores for landing and drying fish and the like.

This position resulted in a long correspondence between Mr. John Quincy Adams and Lord Bathurst, which ended by the British Government adhering to its position.

That was in 1815–'16.

The correspondence may be found in Foreign Relations, volume 4, page 352, et seq.

Mr. Bagot, British minister at Washington, reasserting Lord Bathurst's construction of the treaty of 1783, and of the effect of the war, proposed a new arrangement upon the basis of a concession of the right to cure fish on certain coasts, to fish within British limits on certain coasts, and of a renunciation of the right to fish within those limits on all other coasts. The first proposition made was not an acceptable one.

December 31 of the same year, 1815 I believe it was—

Another proposition was made, which, although not accepted, appears to have been the basis of the subsequent arrangement. (Ibid., page 365 et seq.)

August 8, 1817.—Instructions having been issued by Great Britain to seize foreign vessels fishing or at anchor in any of the harbors or creeks in Her Majesty's British North American possessions, or within their maritime jurisdiction, and send them to Halifax for adjudication, several vessels were seized, and information officially communicated to this Government. (Ibid., page 379.)

That was to seize foreign vessels, not "American vessels," but all foreign vessels fishing in Her Majesty's possessions or within their maritime jurisdiction. On the 22d day of May, 1818—

Mr. Gallatin, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to France, and Mr. Rush, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Great Britain, were then empowered "to agree, treat, consult, and negotiate of and concerning the general commerce between the United States and Great Britain and its dominions or dependencies, and such other matters and subjects interesting to the two nations as may be given to them in charge, and to conclude and sign a treaty or treaties, convention or conventions, touching the premises." (Ibid., page 372.)

Their instructions related to the prolongation of the treaty of commerce of 1815 (8 Statutes at Large, 228) to the commerce and intercourse with the British colonies in the West Indies and North America; to indemity to the owners of slaves carried away after the ratification of the treaty of Ghent; to the boundary line between the United States and the British possessions; and to the fisheries. (Ibid., pages 371, 372.)

They arranged for all these points, except the commerce with the colonies, in which the British ministry of that day were not disposed to allow the United States to share. (Ibid., page 380.)

September 17, 1818.—At the third conference of the commissioners the American plenipotentiaries submitted their proposed articles, among which was the following relating to the fisheries:

Article A is as follows:

ARTICLE A.

Whereas differences have arisen respecting the liberty claimed by the United States for the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, and cure fish on certain coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, it is agreed between the high contracting parties that the inhabitants of the said United States shall continue to enjoy, unmolested, forever, the liberty to take fish of every kind on that part of the southern coast of Newfoundland which extends from Cape Ray to the Rameau Islands, and the western and northern coast of Newfoundland from the said Cape Ray to Quirpon Island, on the Magdalen Islands, and also on the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks from Mount Joli, on the southern coast of Labrador, to and through the Straits of Belle Isle, and thence northwardly indefinitely along the coast; and that the American fishermen shall also have liberty, forever, to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of the southern part of the coast of Newfoundland, here above described, of the Magdalen Islands, and of Labrador, as here above described; but so soon as the same, or either of them, shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such settlement without previous agreement for that purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground; and the United States hereby renounce any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, or cure fish on or within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, and harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included in the above-mentioned limits.

There is a foot-note to the print of this article, which is called "Article A." The foot-note says:

The words in italics were erased as the article was finally agreed to, and in most cases other words substituted in their places. (See post.)

The only words to which I shall call attention that were erased subsequently and other words substituted in their place are in the proviso to this proposition which they submitted to the British commissioners. It has been very frequently stated here that this proposition emanated from the Americans, and the words of the proviso as they presented them are as follows:

Provided, however, That the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays and harbors for the purpose only of obtaining shelter, wood, water, and bait, but under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their drying or curing fish therein, or in any other manner abusing the privilege hereby reserved to them.

That was our language. I refer to this, now, more particularly for the purpose of putting at rest all this discussion that has occurred here about the privilege of obtaining bait. As we presented the proposition the words followed each other as follows:

Of obtaining shelter, wood, water, and bait, but under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their drying or curing fish therein, or in any other manner abusing the privilege hereby reserved to them—

Putting it distinctly, not upon the ground of a right, but on the ground of a privilege of our entering there. Not a right that in any form whatsoever countervailed or qualified the right which we had renounced of fishing within those limits, but adding in our behalf to that renunciation the privilege which is here stated.

The words "and bait" were stricken out; the privilege of obtaining bait was stricken out; and it seems to me to be a very narrow refinement to discuss the question whether or not that gave us the right to catch bait and buy bait. The words "obtain bait" cover the whole field. "Obtain" is a very much broader word than "buy" or "catch." It includes both, and we were shut out from the privilege of obtaining bait.

Mr. GEORGE. From every method of getting bait.

Mr. MORGAN. "Obtain" includes every method of getting bait. Now, it does seem to me that after this commission had proposed this language and the British commissioners rejected it, we must be precluded from saying that the treaty of 1818 conveyed to us either a right or a privilege of obtaining bait within either harbors or bays. I do not urge that or state it, except for the purpose of showing that it at least in some sort justified the British contention on that subject.

I do not understand that we have the right to prescribe to the British Government what construction they should put upon the language of this treaty or any other treaty; we are not sitting in judgment on their claims at all; we are negotiating with them; we are treating with them about this matter, trying to come to an accommodation with them about it. And, as I remarked at the outset of my speech to-day, the question that most concerns us, and in fact the first question that concerns us, is whether or not the contention that they present is one that is included within the purview of the instrument we are controverting about, and the next is, whether it is sincere, for if it is sincere it is a proper subject-matter of negotiation; if insincere, it is a subject-matter of an indignant refusal to discuss it.

Then the British commissioners came back, and they struck out this matter of purchasing bait; but they put something else in which seemed to have a bearing on our vessels at the time:

October 6, 1818.—At the fifth conference the British plenipotentiaries presented a counter project, of which the part relating to the fisheries was in the following language:

"ARTICLE A.

"It is agreed that the inhabitants of the United States shall have liberty to take fish of every kind on that part of the western coast of Newfoundland which extends from Cape Ray to the Quirpon Islands, and on that part of the southern and eastern coast of Labrador which extends from Mount Joli to Huntingdon Islands. And it is further agreed that the fishermen of the United States shall have liberty to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of the said south and east coast of Labrador, so long as the same shall remain unsettled; but as soon as the same, or any part of them, shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish without a previous agreement for that purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground.

"And it is further agreed that nothing contained in this article shall be construed to give to the inhabitants of the United States any liberty to take fish within the rivers of His Britannic Majesty's territories, as above described; and it is agreed on the part of the United States that the fishermen of the United States resorting to the mouths of such rivers shall not obstruct the navigation thereof, nor willfully injure nor destroy the fish within the same, either by setting nets across the mouths of such rivers or by any other means whatever.

"His Britannic Majesty further agrees that the vessels of the United States, bona fide engaged in such fishery, shall have liberty to enter the bays and harbors of any of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in North America for the purpose of shelter or of repairing damages therein, and of purchasing wood and obtaining water, and for no other purpose, and all vessels so resorting to the said bays and harbors shall be under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein.

"It is further well understood that the liberty of taking, drying, and curing fish, granted in the preceding part of this article, shall not be construed to extend to any privilege of carrying on trade with any of His Britannic Majesty's subjects residing within the limits hereinbefore assigned to the use of the fishermen of the United States for any of the purposes aforesaid.

"And in order the more effectually to guard against smuggling, it shall not be lawful for the vessels of the United States engaged in the said fishery to have on board any goods, wares, or merchandise whatever, except such as may be necessary for the prosecution of the fishery or the support of the fishermen while engaged therein, or in the prosecution of their voyages to and from the said fishing grounds. And any vessel of the United States which shall contravene this regulation may be seized, condemned, and confiscated, together with her cargo."

The American plenipotentiaries replied to that last part and several other items that are in here, as follows:

"FISHERIES. (October 7, 1818.)

"The American plenipotentiaries are not authorized by their instructions to assent to any article on that subject which shall not secure to the inhabitants of the United States the liberty of taking fish of every kind on the southern coast of Newfoundland from Cape Ray to the Rameau Islands, and on the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks from Mount Joli, on the southern coast of Labrador, to and through the Straits of Belle Isle, and thence northwardly indefinitely along the coast, and also the liberty of drying and curing fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of Labrador, and of the southern coast of Newfoundland, as above described, with the proviso respecting such of the said bays, harbors, and creeks as may be settled.

"The liberty of taking fish within rivers is not asked. A positive clause to except them is unnecessary, unless it be intended to comprehend under that name waters which might otherwise be considered as bays or creeks. Whatever extent of fishing ground may be secured to American fishermen, the American plenipotentiaries are not prepared to accept it on a tenure or on conditions different from those on which the whole has heretofore been held. Their instructions did not anticipate that any new terms or restrictions would be annexed, as none were suggested in the proposals made by Mr. Bagot to the American Government. The clauses forbidding the spreading of nets and making vessels liable to confiscation in case any articles not wanted for carrying on the fishery should be found on board are of that description and would expose the fishermen to endless vexations."

October 9, 1818.—At the sixth conference the American plenipotentiaries declared that they could not agree to the article on the fisheries brought forward by the British plenipotentiaries at the preceding conference. (Ibid., page 392.)

October 13.—The British plenipotentiaries presented the following article as to the fisheries:

"Whereas differences have arisen respecting the liberty claimed by the United States for the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, and cure fish on certain coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America:

"It is agreed between the high contracting parties that the inhabitants of the said United States shall have, forever, in common with the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, the liberty to take fish of every kind on that part of the southern coast of Newfoundland which extends from Cape Ray to the Rameau Islands; on the western and northern coast of Newfoundland, from the said Cape Ray to the Quirpon Islands; on the shores of the Magdalen Islands, and also on the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks from Mount Joli, on the southern coast of Labrador, to and through the Straits of Belle Isle; and thence northwardly, indefinitely, along the coast, without prejudice, however, to any of the exclusive rights of the Hudson Bay Company; and that the American fishermen shall also have liberty, forever, to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of the southern part of the coast of Newfoundland, hereabove described, and of the coast of Labrador; but so soon as the same, or any portion thereof, shall be settled it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such portion so settled without previous agreement for such purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground.

"And the United States hereby renounce, forever, any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, or cure fish on or within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within the above-mentioned limits: Provided, however, That the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays or harbors for the purpose of shelter, and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood and obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever. But they shall be under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein, or in any other manner whatever abusing the privilege hereby reserved to them."

This article was accepted by the American commissioners, and is identical with article incorporated in the convention. (8 Statutes at Large, page 248.)

So that that proposition came from Great Britain as a final proposition, they having inserted the word "forever" after the word "renounce," so as to make our renunciation of our fishing rights perpetual and to continue through all conditions, peace or hostility.

October 20, 1818.—The comparison of this article with the article submitted by the American commissioners, on the 17th of September, shows that the only material change made, so far as the present discussion is concerned, was in the exclusion of the word "bait." It is represented that the "bait" referred to in the treaty must have been bait for "cod," which were caught in those waters, as the mackerel fisheries in those waters did not begin till several years after that time.

That was drawing it very fine. You can not blame an American plenipotentiary for putting in the very best words he can find in favor of his own Government, and we can not blame a British diplomatist for doing the same thing. Mr. Fish says:

It was, therefore, within the letter and spirit of the convention to deny to American fishermen the right to catch that bait in those waters. The favorite bait for the mackerel is said to be caught only off the coast of Maine, and not to be found in Canadian waters. If this is correct, it could not have been intended to deny to our fishermen the right to purchase that bait in British ports.

That is the argument presented by Mr. Fish after the instructions given his negotiator.

June 14, 1819, was passed in the Imperial Parliament the "Act to enable His Majesty to make regulations with respect to the taking and curing fish on certain parts of the coast of Newfoundland, Labrador, and His Majesty's other possessions in North America, according to a convention made between His Majesty and the United States of America." It is by this statute declared to be unlawful for persons, not natural-born British subjects, to fish for, in a foreign vessel, take, dry, or cure any fish within 3 marine miles of any coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors whatever, in any British port in America, not included within the limits specified and described in the first article of the convention of 1818.

It is further declared that it may be lawful for the United States fishermen to enter into such bays or harbors for the purpose of shelter and repairing damages therein, and of purchasing wood, and of obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever; that the governor of Newfoundland is invested with power to order such persons to depart; and that persons refusing to depart after notice, or neglecting to conform to regulations, shall forfeit £200.—Sabine's Fisheries, 394.

That very severe statute was enacted on June 14, 1819, the next year after the treaty of 1818 had been formulated. I believe the treaty was ratified in October, 1818. Within eight months of that time the British Parliament enacted this stringent regulation. In 1819 it was established that the penalty for the violation of that law should be the forfeiture of £200, and it was also established that the governor of Newfoundland should have the right to order such persons to depart, and the person so refusing to depart should be thus fined £200. Since 1819 down to this present Administration no Secretary of State and no President has ever found it necessary to make any demand for the repeal of that harsh statute.

There was a clear declaration within seven or eight months after the adoption of the treaty of 1818 that the instrumentality to be employed by the British Crown for the purpose of enforcing the rights under this treaty, and the restrictions also under the treaty, and all of the laws that might be enacted by the British Parliament, and all the orders in council that might be proclaimed, was the local government, Newfoundland, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Quebec, or whatever government it was upon whose coasts these difficulties might occur. Why did not the Government of the United States, with all those splendid men around the Capitol and within reach of its advice, make some complaint in 1819 or 1820 against the passage of that law?

Why was it not then suggested that the Empire of Great Britain had no power to confer upon those local jurisdictions the power of executing her laws under the treaty of 1818? The argument answers itself. It does not need any answer; it is too palpable. The Government of the United States, in the very initiation of the whole controversy, acknowledged, first, the power of Great Britain to enforce these penalties by act of Parliament; and, secondly, to employ the governor of Newfoundland as the instrumentality through whom these orders could be given, thus putting the matter in his executive discretion.

Mr. GEORGE. Upon that point may I ask the Senator whether it is not required, in the event of the execution of a judgment against any of our vessels, that it must be with the consent of an imperial officer?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; the governor-general of Canada is an imperial officer, and, more than that, it provides for a special tribunal to be organized for the purpose of trial and near to the point of seizure.

Mr. GEORGE. But the point that I desire to have understood is this: That there can be no effective procedure against one of our fishing vessels without the consent of an imperial officer responsible to the Crown of Great Britain under the proposed treaty.

Mr. MORGAN. There can be no condemnation. The judges in those courts may go on and pronounce their judgments, but they are worth nothing until that officer confirms them, as I understand the treaty.

Now the fun commences. In 1823, about five years after the treaty of 1818 was ratified—

In the spring of the year the schooner Charles was seized for a breach of this act in returning to a harbor a second time after warning, "the weather being fine and moderate the whole time."—Senate Executive Document 100, Thirty-second Congress, first session, page 5.

The governor of Newfoundland warned off the Charles, or some of his subordinate agents warned the Charles off. He had the right under this act of the British Parliament to warn the Charles off. He did warn her off. She went off and came back and was seized.

June 10, 1824.—It appearing that the Charles, during her detention, had been used as a British cruiser, the vessels captured by her were restored, and official information thereof given.—Ibid., page 11.

Now let us get a little more into the particulars about the Charles. The Charles was seized for these reasons, and only for these reasons: She was found in that bay in good weather, having been there before and warned not to come back. Within a very few hours, and on the same day after the lieutenant of the Argus had seized the ship, as soon as he reported, they hauled down the American flag and put another officer on board of her and sent her down the bay, and she cruised until the 20th of the month and returned. On the day she was seized, and before she had been libeled and carried into court, she went out and seized another schooner for smuggling, and also a British schooner charged with the same offense. She went about over the sea as a British man-of-war or a vessel of the British revenue marine.

I do not know which character they gave her—with the British flag flying at her peak the American flag had disappeared. She got back on the 20th day of June, 1824, and then she reported to the custom-house officer as a ship that had been seized. She was libeled on the 21st day of June, and immediately, before any libel proceeding was disposed of or heard, she was sent out again as a cruiser to catch smugglers and the like. She was carried right into the British service, and that was in those spirited and splendid days of our Republic when John Quincy Adams was Secretary of State. Mr. Adams protested against it, especially the insult to our flag. But what became of that? The Charles was condemned afterwards in that court, and being condemned, there was but one consequence that followed, and that was that she having seized this American ship, which she said was smuggling before she was condemned, that ship was turned loose with no apology, no reparation, no disputation about the authority of that officer of the Newfoundland government to warn her off.

Whether it was not so well understood in that day and time as it is now by the gentlemen who expound these laws, I can not say, but American patriotism and American spirit seem to have had a wonderful improvement since Cleveland came in.

This thing rested until Cleveland came in, and immediately the American conscience waked up to that sensitiveness that causes the Senators now on the other side of this Chamber to declaim with great and eloquent vehemence about insults offered to the American flag. Of course, it is something new—a new act. We are appearing in a new rôle entirely. I can not blame them for enjoying the opportunity once in their lives, although some of them are getting pretty old now in statesmanship and years, of finding an atmosphere in which there will be some response to declamation about insults to the American flag.

February 5, 1826.—Mr. Vaughn informed Mr. Clay that "the Charles had been regularly condemned in the vice-admiralty court of the province of New Brunswick, and that it was not expected that the Government of the United States would lend further countenance to the complaints of the owners." (Ib., page 54.)

The British Government there took the ground that because the Charles had been condemned in one of their own colonial courts that estopped the Government of the United States from saying anything about it.

Condemned in the vice-admiralty court—

Says Mr. Vaughn, writing to Henry Clay—of the province of New Brunswick, and that it was not expected that the Government of the United States would lend further countenance to the complaints of the owners.

Why? Because there was a general and universal admission at that day of the right and the jurisdiction of that court, and it made no difference what perjury might have supervened or what rascality or even bribery of witnesses might have occurred, the British Government felt itself not only warranted but bound to respect the judgment of its own courts, upheld them, and said to the American Government, when a protest was presented about the Charles, it was not expected that the Government of the United States would lend further countenance to the complaint of the owner. And they did not either; and the thing dropped right there. They did not have anything to say about it.

Says Mr. Fish, continuing:

It does not appear that there was any further correspondence about this vessel.

There was a case in point. What did Mr. Fish put that in his instructions for except to emphasize the American concession that the local courts did have jurisdiction, and when they had passed judgment upon a case we did not interfere with it? Those courts had the right when a vessel was libeled to condemn her, and the whole power of the British Government would be exerted to see that the condemnation should be sustained, but Great Britain could not separate herself from her courts and tribunals and say we will approve of part and disapprove of part.

1824-'26.—More or less correspondence took place about the Reindeer and the Ruby, which were rescued by force after having been seized by a British cruiser.

There the boot got on the other leg. The Reindeer and the Ruby were seized by a British cruiser. They were fishing in the Bay of Fundy, 15 miles or more from shore, and passing along by the coasts of Maine with this prize in hand the Yankees living along the coast concluded they would not put up with it, and so they manned some boats they had and fired upon the Dotterel that had seized the Ruby and the Reindeer and rescued these ships and took them away; and thereupon Great Britain commenced complaining very earnestly about the matter.

April 29, 1826.—The last letter on the subject (from Mr. Vaughn to Mr. Clay) does not appear to have been ever answered. From that time until 1836 there is no evidence of complaint on the files of the Department of State, so far as known.

That brings us down to 1836, but in the period between 1818 and 1836 we had the most crucial test of the rights and powers of these local courts and the right of Parliament to pass laws for the purpose of executing this treaty and also of construing it.

1836.—Some complaints of trespass were made by Great Britain this year, but on investigation they appeared to have little foundation. (Ibid., pages 55, 56, 57, and 58.)

1836.—In this year the statute of Nova Scotia was passed, authorizing officers to go on board vessels hovering within 3 miles of the coast or harbors; to stay on board; to require the vessel to depart; to bring it into port if it did not do so within twenty-four hours; to examine the master on oath; to condemn him to a forfeiture of £100 if he did not make true answer; and also authorizing a forfeiture of the vessel or cargo found fishing within forbidden waters. There were many other extraordinary, onerous, and unjust provisions in this act, for which reference is made to the act.—Senate Executive Document No. 100, Thirty-second Congress, first session, page 108.

1838.—The same colony, in an address to the Queen, prayed for "a naval force to put an end to American aggressions;" to which the colonial secretary replied that "it had been determined for the future to station, during the fishing season, an armed force on the coast of Nova Scotia to enforce a more strict observance of the treaty by American citizens."—Sabine's Fisheries, page 399.

It was in 1838 that this resolution was come to; but an armed force went there and continued to escort and convoy those fishing ships; but our Government did not resort to that sort of retaliation or any retaliation; neither did it resort to any effort during all that period of time to have a better understanding and explanation of the meaning of the treaty of 1818.

The seizures which followed this course were numerous. (Ibid., page 400.)

As soon as ships of war got there.

August 14, December 29, 1839.—The voluminous correspondence which grew out of these seizures will be found in the Senate Executive Document already cited, pages 59 to 103. The results are summed up in a report from the acting Secretary of State, Mr. Vail (page 92), and in a report from Lieutenant Commanding Paine to Mr. Forsyth (page 98). Mr. Vail "is unable to state whether, in the cases under consideration, there has been any flagrant infraction of the existing treaty stipulations" (page 95).

There is our Secretary of State unable to make any such statement as that.

He appears to think that most of the cases were connected with alleged violations of the customs laws. Lieutenant Paine reports that "the authorities of Nova Scotia seem to claim a right to exclude Americans from all bays," "and also to draw a line from headland to headland;" "that the provincial authorities claim a right to exclude vessels, unless in actual distress;" and "would exact that American fishermen shall have been supplied on leaving home with wood and water for the cruise." (Ibid., pages 99, 100.)

This seems to be rather a critical report. Lieutenant Paine seems to take definitions here that Senators on this floor are oblivious of as to what was the contention of the British people. He says:

The authorities of Nova Scotia seem to claim a right to exclude Americans from all bays, and also to draw a line from headland to headland.

Mr. Fish presents this without demur. He presents it as one of the necessary facts of the case to enable the Joint High Commission to make a wise judgment about this matter. It is part of the instructions, part of the history of the case:

February 20, 1841.—Mr. Forsyth informed Mr. Stevenson, the United States minister in London, that the provincial "authorities claim a right to exclude our vessels from resorting to their ports unless in actual distress, and American vessels are accordingly warned to depart or ordered to get under way and leave a harbor whenever the provincial custom-house or British naval officers suppose, without a full examination 'of the circumstances under which they entered, that they have been there a reasonable time,' and instructed him to 'immediately remonstrate against the illegal and vexatious proceedings of the authorities of Nova Scotia toward our fishermen, and request that measures be forthwith adopted by Her Majesty's Government to remedy the evils arising out of this misconstruction on the part of the provincial authorities of their conventional obligations.'" He also gave strong and explicit instructions asto the Nova Scotia act of 1836. (Ibid., pages 106-108.)

The reasoning of Mr. Forsyth, on pages 107 and 108, upon the Nova Scotia law of 1836, is applicable, without changing a word, to the Dominion laws of 1868 and 1870.

Here Mr. Fish was writing to these Joint High Commissioners—this memorandum is not dated, I believe, but it was immediately before the Treaty of Washington was negotiated—and he informed them of what had taken place, and he then says:

The reasoning of Mr. Forsyth, on pages 107 and 108, upon the Nova Scotia law of 1836, is applicable, without changing a word, to the Dominion laws of 1868 and 1870.

That would have been a most admirable time to have introduced a protest against these laws and a demand for their repeal or modification so as to come within the limits that we thought they had the right to enter by their enactment. But nothing of that sort occurred. Mr. Fish in a very quiet way informs the commissioners of what the state of the case is, and that these two later laws are open to the very objections that Mr. Forsyth had stated in respect of the law of 1836 passed by Nova Scotia.

March 27.—Mr. Stevenson brought to Lord Palmerston's notice: 1. The claim to exclude American vessels from waters "within 3 miles of a line drawn from headland to headland, instead of from the indents of the shores of the provinces." 2. That the authorities of Nova Scotia had "put upon the stipulations of the treaty (as to the entry to harbors, etc.) a construction directly in conflict with their object, and entirely subversive of the rights and interests of the citizens of the United States." 3. The objectionable law of Nova Scotia. 4. The assertion, said to be untenable, "that the Gut of Canso is a narrow strip of water completely within and dividing several counties of the province." (Ibid., pages 113, 114, and 115.)

Mr. Stevenson brought that to Lord Palmerston's notice and said these are the things you are contending for that we object to. Of course we objected to them. We were right in objecting to them. Nevertheless it was true that they contended for them, and when it is said that Mr. Bayard has had some supererogatory negotiation in respect of the Gut of Canso, we have but to refer to these and many very much more modern instances than the one I am now quoting from to show that the British contention from time to time has been that these are in so far close waters, waters that are private, that they have the right to put lights up and charge light dues, and they had the right to prevent the intrusion of fishermen in that narrow strait by stopping there to fish either in the entrance or elsewhere, and that it was within the meaning of the treaty of 1818 a bay to which all the provisions of that treaty were applicable as to fishermen. That was their contention.

We do not admit the contention. We contend that that is a part of the high seas connecting one sea with another, just as we contended that the Strait of Simonoseki, connecting the Sea of Japan with the great eastern waters, was, and in 1863 we went to war with Japan upon that subject.

There is enough here to show that the question about the Gut of Canso and what might be the dominant right of Great Britain or of the colonial provinces there in the control of that little strait of water was a subject that had received attention all the way through, and it would have been a very unwise piece of negotiation for an American statesman to have left that out of the treaty if he could get it in.

It resulted from this note that the law officers of the Crown were inquired of and gave their opinions: 1. Sustaining the colonial "headland" doctrine, on the assumption that the word "headland" is used in the convention. No such word is there found. 2. Giving an answer as to the use of ports, which is immaterial in the present aspect, but which was favorable to the American fishermen so far as it went. 3. Say nothing about the objectional clauses in the law. 4. Affirming the colonial doctrine about the Gut of Canso.—Sabine Fisheries, pages 405 and 406.

It does not appear that this document was ever officially communicated to this Government.

1843-'44.—In a discussion, however, which took place at London between Mr. Everett and Lord Aberdeen in regard to the schooner Washington, captured in the Bay of Fundy, these views of the Crown law officers were officially asserted, but without referring to them.—Senate Executive Document No. 100, as above, page 210 et seq.

So we find how these questions come forward and plant themselves in the controversy continually. They bristle out of it every time a question is raised.

March 10, 1845—Lord Aberdeen informed Mr. Everett that while the British Government did not concede that the United States had a right to the fisheries in the Bay of Fundy, "they are prepared to direct their colonial authorities to allow henceforward the United States fishermen to pursue their avocations in any part of the Bay of Fundy provided they do not approach, except in the cases specified in the treaty of 1818, within 3 miles of the entrance of any bay on the coast of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick." (Ibid., page 136.)

In this long discussion—

Mr. Fish continues—

Mr. Stevenson's complaints as to the restrictions upon the use of ports seem not to have been noticed by the British Government, unless the last clause quoted from Lord Aberdeen's note to Mr. Everett is to be construed as an implied reassertion of the doctrine.

September 17, 1845.—Sir Robert Peel's government having meanwhile fallen, Lord Stanley wrote to Lord Falkland that the British Government had abandoned the intention they had on the subject, and should adhere to the strict letter of the treaties, except in so far as they may relate to the Bay of Fundy.

July 5, 1852.—No collision of authority, however, occurred, or was threatened, until Mr. Crampton gave notice that a force of war steamers and sailing vessels was coming to the fishing grounds to prevent encroachments of vessels belonging to citizens of the United States on the fishing grounds reserved to Great Britain. (Ibid., page 154.)

This was done after an ineffectual attempt to induce the United States to conclude a reciprocity treaty.—Sabine's Fisheries, pages 436, 437, 438.

July 6, 1852—Mr. Webster, Secretary of State, thereupon issued a circular notice to the American fishermen. The following passage is quoted with approbation in the pamphlet review of the President's message already cited (page 15), and appears to be relied upon by Canadian authorities:

"It would appear that by a strict and rigid construction of this article fishing vessels of the United States are precluded from entering the bays or harbors of the British provinces, except for the purpose of shelter, repairing damages, and obtaining wood and water. A bay, as is usually understood, is an arm or recess of the sea entering from the ocean between capes and headlands, and the term is applied equally to small and large tracts of water thus situated; it is common to speak of Hudson's Bay, or the Bay of Biscay, although they are very large tracts of water."

There has been a modern improvement on that, and I propose to quote the language of the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] in his definition of a bay. This was on the 14th of August:

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator yield to me right there?

Mr. EVARTS. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. I beg to ask the Senator from New York if, while he is discussing this most interesting topic of debate, he will give us his conclusions in regard to the definition which Mr. Webster, when Secretary of State and engaged in this very subject-matter, made of the word "bay," to wit:

"A bay is, as usually understood, an arm or recess of the sea entering from the ocean between capes or headlands, and the term is applied equally to large and small tracts of water thus situated."

Mr. Webster at that time being engaged in an investigation of this very treaty of 1818. I hope I have not interrupted the line of the Senator's remarks.

Mr. EVARTS. Not a bit. Mr. Webster took precisely the same view that I have advanced here, that geographies and maps may call great areas of water "bays," but in the question of expropriation from the high seas and appropriation to the advantages of ports and bays and harbors when you are dealing with a demarkation between the high seas and their engagement with the appropriation to the greater needs, it is not the greater needs of fishing, but it is the greater needs of land occupation and of land subordination of these inlets of the high seas. "Bay" is to be treated in the treaty of 1818 and in the treaty of 1783 on the principle of nascitur à sociis, bays, harbors, ports, creeks; and now we are told that this is to run clear out all over the seas whenever anything by a geographer or a map-maker has been called a bay which is an area of the high seas. This course of argument, if it is to be used, would include Baffin's Bay and Hudson's Bay, and the Bay of Biscay for aught I know.

So Mr. Webster thought; but that is lucus à non lucendo. I do not quite see what improvement has been made upon Mr. Webster's very clear language in this matter. Mr. Webster alludes to Hudson's Bay and the Bay of Biscay, and he gives a very clear definition of what a bay is usually understood to be. Says Mr. Webster:

The British authorities insist that England has a right to draw a line from headland to headland, and to capture all American fishermen who may follow their pursuits inside of that line. It was undoubtedly an oversight in the convention of 1818 to make so large a concession to England, since the United States has usually considered that those vast inlets or recesses ought to be opened to American fishermen as freely as the sea itself to within 3 marine miles of the shore.

Mr. Fish proceeds:

The reviewer claims that Mr. Webster's "sound judgment compelled him to recognize the legal force of the British claims to the only point then in dispute, namely, the headland line."—Review of President's message, page 16.

To reach that result he suppresses the following language from the close of the same circular:

"Not agreeing that the construction thus put upon the treaty is conformable to the intentions of the contracting parties, this information is, however, made public to the end that those concerned in the American fisheries may perceive how the case at present stands and be on their guard."—Sabine's Fisheries, page 441.

As Mr. Webster notified the fishermen so we notify the people of the United States that while we do not concur in the British interpretation of the treaty of 1818, yet they are clearly and distinctly put forward as British constructions and British contentions, and that is what we have to meet either by diplomacy, or by retaliation, or by an abandonment of our rights and our claims. Mr. Webster did not hesitate to state what the British contention was, and to warn the American fishermen that that being their contention there was danger in intruding upon that ground. "You let them alone until the Governments can arrange it. Be on your guard."

Mr. Webster's notice was July 6, 1852, and August 23, 1852, the provincial secretary of Nova Scotia issued his notice, as follows:

August 23, 1852.—The provincial secretary of Nova Scotia issued a notice that "No American fishing vessels are entitled to commercial privileges in provincial ports, but are subject to forfeiture if found engaged in traffic. The colonial collectors have no authority to permit freight to be landed from such vessels, which, under the convention, can only enter our ports for the purposes specified therein, and for no other."—Review of President's message, page 12.

That was a Roland for Mr. Webster's Oliver. It was a practical retort upon the great American statesman on his assertion of what he conceived to be American rights notwithstanding the British contention, which he admitted at the time had some foundation in the letter of the treaty of 1818.

Mr. President, that was in 1852. The arrangement of 1830 was then twenty-two years old. It had been recognized, and understood, and acted upon. Daniel Webster, the great impersonation of American ability, and talent, and genius, and manhood, and patriotism, a wise statesman, who saw the reply made to his proclamation by the colonial secretary denying all commercial privileges to our fishermen, made no protest, and then come the Senator from Maine and his colleagues upon that side of the Chamber and impliedly rebuke Mr. Webster be cause, I suppose, instead of issuing the proclamation that he did, warning our people to be on their guard, he did not send his ships of war and punish the men who dared to issue this insolent proclamation:

No American fishing vessels are entitled to commercial privileges in provincial ports, but are subject to forfeiture if found engaged in traffic. The colonial collectors have no authority to permit freight to be landed from such vessels, which under the convention can only enter our ports for the purposes specified therein and for no other.

It did not occur to the minds of the most eminent of our American statesmen, Edward Everett, Daniel Webster, and all of that great list of magnificent men by whom they were surrounded, that the commercial arrangement of 1830 had any effect upon the treaty of 1818. That one fact ought to settle this whole question. Here was the British navy coming in, sent in to protect British fishermen. Mr. Crampton had given notice that a force of steam vessels and sailing vessels was coming to the fishing ground to prevent encroachments. What were the encroachments? The efforts of our fishermen to go in there, not to fish, but to claim commercial rights in provincial ports.

1853-'54.—The case of the Washington (one of the vessels whose seizure was discussed by Mr. Everett) came before the joint commission for settlement of claims, in London, and on disagreement of the commissioners was decided by the umpire (Mr. Joshua Bates), who said:

"The question turns, so far as relates to the treaty stipulations, on the meaning given to the word 'bays' in the treaty of 1783. By that treaty the Americans had no right to dry and cure fish on the shores and bays of Newfoundland, but they had that right on the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks of Nova Scotia; and as they must land to cure fish on the shores, bays, and creeks, they were evidently admitted to the shores of the bays, etc. By the treaty of 1818 the same right is granted to cure fish on the coasts, bays, etc., of Newfoundland, but the Americans relinquish that right and the right to fish within 3 miles of the coasts, bays, etc., of Nova Scotia. Taking it for granted that the framers of the treaty intended that the words 'bay or bays' should have the same meaning in all cases, and no mention being made of headlands, there appears no doubt that the Washington, in fishing 10 miles from the shore, violated no stipulations of the treaty.

"It was urged, on behalf of the British Government, that by coasts, bays, etc., is understood an imaginary line, drawn along the coast from headland to headland, and that the jurisdiction of Her Majesty extends 3 marine miles outside of this line; thus closing all the bays on the coast or shore, and the great body of water called the Bay of Fundy, against Americans and others, making the latter a British bay. This doctrine of headlands is new and has received a proper limit in the convention between France and Great Britain of 2d August, 1839, in which 'it is agreed that the distance of 3 miles fixed as the general limit for the exclusive right of fishery upon the coasts of the two countries shall, with respect to bays the mouths of which do not exceed 10 miles in width, be measured from a straight line drawn from headland to headland.'

"The Bay of Fundy is from 65 to 75 miles wide and 130 to 140 miles long; it has several bays on its coasts; thus the word bay, as applied to this great body of water, has the same meaning as that applied to the Bay of Biscay, the Bay of Bengal, over which no nation can have the right to assume the sovereignty. One of the headlands of the Bay of Fundy is in the United States, and ships bound to Passamaquoddy must sail through a large space of it. The islands of Grand Menan (British) and Little Menan (American) are situated nearly on a line from headland to headland. These islands, as represented in all geographies, are situate in the Atlantic Ocean. The conclusion is, therefore, in my mind irresistible that the Bay of Fundy is not a British bay, nor a bay within the meaning of the word as used in the treaties of 1783 and 1818."—Report of Decisions of Commission, page 181.

July 18, 1853.—Mr. Richard Rush, one of the negotiators of the treaty of 1818, wrote to the Secretary of State (referring to that instrument): "In signing it we believe that we retained the right of fishing in the sea, whether called a bay, gulf, or by whatever term designated, that washed any part of the coast of the British North American provinces, with the simple exception that we did not come within a marine league of the shore. * * * We inserted the clause of renunciation. The British plenipotentiaries did not desire it."

Mr. Rush was defending himself then against the strictures Mr. Webster had put upon him by that criticism he had made upon the looseness of the language of the treaty of 1818. Mr. Fish puts that fact in. That is a piece of the information he wants to give to the Joint High Commission. Mr. Fish continues:

June 5, 1854.—The conclusion of the reciprocity treaty rendered the reassertion of the disputed claim by the Nova Scotian secretary of no importance, and disposed of all the other questions for the time being. (10 Statutes at Large, page 1089.)

March 17, 1865.—Notice was given to abrogate the reciprocity treaty, the abrogation to take effect in one year from the notice.

1866.—The Canadian Government then resorted to the system of licensing American fishermen to fish in the inshore fisheries. The number of licenses taken out the first year is reported to have been 354. (Review of President's message, page 23.) The fee is stated to have been 50 cents per ton. (Manuscript review of the review, page 27.)

1867.—The license-fee the next year was $1 per ton. (Manuscript review, etc., page 27.) The number of licenses was 281. (Review, etc., page 23.)

1868-'69.—The license-fee was again doubled, namely, to $2 per ton (Manuscript review, etc., page 27); only fifty-six licenses were taken out in 1868, and in the following year (1869) only twenty-five licenses were taken out.—Review of President's message, page 23.

May 22, 1868.—The Dominion "act respecting fishing by foreign vessels," passed in 1868, and the third section, amended in 1870, contains, among other provisions, the following:

Section 1, authorizing the granting of licenses.

Section 2, authorizing officers to board ships, vessels, or boats within any harbor of Canada, or hovering within 3 marine miles of the coasts, etc., and to stay on board.

Section 3, as amended, provides that any one of such officers, etc., may bring any ship, etc., hovering, etc., into port and search her cargo; and may also examine the master on oath touching the cargo and voyage; and that if true answers are not given the master shall forfeit $400; and that if the ship, etc., be foreign or not navigated according to the laws of the United Kingdom or Canada, and shall have been found fishing or preparing to fish, or to have been fishing (in British waters) within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, etc., not included in the limits named in the convention of 1818, the ship, etc., with its tackle, etc., shall be forfeited.

Section 4 provides that every person opposing an officer shall forfeit $800. Section 10 provides that in case of seizure the burden of proving the illegality shall be upon the owner or claimant. Section 12 requires heavy security to be given before a seizure can be contested. Section 14 limits a right of action for an illegal seizure to three months.

This statute contains in an exaggerated form the worst features of the Nova Scotia statute of 1836.

Mr. Forsyth, in his instructions to Mr. Stevenson, already alluded to, said that that statute was a "violation of well-established principles of the common law of England, and of the principles of all just powers and of all civilized nations, and seemed to be expressly designed to enable Her Majesty's authorities with perfect impunity to seize and confiscate American vessels, and to embezzle, almost indiscriminately, the property of our citizens, employed in the fisheries on the coasts of the British possessions." Mr. Everett stigmatized it as "possessing none of the qualities of the law of civilized states but its forms." And it was styled by a Senator of that time as "evidently designed to legalize marauding upon an industrious enterprising class of men, who have no means to contend with such sharp and unwarrantable weapons of warfare."—Sabine's Fisheries, page 478.

Those are heavy strictures. Even the Senator from Maine could scarcely exceed the denunciation which Mr. Forsyth bestowed upon these statutes. But there they stood, and this was Mr. Fish writing the account of them. Does Mr. Fish recommend that in consequence of this state of affairs we shall resort to retaliations? Does he recommend that his commissioners shall go instructed into that Joint High Commission for the purpose of getting damages of the British Government or the colonial people for the enactment and the enforcement of such barbarous laws as these are alleged to be? Nothing of that kind. He proceeds then with the instructions which I read of April, 1870, which quote Mr. Thornton's official communication. Mr. Thornton officially communicated to Mr. Fish:

April, 1870.—Mr. Thornton officially communicated to Mr. Fish the intention of the Canadian Government to issue no more licenses to American fishermen.

Mr. Thornton communicated officially to the Department the instructions issued to the commander of the British naval forces, by which it would appear that, notwithstanding the decision of the umpire in 1853, Her Majesty's Government in 1866 were "clearly of the opinion that by the convention of 1818 the United States have renounced the right of fishing not only within 3 miles of the colonial shores, but within 3 miles of a line drawn across the mouth of any British bay or creek; but they are not disposed, for the present, to enforce what they regard as their rights."—Foreign Relations, 1870, page 419.

The whole correspondence in the book last cited, from page 407 to page 434, bears directly upon the issues now raised.

I repeat what I read awhile ago.

July 21, 1870.—Mr. Thornton informed Mr. Fish that he had "received instructions from Earl Granville to explain to Mr. Fish that the instructions respecting the limits within which the prohibition of fishing is to be enforced against the United States fishermen are not to be considered as constituting an arrangement between the Governments of the United States and of Great Britain, by which Canadian rights are waived, or the United States fishermen invested with any privilege.

Now I have gone through with all that instruction. There is the case presented by the American Secretary of State to the Joint High Commission, and no fact is omitted from it which would bear the slightest weight in favor of the American contention or against the British contention. There it all is. I maintain, Mr. President, that no man can add anything to it and you can subtract nothing from it. It is scarcely open to a criticism, being a fair and full statement of the whole historical situation, including every point in the case which was considered worthy of the attention of the American Government in 1871, at a time when we were on the alert in respect of every right and privilege which we enjoyed in connection with Great Britain.

That is the case. Now, that case has not been altered down to this day. There is the admission of the British contention. There are all the historical incidents upon which the contention is based, enforced, or modified There is every allusion to any letter or modification or change in British orders, in the enforcement of their statutes, and their construction of the treaty. There is in fact a perfect photograph of every material point and fact which concerns this case, even from the origin of the treaty of 1783 and before that time down to the present day.

I should say that these protestations, accusations, and criticisms which are now thrown into the teeth of the present Administration continually in respect of their conduct in the making of this treaty will not hold for a moment when we compare the treaty of 1888 with the treaty of 1871, when after all this array of fact which puts the British Government in just as strong a light of offense towards us as the facts which were recited and the comments upon them would justify, followed up by a proposition on our side to pay a money value for the difference between the rights of fisheries which we enjoyed under the treaty of 1818 and fishing rights which we gave them in our waters by the treaty of 1871, which resulted in the payment of $5,500,000 as an amercement, and then the voluntary overture coming from us in Mr. Fish's own summary and conclusion, and the remedies which he proposed for this state of affairs, free fish and fish-oil to the Canadians. I say, Mr. President, when you come to contrast the treaty, the treaty of 1871, with the treaty of 1888, those gentlemen who are committed through their party and without objection on their part, and who have stood committed and stood silent upon the treaty during these twenty years, ought to feel a little abashed when they get up here and make these bald accusations against the present Administration.

Mr. GEORGE. May I ask the Senator from Alabama a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. The question I desire to ask the Senator from Alabama is this: Are the rights of importation of free fish and other things which were granted under the convention of 1871 greater than those demanded under the fifteenth article of the pending treaty? I should like to have the Senator compare the rights about free fish as offered by the treaty of 1871 and as offered by the fifteenth article of the pending treaty.

Mr. MORGAN. Under the twenty-first article of the treaty of 1871 it was agreed:

That, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty, fish-oil and fish of all kinds (except fish of the inland lakes, and of the rivers falling into them, and except fish preserved in oil), being the produce of the fisheries of the United States, or of the Dominion of Canada, or of Prince Edward Island, shall be admitted into each country, respectively, free of duty.

The fifteenth article of the treaty of 1888, which, by the way, is not an article of that treaty at all, provides——

Mr. GEORGE. It is a proposition.

Mr. MORGAN. It is a mere overture, and not an overture made to the Senate, the treaty-making power, but made to Congress. The fifteenth article provides that—

Whenever the United States shall remove the duty from fish-oil, whale-oil, seal-oil, and fish of all kinds (except fish preserved in oil)—

The exception here is in the treaty of 1871—except fish of the inland lakes and of the rivers falling into them, and except fish preserved in oil—

I return to the treaty of 1888—being the produce of fisheries carried on by the fishermen of Canada and Newfoundland, including Labrador—

This omits Prince Edward Island—

as well as from the usual and necessary casks, barrels, kegs, cans, and other usual and necessary coverings containing the products above mentioned, the like products, being the produce of fisheries carried on by the fishermen of the United States, as well as the usual and necessary coverings of the same, as above described, shall be admitted free of duty into the Dominion of Canada and Newfoundland.

And upon such removal of duties, and while the aforesaid articles are allowed to be brought into the United States by British subjects, without duty being reimposed thereon, the privilege of entering the ports, bays, and harbors of the aforesaid coasts of Canada and Newfoundland shall be accorded to United States fishing vessels by annual licenses, free of charge, for the following purposes, namely:

1. The purchase of provisions, bait, ice, seines, lines, and all other supplies and outfits.
2. Transshipment of catch, for transport by any means of conveyance.
3. Shipping of crews.

Supplies shall not be obtained by barter, but bait may be so obtained.

The like privileges shall be continued or given to the fishing vessels of Canada and of Newfoundland on the Atlantic coasts of the United States.

There the Senator can draw in his own mind what could be the different advantages of the different articles as to the freedom of fisheries, if this fifteenth article should ever go into operation, which, of course, it never will under this treaty. By comparison that treaty was a very much more liberal one than the fifteenth article of the present treaty, because the treaty of 1871 gave them what they did not have a right to at all, the right to fish inshore on our coast down to the thirty-ninth degree of north latitude.

Mr. FRYE. We got the right to fish in their shore-line in the same treaty.

Mr. MORGAN. Those places to which we had not made a renunciation.

Mr. FRYE. All their shore-line.

Mr. MORGAN. That included only the places we had not previously renounced?

Mr. FRYE. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. That made all; but they had no right in our waters to fish at all before the treaty of 1871. They had under the treaty of 1854, but that was out. At the time the Treaty of Washington was formed they had no right to fish on our coast. The Treaty of Washington gave them the right to fish down to the thirty-ninth degree of north latitude, and then after having given them that, it gave them the right to bring in free fish of all kinds and fish-oil. That included lobsters, oysters, shell-fish, mackerel, and every kind of fish. It did exclude the fish of the inland lakes and the rivers falling into them. That was the only exception.

That was a splendid come-off, and the country was well satisfied with it, too—it was a splendid come-off for all the details of the wrongs and injustice of which Mr. Fish himself complained almost as loudly as the Senator from Maine. Mr. Fish wound it up by offering to them free fish and five and a half million dollars for the inshore fisheries, our inshore fisheries to be granted to them and to be taken into the account as to the comparative value of the two grants, and then, in addition to that, really the passing over and condonation of all the troubles we had had before that. Flags torn down, American vessels taken for cruisers, the barbarities of the laws of the provinces of Great Britain in regard to these matters, and all that, were given up for the treaty of 1871.

Then General Grant, not content with that, in 1874 sent his recommendation to the Senate for the approval of a treaty containing a very much broader reciprocity. One hundred and forty classes of articles were made free, including fish and fish-oils of all descriptions, as broad as it is here, and broader, too. He did that because he thought he would be able (and he would have been able if the treaty had been ratified) to get rid of the $5,500,000 that was given against us in the Halifax award.

Mr. President, I believe I have succeeded in presenting to the Senate what is the true state of the question and in showing that when the treaty of 1871 was abrogated by our act in 1885, within a few months after Mr. Cleveland came into office, we fell right back upon the treaty of 1818 with all the contentions existing about it, which had been merely kept out of view or smothered during the twelve years when the treaty of 1871 was in operation. We came right back in contact with that treaty and in contact with all the British contention in the very form in which it had been officially stated by Mr. Fish to his negotiators.

It will not do for us to say that when Mr. Bayard confronted this question he did not confront the questions that Mr. Fish said were in the case when he instructed his Joint High Commissioners. No man can conscientiously claim that ground. The American people can not sustain a Senator who maintains that Mr. Bayard found this question in any other form at the end of that treaty than it was in when Mr. Fish by the treaty of 1871 merely put these questions to sleep. The treaty of 1871 operated as a soporific, as an anæsthetic upon all the quarrels and troubles and contentions we had had clear back to 1818.

Mr. GEORGE. Without settling one of them.

Mr. MORGAN. Without settling one of them; and the very moment we put an end to the treaty of 1871 they came right back and addressed themselves to the present Administration in that solemn official form which had been given to them by a great diplomatist, a great statesman, an honest and a sincere American, Mr. Hamilton Fish—in that form which they had been acted upon by the Republican Senate in 1871, who were so much impressed with the value and weight of these contentions that they bought their way out of them by the payment of five and a half million dollars, by granting the right of inshore fisheries down to the thirty-ninth degree of north latitude, by the smothering out of all these questions, and by free fish and free fish-oil.

I say, Mr. President, that I think a great deal of time has been wasted. Probably I have done as much as anybody in the Senate in that direction; but I really think that time has been wasted when we come to consider the judicial bearings of these questions as well as their diplomatic bearings. Here is the issue presented by Mr. Fish, and all the efforts we may make to get rid of that presentation, to change it or to say that the facts did not exist, is time merely thrown away.

Mr. GEORGE. Before the Senator sits down I should like to have him answer a question.

I desire to ask the Senator from Alabama, who is more familiar with this matter than any of the rest of us, if the fifteenth article of the treaty is not this and no more: It binds the Government of Great Britain without binding us at all. It binds that Government at any time hereafter until the treaty, if it be ratified, shall be set aside to grant us the privileges specified in the fifteenth article, leaving it to us at any time hereafter to take advantage of any circumstances which may arise of benefit to us to accept it, without being under any obligation on our part to accept it at any time. Is it not the sole effect of the article that it is a continuing offer which they can not withdraw as long as the treaty remains in force, leaving to us to accept it at any time according to our will?

Mr. MORGAN. That is plain on the face of the papers, but it is made still plainer when we recur to the correspondence between Mr. Bayard and Mr. Phelps on our part and the several British ministers and secretaries of state with whom they had correspondence. They brought these subjects forward and attempted to introduce them into these negotiations. Mr. Bayard at once said, "I have no right to do this; I have no power to do it; I can not effect questions of this kind; they must originate with the House of Representatives; they are matters which relate to the revenue laws of the United States; the Senate can not originate a bill of that kind, and therefore I will not consider it;" and he threw it entirely out as a matter of negotiation. They then said, "We want to propose it to Congress." Mr. Bayard said, "If you want to propose it to Congress I can not prevent you from doing that."

Mr. GEORGE. Now, will the Senator allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. Is there any word or phrase in the pending treaty which, by the slightest implication, imports a promise or even a hope held out by the United States that the provisions of the fifteenth article would be accepted by our Government?

Mr. MORGAN. Nothing at all. It could not be the case. Mr. Bayard expressly refused to consider it, and it was for the Congress of the United States to act. No hope was held out; no inducement was held out; but when the British Government makes itself a party to an agreement of this kind in consideration of Congress having remitted these duties on fish and fish-oil and the like, then she becomes bound by the treaty obligation, from which she can not get away, and it rises into a right very far superior to that right of comity and indulgence and freedom which it is said comes out of the arrangement of 1830.

The Committee on Foreign Relations in its majority report distinctly announce that the arrangement of 1830 is not obligatory upon anybody. Those orders in council, based upon the British statutes, can be revoked at any moment that they please. They may close their ports against us if they find it to their interest to do so. We can at any moment pass laws, if we have not got them already on the statute-book, to authorize us in like manner to close our ports, because it is a mere matter of comity.

Mr. President, when I entered into the arrangement this morning with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] I supposed that to-morrow at least would be one of the days to be devoted to the discussion of the treaty. I wish to ask unanimous consent that on Monday, instead of commencing the consideration of the treaty at 1 o'clock, as was the agreement to-day, we shall have the right to commence its consideration at the close of the routine business in the morning, for it will take me an hour and a half to complete my argument upon this case.

Mr. HOAR. Besides the two hours reserved for the close?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not propose to make the argument in the close. I reserved that time for such gentlemen as might see proper to follow me. I understood the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] desired to make some observations on the treaty. I think we are treating him rather badly, because he has announced his intention to speak further. I fully expected when I made the arrangement with the Senator from Maine that we would have to-morrow to continue the discussion, but the action of the Senate in agreeing to adjourn from this evening until Monday cuts us off. So, if it would be agreeable to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], I suggest that the debate be continued until Tuesday at 2 o'clock.

Mr. HOAR. I think other Senators have made their arrangements in regard to the vote on Tuesday. I know they have. Two or three Senators have told me that they have made their arrangements to depart Tuesday afternoon, and they desire to record their votes on the treaty. So we should either accept the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama first, that we should go on upon Monday immediately after the reading of the Journal, or else we should rescind our order to adjourn over to-morrow, which we have it in our power to do.

Mr. PLATT. Why not reconsider that vote, and go on to-morrow?

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senate indulge me, without my reading them, to put in the RECORD at this moment and in this connection a series of extracts from the speeches made in the Canadian Parliament, upon which I desire to make comment?

Mr. DAWES. On this subject?

Mr. MORGAN. On this subject, of course; all relating to this treaty.

Mr. DAWES. You mean since this treaty has been pending?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; the debate on this treaty. By putting these papers in the RECORD, and one or two others I have here, I could let my remarks go over until Monday; but I would very much prefer that we should commence on Monday, say at the conclusion of the routine business, because I do not like to cut off the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] from the opportunity of replying to my speech.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The matter suggested by the Senator from Alabama will be inserted in the RECORD, if there be no objection.

Mr. MORGAN. I first present a table showing the tonnage of American fishing vessels from 1815 to 1886. This table shows the fluctuations of the fishing investments and ventures, which, it will be found, are influenced much more by the "catch" of fish than by the prices, or the duties on their importation into the United States.

Tonnage of American fishing vessels, other than whale, for each year from 1815 to 1886, inclusive.

N. B.—Converse: Canada collected about $56,000 duty on American oysters and other shell-fish.

I now present a list of the fishing vessels of the United States that have taken out licenses to fish in the ports of the Dominion under the provisions of the British protocol to the treaty of 1888. This does not include the ports of Newfoundland, in which many such licenses have been issued. The sums paid for licenses are stated in each case:

Names of American fishing vessels that have been licensed under the "modus vivendi"—1888.

FISHERIES DEPARTMENT, Ottawa, August 9, 1888.

It covers the names of vessels for which returns have been received to date. This department has no information as to the licenses issued by Newfoundland, although instructions have been given that they are to be recognized whenever presented at Canadian ports.

The inclosed letter from United States Consul Molloy to Mr. Rives, Assistant Secretary of State, shows the form in which licenses were granted in Newfoundland until the new regulations were put in force to execute this protocol, and also the rates of harbor and light dues that are charged vessels in Newfoundland ports:

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
St. John's, Newfoundland, June 23, 1888. (Received July 6, 1888.)

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith a copy of a license issued by Collector Noonan to Peter McAuley, master schooner A. E. Whyland, of Gloucester, also a copy of license issued to C. H. Nute, master schooner Fernwood.

I am, etc.,

THOS. N. MOLLOY,
United States Consul.

Hon. G. L. RIVES,
Assistant Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

ST. JOHN'S, June 11, 1888.

Received from Peter McAuley, master of the schooner A. E. Whyland, of Gloucester, 123 tons, from the Grand Banks, the sum of $184.50 for tonnage dues, as prescribed by act passed 9th May, 1888. This receipt to answer all purposes of a license until the regular form of license is furnished in lieu thereof.

JAS. L. NOONAN, Acting Collector.

CUSTOM-HOUSE, ST. JOHN'S, NEWFOUNDLAND.

Received of McAuley, master of A. E. Whyland, from Banks, register tonnage 123, the sum of $38.67, being on account of the under-mentioned dues:

Light dues	$29.50
Water rates	6.15
Harbor master's dues	3.00
Total	38.67

JAS. L. NOONAN, Acting Collector.

ST. JOHN'S, NEWFOUNDLAND, June 11, 1888.

Received from C. H. Nute, master of the schooner Fernwood, of Gloucester, 124 tons, from the Grand Banks, the sum of $186 for tonnage dues, as prescribed by act passed 9th May, 1888. This receipt to answer all purposes of a license until the regular form of license is furnished in lieu thereof.

JAS. L. NOONAN, Acting Collector.

CUSTOM-HOUSE, ST. JOHN'S, NEWFOUNDLAND, June 11, 1888.

Received of Nute, master of the Fernwood, from Banks, register tonnage 124, the sum of $9.20, being on account of the under-mentioned dues:

Light dues (St. Jacques)	.....
Water rates	$6.20
Harbor master's dues	3.00
Total	9.20

JAS. L. NOONAN, Acting Collector.

Light dues at rate 24 cents per ton would be nearly $30, making $39.20.

Mr. President, so much has been said about the rejoicing of the Canadians over the advantages they are to get from this treaty, and these assertions have been so persistently made on this floor, that for the sake of the truth I will insert rather extensive extracts from the speeches of eminent members of the Dominion Parliament made on this treaty during the present year. I do this with a degree of reluctance because it is not a seemly way to discuss any such question.

If we are guided by Canadian opinion as to the merits of this treaty, it must be for the reason that we find no good ground for confidence in our own opinions. But on the other side of the Chamber a degree of authority has been attributed to the statements and opinions of Sir Charles Tupper, which seems to be intended to destroy the force of reason and the arguments of any American who may controvert them. As the weight of Canadian authority is adopted as a guide to control our conclusions and to settle our votes upon a great question in which the United States is vitally interested, I present the following extracts from speeches of these eminent Canadian statesmen, without further apology:

[Mr. Jones, Halifax, April 13, 1888.]

Looking at the bill from the beginning to the end, and regarding it very carefully in the light of the explanation given by the honorable the minister of finance, and the honorable the minister of justice, I have arrived at the conclusion that every concession which the Americans demanded in 1886, under Mr. Bayard's proposal to Lord Salisbury, has been granted. Those demands made by Mr. Bayard in that year were indignantly rejected by the Canadian cabinet in language strong and emphatic, as has already been read to this house by the member for Queen's, Prince Edward Island [Mr. Davies]. We sustained the action of the Government on that occasion, we sustained them in defending the fisheries, and in every word I ever uttered in this house or out of it I guarded myself against using any language which might be used by the Americans or their advocates in depreciating the value of our fisheries.

The questions which were submitted by Mr. Bayard in 1886 were of a character which formed part of the present treaty and negotiations. We find that under this treaty all those demands made by Mr. Bayard have been yielded. The honorable minister of finance asked us the other day not to press him in this discussion to compel him to say anything in defense of the treaty which might be used against its adoption on the other side of the line. The honorable gentleman need not have been laboring under any anxiety on that account. Ingenious as the honorable minister of finance is in his public discussions, with all the fertility of his imagination and resources, and I admit they are great, the honorable gentleman was not able, during that long and able address with which he favored the house on that occasion, to point out one single or solitary advantage which the people of Canada would gain if this treaty was put into effect, except that it removed doubts on certain points for which the Americans were contending, but which we on this side and the British Government behind us had always as steadily maintained. If it was negotiated to surrender points in favor of which we had been contending, which international law and treaty obligations showed we had a clear right to demand ever since 1813, if it was to give up those treaty rights to the Americans under the operation of this treaty, I do not think the minister of finance could point to them as any advantage to the people of Canada in this direction.

I was then fearing that the honorable gentleman was pressed, as I believe he was—for it is all very well for him to stand up here and say that he was nobly sustained by his co-plenipotentiaries from Great Britain—I believe that he was sustained so long as he kept in the line of their desires; I believe that there was a strong, steady, persistent desire manifested by those plenipotentiaries for the settlement of this question, and I believe that the honorable gentleman was forced to yield to an arrangement which, under other circumstances, he would never have given way to. I say, with all due deference to that honorable gentleman, and without any desire to exalt him in the opinion of his country, that I would rather have had one Sir Charles Tupper at that commission alone than ten Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlains that England ever produced. The one was familiar with the wants of our people. He understood the condition of affairs, and if he could have acted independently in regard to Canadian interests and Canadian sentiments, alone, I believe he never would have conceded these points, which are all the Americans want, and obtained nothing whatever for the fishing interests of Canada in return.

I repeat, with all due respect to those distinguished gentlemen who were on the commission with the minister of finance, that their desire was, and their sole desire was, to bring about a settlement of questions which had been of an irritating character between the United States and England; and we have been told by Mr. Chamberlain publicly since his return to England that he came out here to make a treaty, that he had effected it and had brought about a peaceful solution of a difficult question which he believed was going to extend for many years between the two countries.

I have gone very carefully over the treaty, and I do not find that, while the treaty gives to the American fishermen the right to enter our ports without paying any harbor dues or light dues or other similar dues or pilotage, the same privileges are not extended to our fishermen in the ports of the United States. That is a very important omission, if I am right, because our fishing vessels visit Portland and Boston very frequently, and they should at least have the same privileges in American ports that American fishermen have in our own. I speak with reserve, but I have looked over the treaty pretty carefully.

Then, the other day, I noticed that the minister of marine, in reply to a question put by the honorable member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) with regard to the dues paid by our fishermen, lays down the law on that occasion, and says:

"In Halifax harbor-masters' dues are not paid by any vessels under 20 tons, nor by coasting vessels, which include fishing vessels. At Pictou and Sydney harbor dues are, by acts of Parliament, exacted from all vessels over 40 tons register; whether, in practice, fishing vessels are exempt when over 40 tons can not be stated without correspondence with the harbor-masters of these ports."

I call attention to this because, while the treaty would exempt American fishermen from these dues in visiting the harbors of Pictou and Sydney, the Nova Scotia fishermen would be obliged to pay the dues if the honorable gentleman's answer is according to the law. These are important places. Pictou is often visited by American fishermen en route to the North Bay, and to Prince Edward Island, and Sydney harbor is also an important place of call, and if our fishermen are obliged to pay all those dues which the honorable gentleman says they are on all vessels over 40 tons register, and the American vessels are exempt under the operations of the treaty, it follows as a matter of course that our own fishing vessels are placed at a very considerable disadvantage.

The question with regard to bait is one of the greatest possible importance. It is one which lies at the root of the fishery question, and the Americans justly understood and appreciated its value when they secured the privilege of obtaining bait under this treaty. The result of the operation of this will be that the bankers going to the Western banks commonly use clam bait, but those going to the Grand Banks, where they get the fish which are suitable for the larger markets, can not expect to catch those fish without the use of fresh bait. They are a long way away from their own home, and their fresh bait will only last a short time, and if they are compelled to return to their own ports to get fresh bait if they can, and the supply is doubtful, and they can not always get it, they would practically be almost compelled to give up the business altogether. But now all they have to do is to run into any near port on the Nova Scotia coast, from Cape Breton all along the coast to Halifax, and they will get their bait and be out on the fishing grounds again in a few days competing with our own people. This is still further a disadvantage to our own fishermen, though I do not say it is a disadvantage to our people, because they double the price of bait to our own fishermen.

The whole thing seems to have been a sacrifice to peace, not a sacrifice in the interests of our people, but a sacrifice to conciliate the Americans, who raised their hands, after all that had taken place and after they have been irritated to such an extent that they threatened—that is the word—the Dominion of Canada if we did not withdraw what they thought interfered with their people along the coast, that they might retaliate in a manner which would be unpleasant to us. I say this clause with regard to purchasing supplies is one that is likely to lead to a great deal of misconception. I contend that under the operation of that clause vessels may come in, as the minister of finance says, and may procure their provisions, including their salt, and if they take salt, why not take barrels, and if barrels, why not take bait? We have the word of the minister of justice, it is true; but I am disposed in this matter to accept the opinion of the minister of finance in preference, because the minister of finance doubtless is aware what was the intention of it, and the intention evidently appears to be that the Americans are to get those supplies under those circumstances. I say that Mr. Bayard asked for all those privileges two years ago.

In a schedule attached to his proposal for the settlement of all questions in dispute in relation to the fisheries on the northeastern coast of British North America, he lays down certain propositions. First, he asked to have the headland question settled in favor of the Americans. The Government have yielded, and have given up a contention which the British Government have made for the last seventy years, and which the Americans have practically admitted under the treaties which have been made since that time, and which they practically confirmed by the decision in their own courts with regard to the seizure made by a Confederate vessel in the mouth of one of their own bays—all of which bore out the contention which the British Government put upon the headland question. I am not saying whether it was right or wrong to have yielded it, but it was asked by Mr. Bayard in 1886, and the honorable gentleman has yielded it and has given the Americans just what they asked.

The concessions made in this treaty I might almost say preclude all possibility of the Americans ever opening their market to our fish; and how are we to compete with them in the same sea when they have all the advantages of our ports and of our proximity to the fishing grounds given to them, and when, in addition to that, they can take their thousand barrels of mackerel to the United States and sell them for $2,000 more than our fishermen can get for a thousand barrels in the same market? It is only by opening the markets of the United States that our great fishing industry can be extended. Our market is there, and the Americans know it as well as we do. They have been told it by the honorable first minister and others again and again. All our fish must go there, and we have to pay the duty on what we send, because their fishermen take the largest portion, and our fish must go in at the market value minus the duty they impose on us. I say, looking at the position of our fishermen at the present moment, I regard this treaty as a most fatal blunder and as an injury to our fishermen which they will not be able to survive v ry long.

They have been hoping year after year that as soon as they gave up those advantages which they possess in the fisheries they would be placed on an equal plane of competition with the Americans; but they see all these advantages swept away, and they are obliged to compete with the Americans with these disadvantages against them. Under these circumstances I am very sorry I can not give the honorable gentleman that credit which has been given to him from imperial as well as colonial sources. If in the interest of the Empire it is absolutely necessary that we should make these concessions, let us understand it, and I shall be prepared to make them and to take my share of the responsibility. But let us not put the matter under any false pretenses—and this treaty has been submitted to this House under false pretenses, if I may use such an expression, and if it is not unparliamentary——

Some honorable MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. JONES. I do not think it is out of order. This treaty has been submitted to this House with the representation that it is in the interest of our own people, and I say it is against the interest of our own people who are engaged in that industry. It is in the interest of peace, I admit, and I admit that as part of the Empire we are obliged to make some concessions; and if the honorable gentleman will put it on that high level, and appeal to the people on the ground that we are obliged to make sacrifices for the sake of imperial interests and to maintain a good understanding between two great peoples, I would be with him to a certain extent. But he has taken another ground; he has defended the treaty on the ground that it is in the interest of our own people, which is not the case. I repeat that if it would bring about a better understanding between the United States and the people of this country, which is very much to be desired, that is one point in its favor. It is the only point in its favor. If there was no other point, that would commend this treaty to me, but if it would remove all causes of difference between the Americans and ourselves—if it would remove all those causes of irritation which have been brought about by the unwise fiscal policy of the present government—if the Americans are led by it to see that there are five millions of people in this country who are anxious to establish trade relations with them which would be of mutual advantage to both countries, and are willing to make concessions under this treaty in order to obtain unrestricted reciprocity, then I say the sacrifice, injurious as it is to the fishermen along our coasts, if it leads in the future to those greater advantages of wider commercial relations between the two countries, will possibly not have been made in vain.

[Mr. Eisenhauer, April 13.]

As was pointed out by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), the provisions of the treaty will enable American fishermen to secure larger quantities of fish for their market, and it will consequently reduce the price for our fish. The privilege of transshipment of their fish in our ports enables those vessels to catch larger quantities of mackerel than they were formerly able to do, because the time they lost in going to ports in the United States with their fares and coming back to the fishing grounds will be saved to them. I do seriously think, and believe, that this treaty will work very injuriously to our fishermen. I must say that I anticipated the result of this Washington commission all along. I knew very well that the home Government was very anxious to have this matter settled, and that they would be quite ready to settle it in a manner very much contrary to our interests, so that I am not at all surprised at the result. That is very unfair to us; we were the weakest party of the three and we got the worst of it.

This treaty if ratified will injure the county which I have the honor to represent more than any county in the Dominion that I know of, for the reasons I have already given, and I think it would be only well that the Government should pause before ratifying this treaty, which will work so injuriously to all our deep-sea fishermen. Now, I do not wish to take up the time of the House, but I would repeat again, in the interests of the fishermen of the county I represent, and in the interests of the fishermen of the country generally, that I consider that the government has made some very valuable concessions. The junior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny), who has just taken his seat, seemed to think that the concessions do not amount to much. Well, if that honorable gentleman goes down into his county I think he will find that the fishermen there will tell him a different story. I think the concessions are very valuable; in fact I think the Americans have got almost all they wanted, while we have got nothing in return. The honorable member said there were concessions on both sides, but he failed to point them out, and I have failed to hear any honorable member point out the least concession which we have got from the Americans.

[Mr. Mitchell, April 13.]

Sir, I listened with great attention to the very able and eloquent speech of the honorable the finance minister, and while I have always admired that gentleman's ability, and acuteness, and dignity and eloquence, perhaps on no occasion has he ever presented a case to the house in which a bad case was so well put as that put by the honorable gentleman on Tuesday last. Sir, I listened to him with great attention when he asked this house to believe that the government of which he was a member and the commission of which he was one of the representatives of England, in securing this treaty had performed a feat which would command the admiration of Canada, and inure to the benefit of her people. Sir, on these points I differ with him, but though I may differ with him in relation to the praise that he takes for the commission and the laudation which he gave to gentlemen connected with it on the British side, and to the conclusions at which he arrived in reference to the benefits it would be to this country, I must say that, looking at it, and looking at it in the consequences which the perpetuation of peace with our great neighbors on the south will bring about, although I look at the treaty as completely giving away the interests of Canada in almost every particular, I must tell this house that "give away" as it is, whatever the consequences of it may be, we have got to confirm and to carry out the treaty. We have got to do that, sir, not because it is a just or a fair treaty to Canada, which it is not, and before I sit down I think I will be able if not to satisfy gentlemen on that side of the house I will be able at all events to induce the honorable the minister of finance to say that he certainly has colored the advantages which he alleged Canada would receive rather too highly. I speak now not for the purpose of opposing the treaty, but I speak for the purpose of putting the case of Canada fairly before this house and before the country.

Now, sir, in the record which I have read of concessions yielded year after year by Her Majesty's Government, I think my honorable friend will fail to perceive that any strong ground has been taken or any material support given in the interest of Canada, such as he spoke of in his introductory remarks on Tuesday last. Sir, I think it is a record which is a discredit to Great Britain—to have the interests of a great colony, the greatest in the Empire, and one she is proud of, frittered away by piecemeal, as I have said. It is a record of concessions which have been made step by step without even consulting the people who are interested in them. I think the record of the last thirty years, at least the last twenty years, is a disgrace to the British Empire and the British Government. In saying what I do I do not intend to cast any reflections on the action of my honorable friend and his colleagues at Washington. He has very patriotically and very magnanimously taken the blame for the shortcomings in this treaty on himself. It is natural for him to do that in such cases; but I know him too well, I know the facts too well, and I have had too much experience in dealing with the fisheries not to know that what he did there he did under pressure. Although he spoke of the largest power in the world being behind him, as a matter of fact that power was not there.

It was there in name, but not in power; and if there has been an act since the formation of this Dominion which has tended to loosen the bonds between Canada and the Empire, if there has been an act which will tend to produce dissatisfaction and to promote distrust in the British Empire with reference to the affairs of Canada, it is this last act of hers in abandoning us and taking away our fisheries, in face of the fact, as I have shown from the dispatches I have read, that she stood pledged to maintain the interests of Canada as they stood when they were suspended in 1854. When the treaty lapsed by the act of the United States, where was the British Government? Read Sir Edward Cardwell's, Lord Kimberley's, and the Earl of Aberdeen's dispatches. The only man among the whole of them who has fairly stood by us was the Earl of Clarendon. Yet every one of them, one after another, assured us that England intended to stand by us in maintaining the exclusive rights which the British Government claimed and enforced up to 1854; and, sir, every one of them save Lord Clarendon went back on his record and left us to see our rights taken away from us by piecemeal and under false pretenses. That is the position of the British Government towards Canada for the last twenty years—and I speak of it with regret, for I have ever been as loyal a subject as any that stands in the Dominion of Canada. I have been loyal; in fact I have been more, I have been also loyal in sentiment; but the sentiment is knocked out of me, and I fear that a great many others feel as I do; and when we see the interests of Canada frittered away as they have been in this case, I fear that any desire to create a more permanent loyalty will ooze out of us, and we will become a dissatisfied people. They talk about the federation of the Empire—the veriest rot that ever was spoken. What interest have we in common with the other side of the Atlantic? We owe to England our existence as a semi-nation, it is true; we owe to her our language and our laws, and we are proud of both; but while England has been one of the greatest colonizing nations of the world, there is no nation has worse administered her colonies. Take the case of Cape Colony, a record of years of mismanagement, misrule, and misgovernment. Look at her treatment of us in regard to the boundary of Maine, as well as the Oregon boundary, in each of which cases an immense tract of territory was abandoned, either by ignorance or imbecility, to the United States; and again look at the St. Juan affair. They are all, as our Bering's Sea interests will I fear be, a complete give-away, as our fishery rights, in my opinion, have been. In future we will have to look to ourselves to protect our interests, and want no more diplomatic interference by such men as Chamberlain and Sir Sackville-West. Indeed, what would Canada have been in the past without the administrative powers of the Canadians themselves?

Mr. MITCHELL. Look at the record in this case. I, who was intimately connected with the whole affair and felt deeply the necessity of standing up for our rights; I, who spent day after day, and week after week, pressing these claims on the British Government and keeping them up to the mark, found them always receding at the first opportunity—and now everything is gone. My honorable friend speaks of the advantages this treaty has given us; he speaks of the limit of space which is described by the points of the treaty; he speaks about the delimitations which are named in the treaty. Sir, let any man take up a map—and I regret that my honorable friend should have made the excuse he did about not producing a map—for it was his duty to produce one. His excuse is, that there is a provision made for the appointment of a commission for the delimitation on the treaty. True, there is; that is the official delimitation. But it was the duty of the Cabinet to have prepared a map and to have it submitted to Parliament so that we could appreciate and understand these advantages my honorable friend has so eloquently described, but which I can not see. I may tell my honorable friend that, looking to the contentions of Canada and England as propounded in 1818 and maintained up to 1854, when they were suspended for twelve years under the treaty of Lord Elgin, after which they were urged to be in force again and recognized by the British Government from that time out, until they were again suspended in 1871 by a new treaty.

I say, if a map based on those contentions was taken from headland to headland, and those exclusive rights of the bays delineated upon it, this House would see what the difference is between the delimitation in that map and the concessions given up to the Americans. If I can understand the meaning of the statements in the great mass of dispatches which I have had to wade through in order to define how we have endeavored to maintain the interests of Canada I should say that the men who wrote them were bound in honor to have stood by Canada and enforced those rights. If they had done so we would have stood to-day with our headland system maintained and our rights to bays recognized, because all that was wanted was a little firmness some twenty years ago, and we would not be in the position of having to beg for reciprocity. About the inshore fisheries, it was never disputed that we had an absolute right to them, and yet my honorable friend comes here with his eloquent tongue and persuades us—he knows he can do anything in this country, for he can do what none of us can do, he can control the first minister, as he saved him in the contest of a year ago—he comes with his eloquent tongue and persuades us that in this delimitation which the treaty provides for we have obtained a great concession.

Sir, we have abandoned everything, and while we have done that my honorable friend has forgotten one thing. Did he know there were two ends to the shores of America on the Atlantic? Where is the provision in the treaty to give the Canadians the same rights in the Delaware and Chesapeake, in Boston Bay, and Narragansett, and Albermarle, and from the Cape of Florida past the mouth of the Mississippi, that they have captured from us? Do we find that the interpretation which they set upon their shores, bays, and coasts is the same as they ask us to set upon ours? Have they not rights which they claim from headland to headland, and which are enforced even among themselves, and from which we are excluded? Where is our right to enter their bays? It is true it is the separate States own them there, but that does not alter the law or right on the question. Where has my honorable friend provided in the treaty that we should have the use of those bays to the south of where our boundary terminates? Why have we not secured the same privileges in the American bays, straits, and headlands that they demand in ours? There is no such provision in the treaty. Let a Canadian fisherman go down to Delaware and Boston, or the Sound, or go down amongst their oyster bays and attempt to fish and he will soon find himself in prison. Where is the withdrawal of the outrageous American pretension in reference to Bering's Sea, and why was the settlement of that outrageous claim omitted from the treaty?

Did my honorable friend forget all about these important questions? I am sure not. But my honorable friend found himself in Washington with instructions in Mr. Chamberlain's hands to make a treaty, and as to what that treaty should be neither Chamberlain nor the British Government nor Sir Lionel Sackville West cared, and the only man who did care was my honorable friend Sir Charles Tupper, and he had to obey his instructions as a servant of the British Government and representing their interests. He was handicapped, weighted down, and overborne by the influence of that greatest empire of the world, of whose power boasted. I feel I have taken up too much of the time of the house to-night, but I felt it to be my duty, even at the risk of wearying the house, to place upon record the history of this fishery question, not for the purpose of éclat to myself, but as a duty I owe the country, that we may be able to trace in some available way the history of the iniquitous manner in which the British Government has treated this colony of ours.

I am as loyal a subject as any man, and I hope to remain so, but I will remind the house that the time is fast coming when, if the British Government continues to allow our interests to be frittered away in this way, she will find the colony itself frittered away before long. It is as well some plain speaking should be heard. I do not wish to be understood to express the opinion that I desire it. I should regret it notwithstanding this treatment, and while I have heretofore felt proud of belonging to a colony of England, Canada can not and will not always remain a colony, and I should not be surprised to find that this treaty will promote such change. Children do not always remain in their father's house, and we are gradually growing into the position when the interests of Canada demand we should branch out for ourselves. I do not desire to see this for some time to come, but a few more cases like this and I would not give much for the power of England in this colony of Canada. There are a great many points I wanted to talk upon, but I have taken up so much time in submitting the proof of these matters in order to sustain my contention that I think it would be trespassing too much on the time of Parliament for me to continue. I will therefore not take up the time of the house any longer in discussing this painful matter. I felt I had a duty to perform, and I only regret that I have performed it so inefficiently.

Of course this treaty will pass; there is no doubt about that; but I disapprove of it entirely, as I think the Americans have got everything and we have got nothing. I speak with knowledge of the subject when I say that we have got nothing. The delimitations that are spoken of are simply allowing us to retain an infinitesimal part of what Britain has over and over again declared we had an absolute right to, and has for nearly forty years enforced before the treaty put them in abeyance. Our rights revived when that treaty ceased, and what did we find? We found that taken from us by the commission which sat under the authority of the British Crown. I regret very much that England should have so much humiliated herself before her children here, and it is a humiliation, and I regret that it should be done by a nation which professes to have kept faith, especially with her colonies. I regret that I have to speak as I am now speaking of England, but I say this as a duty to my country, Canada, as a duty to myself, and as a duty to this house.

[Mr. Foster, speaking April 13.]

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Nine-tenths of the water area for which she contended has been given up, and nineteen-twentieths on the coast of Newfoundland.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a point on which my honorable friend and myself can not agree.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am perfectly willing to accept the measure of any competent surveyor who will undertake to compare the two lines.

[Mr. Foster, April 13.]

Now, what will honorable gentlemen opposite do with reference to this treaty? All through the country their papers have denounced this treaty in the strongest terms. Sir, the headlines that have been printed with reference to this treaty ought to be preserved. "Canada lies a-bleeding," says the Mail.

Mr. MITCHELL. And truly, too.

Mr. FOSTER. "A complete surrender," says the Globe; "Secretary Bayard's victory," says the Mail; "A complete give-away," says the Halifax Chronicle; "Canada betrayed," says the Ottawa Free Press; "So far as the United States are concerned they have got everything they ever contended for," Hon. Peter Mitchell; "The great Tupperian surrender," Halifax Recorder; "A base, beggarly, blundering surrender," Attorney-General Longley. These are some of the statements made by the party opposite outside.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do I understand the honorable gentleman to use my name in connection with this?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. What did Peter Mitchell say?

Mr. FOSTER. "So far as the United States are concerned they have got everything they ever contended for."

Mr. MITCHELL. So I say now.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, sir, in closing, I have just this to say in reference to the treaty. Every one knows the length of time that this controversy has existed; everybody who has read the history of this question knows the difficulty which has surrounded it, the irritation which it has provoked. Sir, I believe that the Dominion of Canada, in its large and broad heart, from end to end, will be in favor of this treaty, not because it holds every contention that Canada has made, not because it carries out everything that Canada could wish had been carried out, but because it is, as stated by the President and Secretary of the United States, a fair and honorable arrangement on both sides, in which neither country gets the full of its contention, but in which neither country suffers great injury by the concessions that have been made. Taking into account the future of Canada, her future interests as well as her present interests, taking into account the fact that we are to live beside one great and powerful neighbor, that we form part of another great and powerful empire, that we have conserved our interests to a very large degree, and that there is a prospect for the future of a permanent settlement of this question, I believe that the great heart of Canada, notwithstanding the head lines and the strong assertions, will beat with this one sentiment, and after all this long controversy of year upon year, it is a happy, a fair, a good settlement, one that has been made in the interests of peace and in the interests of the two great countries which ought to live beside each other in amity and good feeling.

Sir, the executives of the four countries of Newfoundland, Canada, Great Britain, and the United States have lifted this question from its troubled condition, have taken it out of the arena where it has been discussed as an irritating question for seventy years, and they have come to a final and permament solution, so far as they are concerned. They say that this arrangement is fair to all parties concerned, and they relegate it now to the Parliaments and Congresses of the great nations. Notwithstanding all that may be said for party purposes and all that may be argued from interested motives, I believe that if the voice of the country could penetrate to the halls of all those Parliaments and Congresses and have its way, it would result in an approbation of this treaty and of this instrument as a conclusion, final, honorable, and on the whole advantageous to all parties concerned. It is in that view that I support the treaty, and it is with those feelings that I hope the treaty will be finally ratified by all the powers concerned and will put an end to a vexed and troublesome question in what I consider a truly honorable and happy way.

[Mr. Mills, of Bothwell, April 16.]

What does the minister of finance hope to gain by this house affirming that treaty? Does he propose, or is it his desire, to convince an exasperated nation that those who represented them on this commission made a bad bargain, and that the arrangement which was made is so satisfactory to the people of Canada that they have not hesitated to accept it immediately and without dispute? That is to call upon us to make an affirmation which we know to be false. We know what our position is. We know that it is one of humiliation, and we ought to be spared the further humiliation of having these extraordinary concessions rejected by those to whom they have been made. The minister of finance has told us in his speech that the protection of the fisheries has never been made a party question. I believe that is true. I believe that the protection of the fisheries was earnestly desired by both sides of the house, but the protection of the fisheries, and the concession to another country of the sovereignty over our fisheries, or a common right to our fisheries, is a wholly different thing; and when the honorable gentleman speaks of the protection of the fisheries and then refers to the provisions of this treaty, he is referring to two things as far apart as they can be.

This treaty does not provide for protection; it is a surrender. The conditions in this treaty which, possibly within the next twenty-four hours, the United States will either have postponed or rejected, are not provisions by which proper protection is to be given to our fisheries, but is a concession of more than half of the area which we claim to be within the jurisdiction of this country. There are many thousands of square miles, which we claim to be under Canadian jurisdiction, or under the jurisdiction of Newfoundland, which are proposed to be surrendered to the United States under this treaty.

* * * * * * *

The most important provision of this treaty is that relating to the surrender of our sovereignty over a large area of water—an area which must embrace in the neighborhood of 20,000 square miles. The honorable gentleman has but to look at the map to see what an extraordinary area of what we supposed to be a part of our Dominion, and in that I include Newfoundland as well, we have given up.

Why, sir, it would at least have been dignified if the honorable gentleman had waited a short time to see whether the American people would approve of what has been done. The honorable gentleman knows that to-morrow his treaty will be postponed or rejected, and before it is postponed or rejected he wants to commit this house to this proposition, so that it must be made the starting point in all future negotiations. The honorable gentleman feels that the position of the Government is one of humiliation and that the Parliament of this country ought to be made sharers in the discredit of the work that has been done.

[Sir Richard Cartwright, April 16, 1888.]

Then, in the second place, I believe, whatever quibbles may be used, that all the concessions are on the side of Canada. I have been unable to see from any statement which has been made by honorable gentlemen that they have gained one single thing for which they have contended. Still further, I notice that all matters favoring Canada were carefully eliminated from the second treaty of Washington as they were from the first. There were other matters affecting our fisheries which should have been dealt with on the northwest coasts of this Dominion as well as on the northeast, and, in dealing with any other power than the United States, the British Government would have insisted that the negotiations should have included all the fishery matters in dispute, including the fisheries action of the United States officers in the Behring's Sea, of which we have as much reason to complain, at least, as the United States have to complain of the action of our officers in regard to their fishermen in the northeastern corner of the Dominion. Why was not that allowed to be made a part of the discussion by the commissioners?

I am afraid that it was eliminated for the same reasons for which the undoubted wrongs of Canada were passed over and were unnoticed in 1871, because it was not convenient for the American Government to be called upon to enter into that question at that time, because every argument which they could use in favor of the action of their officers in the Behring's Sea would have been in antagonism with their contentions in regard to the St. Lawrence and the Atlantic fisheries. I fail to see where we have obtained any support from the British authorities on this subject. Undoubtedly, dealing with any other power, the British authorities would have insisted that the negotiations should cover these points, but in our case these points were eliminated from the discussion, and even Mr. Chamberlain himself stated that our legal rights in Canada were surrendered in this matter, and he justified that action on the ground of the vast importance of the friendship of the American people to the people of England. Sir, under these circumstances, it is utterly impossible for us to pretend that we had any substantial assistance whatever from the presence of the English plenipotentiaries; and I heartily indorse the statement of the honorable member for Northumberland [Mr. Mitchell] that the interests of Canada would have been much more likely to have been attended to successfully if we had, in a matter which concerned us chiefly, been allowed to name our own negotiators and conduct our own negotiations, and until we have the power to do that, I do not believe, for my part, that we have any very great chance of carrying such negotiations to a successful termination.

Apparently the Government of Canada have adopted this one guiding rule, and this one only, to brag and bluster and bully, and then when you are confronted with a determined foe haul down your flag. That appears to be the policy of the government and nothing else. That was the policy pursued with the Province of Manitoba. Have we forgotten, sir, how a year ago this house re-echoed with denunciations of the gentlemen on this side because they propose a course in accordance with right and justice to Manitoba? Sir, the concession was not made in answer to remonstrances; the concession was made in answer to threats, and not until those threats had assumed the most formidable proportions did honorable gentlemen relax their tyrannical interference with the rights of our sister province. So, sir, has it been in the case with those fisheries. There was bully and bluster and brag and various vexatious customs relations, which irritated and exasperated the Americans, as my honorable friend told us, and then, sir, when they are brought face to face with the results of their own conduct, and when they found there was serious peril, they hauled down their flag, and we are compelled to make this capitulation, for it is nothing else, and this surrender of our admitted legal rights.

[Mr. Laurier, April 16, 1888.]

The policy of the opposition upon this question is simply this: That, while asserting that the treaty is a surrender of most valuable rights that belong to Canada, still it is the duty of Canadians to adopt this treaty, because it will put an end to a most dangerous state of things. That is the only reason we have to advance for the course which we propose to take on this occasion. The treaty is a concession of rights that belong to us, that should have been retained to us; but still, sir, in face of the dangerous aspect which events have taken, it is better to adopt the treaty and have this vexed question settled forever.

[Mr. Ellis, April 16, 1888.]

The treaty before the House which we are now discussing is pretty good evidence of the change that has come over the ministry on that point. Take up the treaty itself: the first eight articles relating to the headland question, and compare them with what the first minister said last year on that point. He said:

"There are only two questions in which there can be any contention. The first is the headland question, which we are all acquainted with. We all know what that means. We adhere to the position taken by the British Government from the time of Lord Bathurst until now, that the 3 miles are to be taken from the headlands and not from the sinuosities of the bay."

With regard to the headlands question, I observe that the treaty itself follows the proposition of Mr. Adams in 1886, as modified by Mr. Bayard. That proposition has been accepted by the Government. I do not propose to find any particular fault with the arrangement made. Some compromise was absolutely necessary, and this is perhaps not worse than any other that might be made. Mr. Bayard, in supplementing Mr. Adams's proposal, proposed that bays and harbors from which American vessels are in future to be excluded are:

"Agreed to be taken to be such bays and harbors as are 10 or less than 10 miles in width, and the distance of 3 marine miles from such bays and harbors shall be measured from a straight line drawn across the bay or harbor in the part nearest the entrance at the first point where the width does no exceed 10 miles."

The Privy Council thus replied to that proposition:

"This provision would involve a surrender of fishing rights which have always been regarded as the exclusive property of Canada, and would make common fishing grounds of territorial waters which, by the law of nations, have been invariably regarded both in Great Britain and the United States as belonging to the adjacent country."

By the tenth and eleventh articles we have receded very far from the ground originally taken by the public authorities, and have undoubtedly placed the American fishermen in a better position to enjoy the rights and privileges they were to enjoy under the treaty of 1818. I have gone carefully over the treaty, and the contentions made by our own state department, and I have made a summary, which I trust the house will permit me to read, of the concessions made:

"We have, by the very act of making this treaty, receded from the position maintained so long in practice, that Canada and Great Britain could impose their own interpretations upon the meaning of the treaty of 1818, thus enlarging the limitations of that treaty. By doing this we have given the United States a precedent upon which to base new demands for the amelioration of the regulations applied to their fishing vessels should the need arise.

"We have almost wholly abandoned the contention that fishing vessels are a class by themselves, and therefore not entitled to any commercial privileges.

"We entirely and forever abandon the 3-mile headland theory.

"We forever admit the right of United States fishermen to navigate the Straits of Canso.

"We no longer compel American fishing vessels to depart from our shores in twenty-four hours after arrival.

"We relieve them from the obnoxious operations of the customs regulations enforced against them as fishing vessels, and which were specially severe, as the true intent of these laws was to regulate commercial trading only.

"We free them from harbor, pilotage, and other dues which were sometimes inhospitably, and often capriciously imposed upon them, even in cases when they sought shelter, dealing with them in these matters as commercial vessels, though denying them the rights of commercial vessels.

"We have practically abandoned the course of ordering them to depart if supposed to be hovering within our waters; and also the plan of putting an officer on board of them as a matter of course.

"We permit them under certain circumstances to purchase bait, to replenish outfits, to ship men, and to transfer cargoes.

"We issue to them, free of charge, permits which enable them to purchase supplies in ports of entry, on all occasions, just as trading vessels, except that they may not do it for barter, and this applies both to the homeward voyage and outer voyages."

The second section of Article XI does not name bait, but there will be no difficulty whatever of purchasing bait under it.

"By the fourteenth article we abandon our previous contention that preparing within Canadian waters to fish is evidence of intention to actually fish within Canadian waters, and we therefore recede from the position taken by the act of 1886.

"We have limited and defined and reduced the severe penalties imposed by that act for violation of our exclusive rights of fishing. Forfeiture of the vessel is no longer a penalty except for fishing within Canadian waters, or preparing within these waters to fish therein. In all other cases $3 a ton is the highest fine which can be imposed.

"We have provided a summary process of law for dealing with arrested or captured vessels, instead of the old and slow process of the admiralty court.

"And, lest the punishment of an infraction of the new treaty, or that of 1818, should seem to be unjust, and to prevent the danger of giving offense to the United States, the Government of Canada can reverse the judgment of the court."

The United States negotiators, on the other side, recognize that we are not required by the treaty of 1818 to sell their fishermen bait, ice, or general outfits, to transship cargoes, or to ship men, in ordinary cases, but by the protocol we give them the privilege of doing those things, although the minister of justice said:

"If the provinces are to be the judges it is most prejudicial to their interests that United States fishermen should be permitted to come into their harbors on any pretext, and it is fatal to their fishery interests that those fishermen, with whom they have to compete at such a disadvantage in the markets of the United States, should be allowed to enter for supplies and bait even for the pursuit of the deep-sea fisheries."

Certainly the minister has abandoned that position. And so going through the whole correspondence, through all the warnings, through all the rigorous custom-house regulations, through the utterances of the press, through the declarations of the ministers, and you will find a thorough and complete change of attitude on almost every point in this controversy. What we have lost by what we have surrendered I do not know. If we consider what we have lost by the efforts which have been made to prevent our coming to any arrangement, we must have lost a great deal. As to the jeopardy in which we are placed, it has been described by the minister of finance. I think we have made very many concessions indeed. But I regret that we have been compelled, in an ungracious way, to do a gracious act.

The main ground upon which this treaty can be defended, the ground upon which I support it, is that it is friendly to the United States. It is a treaty of peace. What we surrender may not be very great. It is absolutely necessary for us to live on the most friendly terms with the United States. It is a most desirable thing that all the arrangements between the two countries and all the relations between them shall be of the most harmonious character, so as to prevent trouble and discord among the two peoples. We are constantly, in winter and summer, the recipients of favors from the people along the coast. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I support this treaty because of its friendliness to the United States, because it sweeps away restrictions which are unnecessary, which are of no benefit to ourselves, and when removed may be of great benefit to that people and to ourselves in the way of peace both for this country and the empire at large.

[Mr. Landry, April 16.]

The only question respecting which I can to some extent agree with honorable gentlemen opposite when they spoke of having made a surrender, and I can not help giving expression to my opinion in this House, was that so far as I interpret what is given by us under this treaty, although the matters may not be very valuable in view of the interests of peace, good government and relationship which we hope will always exist between this country and the United States, and I say those matters were not a great deal to surrender to secure those objects—yet if there was anything surrendered I believe it was surrendered by us and not by the United States.

[Mr. Edgar, April 16.]

Now, sir, as to this treaty itself, the concessions do seem to be all on one side. There is very little in the treaty at all. It is spread over a good deal of ground, it is like very thin butter spread over a large slice of bread. It looks very much as if the plenipotentiaries, after spending nearly three months, came to the conclusion that for the credit of themselves, every one of them, they must do something; that it would never do for them to go home without coming to some settlement, and so they patched up a little arrangement about the head-lines; they made concessions to the Americans about entries in the customs ports, and they gave nothing on earth to Canada, except a provision in the twelfth clause, that Canada is to have the same rights for her fishing vessels on American fishing grounds as were conceded to the United States. But even that, the minister of finance in his speech, had to admit did not amount to anything at all; he was almost ashamed for it, and he apologized for it. So, while not desiring to oppose the treaty as it stands now, I think it is comparatively harmless, but I think it contains a great many provisions which should have been conceded by us without negotiations by the delegates at Washington. I am sorry to say that it does not contain free access to the United States markets for fish for our people down by the sea, and that is one great desideratum that they all seem clamoring for.

[Mr. Jones, Halifax, April 17.]

When this bill was under discussion on a previous occasion I took the opportunity to draw the attention of the house to the concessions made to the American fishermen under this and the previous clause, showing, according to my judgment, that we had under these clauses yielded up the whole value of our fishing privileges, and had obtained nothing whatever in return. I maintain that the use of our ports for the purpose of securing bait and supplies and the transshipment of cargoes is a privilege of inestimable value, so far as the American fishermen are concerned, and that the honorable gentleman, the minister of finance, and the other gentlemen who spoke on that side, have not been able to show a single advantage gained by the Canadian fishermen on our side.

For instance, I stated that the privilege of transshipment was a great privilege which they sought, and I felt that, under that section, although it might not be intended to give them that privilege, the section could be so construed as practically to give them that right of transshipment. I pointed out that United States fishing vessels, according to the section, entering the "ports, bays, and harbors of the eastern and northeastern coasts of Canada, under stress of weather or in consequence of any casualty, may unload, reload, transship or sell (subject to customs laws and regulations) all fish on board, when such unloading, transshipment, or sale is necessary as incidental to repairs."

And I asked, as I now ask, who is to judge whether it is necessary as incidental to repairs or not? Nobody can judge. The captain may say, "I propose to remain here two or three days, and, in my opinion, my fish are in such a condition that I must transship them." It is not to be supposed that the collector of customs in each port is to have the right to interpret the treaty. That right is not vested in him. The result is that that section will be so construed that the privilege of transshipment, the most valuable privilege that the American fishermen have asked for, is practically conceded to them. According to the seventh section the master of any United States fishing vessel who has received a license may obtain—

"Such provisions and supplies as are ordinarily sold to trading vessels, and any such vessel, having obtained a license in the manner aforesaid, shall also be accorded, upon all occasions, such facilities for the purchase of casual or needful provisions and supplies as are ordinarily granted to trading vessels."

Now, the honorable gentleman says that this treaty does not give them the right to purchase bait. It seems to me that bait is a part of the outfit of a fishing vessel. At any rate it is so argued, and I think can be successfully argued. If a captain says, "I have lost my bait in this storm and I want to purchase more," the treaty says that he may, and all I have contended for is that this treaty, which is said to be an interpretation treaty, which is said to be intended to make matters clear, has simply made them so confused and so difficult to understand that practically the right to purchase bait and the right of transshipment can not be refused to American fishermen.

Now, I have already called the attention of the minister to the seventh section, and I repeat my request for information in regard to it. The first part of that section says:

"The minister of marine and fisheries, and any officers of the Government of Canada whom he may authorize for that purpose, shall grant promptly, and upon application, and without charge, licenses to United States fishing vessels to purchase in established ports of entry of the aforesaid coasts of Canada, for the homeward voyage, such provisions and supplies as are ordinarily sold to trading vessels."

And the latter part of the section goes on to say:

"Any such vessel, having obtained a license in the manner aforesaid, shall also be accorded upon all occasions such facilities for the purchase of casual or needful provisions and supplies as are ordinarily granted to trading vessels."

Now, the first part of the section would lead any one who was seeking to find out its interpretation to believe that it was only after the master of the vessel had closed his voyage and was going home and required some small supplies which he would need for that homeward voyage that he would be entitled to obtain the necessary supplies; but the latter part of the section seems to have a different effect. It appears to state that any vessel which has once obtained a license shall in future on all occasions have the same facilities for the purchase of supplies as are ordinarily granted to trading vessels. Of course there will be a great deal of controversy as to what "casual and needful provisions and supplies" are. My impression is that this treaty will receive at the hands of this Government, if it be adopted, and from the officers of the Government a very broad and liberal interpretation. My opinion is that the Canadian officers hereafter will not be very astute in examining the demand of the American fishermen under this treaty to purchase supplies or to purchase bait or anything else.

They will practically give them what they want, but it seems to me that this clause is very curiously worded, and I ask whether a license once obtained is intended to inure for the following season, or whether, when a license is obtained in the early part of the summer, the party is only to be entitled to purchase supplies as he needs them from time to time during the then season. If that is the case, that will enable these men to do what the minister of justice and the minister of fisheries have declared would be fatal to the fishing interests of the maritime provinces. I do not desire to prolong the controversy on these points, which I think have been put very fairly before the house and the country, but the quotations which have been put before the house from the minutes and the state papers show clearly that, in the opinion of those ministers, it would be fatal to the interests of every one, and especially to the interests of the fisheries in the maritime provinces, if the American fishermen were allowed to come in there and make their purchases of bait, if they were allowed to make the harbors and shores of the maritime provinces the base for carrying on their fishing operations. Now, it appears to me that if an American fisherman can come into port and claims that, by casualty, he has lost his outfit, he may purchase a new outfit, as the sixth section says. I think that the word "outfit" of a fishing vessel includes bait as a part of it.

[Mr. Davies, Prince Edward Island, April 17.]

The honorable gentleman says that my mouth is closed because I told the house that I did not intend to move any resolution against the treaty, but that it ought to be accepted. I did say the treaty ought to be accepted, and I said that with the full knowledge, as the honorable gentleman repeats my words, that we could not alter a line of it. Why did I say so? The honorable gentleman knows well that in that very speech to which he refers I pointed out the concessions which, in my opinion, Canada had made—concessions which, if the opinions of the honorable gentleman and his colleagues, the honorable minister of justice and the honorable the minister of marine and fisheries, were correct, would be fatal to the interests of Canada.

But I said this, that if the honorable gentleman's statement was correct; if the relations between Canada and the United States had become strained to the extent he said they had; if we were brought face to face with a condition of facts not far removed from war; if, to use Mr. Bayard's language, we had "entered upon a career of embittered rivalry staining our long frontier with the hues of hostility;" if, to use the honorable gentleman's own language, we had cemented 65,000,000 people and their entire press in bitter hostility to the people of Canada—I said then, as I do now, that such being the case, any settlement which was not absolutely dishonorable should be accepted in order that we might get out of the humiliating and dangerous position to which the policy of the government had brought us.

[Mr. Mitchell, April 17.]

Whatever other gentlemen may do, they can answer for themselves; whatever motives may have influenced them, that is their business; for myself I want it placed on record that the reasons why I do not oppose this treaty are not that we have got the rights we are entitled to get under the treaty of 1818, rights which were clearly recognized for many years in the correspondence and dispatches between the Governments of England and the United States, but it is because I see in it a prospect of peace and more cordial relations with our neighbors.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent (and that certainly is not in the least inconsistent with anything which has been agreed to) that the Senate at the conclusion of the reading of the Journal on Monday go into open executive session on the fisheries treaty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to so far modify the order previously made that on Monday at the conclusion of the reading of the Journal the Senate will proceed in open executive session to the consideration of the fisheries treaty. Is there objection?

Mr. CALL. I wish to say that I shall not interpose any objection to the understanding proposed, but I ask that it be so modified as to allow me the opportunity of having a joint resolution, which I have introduced and which the Committee on Epidemic Diseases, I understand, will report, to be acted upon by the Senate on Monday morning. The joint resolution relates to the prevalence of yellow fever in the State of Florida and the necessary means of suppressing it. Its consideration is regarded by the people there, as well as by the Surgeon-General and by medical officers in charge of the sanitation there, as very important to have immediate action. I therefore ask the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Alabama to so modify the agreement upon this subject as to allow such portion of the time as may be necessary on Monday morning to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. I am bound to notify the Senators from Alabama and Maine and other Senators that the consideration of the joint resolution referred to by the Senator from Florida will consume some time when it is taken up.

Mr. CALL. I appeal to those Senators in a matter of humanity and public necessity that the joint resolution shall have whatever time may be necessary.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that we rescind the order by which the Senate agreed to adjourn over until Monday, and that we meet here to-morrow at 12 o'clock. ["No!" "No!"] We shall have no votes. I do not care if no Senator is here but myself.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the Senator from Florida will not interpose. I know from what I have heard Senators say that there will be a good deal of debate on the joint resolution to which he refers.

Mr. CALL. But when a terrible epidemic is threatening a whole people and a multitude of human lives, in the opinion of the public authorities, are in danger, my first duty is to insist upon such action as I may be able to obtain.

Mr. HOAR. If we make the arrangement proposed, to take up the treaty at the time specified on Monday, I think the Senator from Florida will find that after the completion of the speech of the Senator from Alabama on Monday afternoon the Senate will be ready to take up the joint resolution.

Mr. CALL. In the presence of an epidemic which is banishing a whole people from their homes and scattering them through the country, and such an appalling thing as an epidemic of yellow fever, would the Senator hesitate to let the treaty be displaced for even a day if necessary? Its consideration, surely, has nothing of the urgency that the prevention of this epidemic has.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, the Senate has already agreed to take up the treaty on Monday at 1 o'clock, so that there will be only two hours on Monday before that time. It is not a question of the terrible nature of the epidemic, but whether the Senate is likely to consider favorably the particular measure of relief which the Senator from Florida proposes. I understand that there is a great deal of difference of opinion about that in the Senate. I propose myself to do in regard to the matter what the representatives of the afflicted region desire, if they agree.

Mr. CALL. I rely entirely upon the Senator from Massachusetts to do so, as he always does, but it is my duty by whatever means in my power to obtain if possible the consideration of the measure at the earliest opportunity. I have here a number of dispatches from the leading citizens and authorities there urging its immediate consideration. Here is a petition from the people of Tampa, another portion of Florida which is threatened with the epidemic, urging with very great earnestness the immediate consideration and passage of the joint resolution. I may further say that within a few days, if action is taken, the epidemic may be arrested. Time is a matter of the greatest importance, and if there were present here this evening a sufficient number of Senators to act upon it I should ask that it be considered now. But some friends of the measure are away.

Mr. FRYE. If the Senator will allow me, of course after the action of the Senate the Senator from Florida could not call up his proposition to-morrow, because there will be no quorum of the Senators here, and if there is a contest a quorum will be required; but he could call it up the first thing on Monday morning, provided the time was not occupied by the treaty.

I do not see any better way to dispose of this matter than to reconsider the vote by which we agreed to adjourn over to-morrow, and let the Senator from Alabama and those of us who desire come here to-morrow at 12 o'clock and the Senator from Alabama can then finish his speech. There would be no vote on anything to-morrow. There can not be any possible objection to that. I hope that the vote to adjourn over will be reconsidered, and that the Senator from Alabama will finish his speech to-morrow. That will give the Senator from Florida a chance on Monday morning with his joint resolution, and will give the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] an opportunity to speak on the treaty on Monday.

Mr. GEORGE. Is that agreeable to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. MORGAN. It is. I make that motion.

Mr. EVARTS. That would hardly be considered, it seems to me, quite fair to Senators who may have left the Chamber supposing that the resolution had been adopted to adjourn until Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Alabama to move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate agreed to adjourn from to-day until Monday?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama moves to reconsider the vote by which the Senate agreed that when it adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next. [Putting the question.] By the sound the Chair is unable to decide.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the Chair will decide without a count.

Mr. FRYE. I hope Senators will allow this to be done.

Mr. HOAR. It is merely to come here to-morrow and hear the speech of the Senator from Alabama. No business will be done.

A division being called for, there were on a division—ayes 16, noes 2.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A quorum has not voted.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senate will indulge me I shall go on. I can speak from now until midnight.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me——

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir; I shall not allow anything. I am going to speak right on until I get through my speech.

Mr. CALL. Will not the Senator consent to continue the debate until Tuesday at 2 o'clock?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir; we can not get that. That is against the convenience of half a dozen gentlemen, some of whom are under great pressure to go away. That has all been considered, and I shall merely occupy the time of the Senate until I get through.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to try it once more, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. MORGAN. No; I do not ask any Senator to come here to hear me make a speech. I did not propose to speak to the Senate. I want my speech to go in the RECORD, and Senators need not read it; I want the country to read it.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Alabama will allow me, I wish to ask if the Chair will entertain a motion that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would suggest that the absence of a quorum having been disclosed, business is not in order.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Chair entertain a request for consent?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can not entertain a request for consent while no quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. PLATT. Is a motion to adjourn until to-morrow at 11 o'clock in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in order.

Mr. TELLER. Let us have the roll-call then.

Mr. MORGAN. I prefer to retain the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can not recognize the Senator from Alabama for that purpose, the absence of a quorum having been disclosed.

Mr. MORGAN. The business which has intervened was not in order; it was really all done by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But the duty of the Chair is plain under the rule. The recent vote discloses the want of a quorum, and there is nothing left for the Chair to do except to order a call of the roll. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bate,	Daniel,	Hoar,	Pasco,
Berry,	Dawes,	Ingalls,	Platt,
Blair,	Dolph,	Jones of Arkansas,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	Evarts,	Jones of Nevada,	Spooner,
Call,	Frye,	Manderson,	Stewart,
Cockrell,	George,	Mitchell,	Teller,
Coke,	Gray,	Morgan,	Walthall.
Colquitt,	Harris,	Paddock,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty-one Senators have responded to their names—not a quorum.

Mr. COKE (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore What is the further pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. DOLPH. Some Senators have just come in.

Mr. HARRIS. I move a call of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll of Senators. Several Senators have come in since the last roll-call.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allison,	Blair,	Cockrell,	Daniel,
Bate,	Brown,	Coke,	Dawes,
Berry,	Call,	Colquitt,	Dolph,

Evarts,	Hoar,	Morgan,	Spooner,
Frye,	Ingalls,	Paddock,	Stewart,
George,	Jones of Arkansas,	Pasco,	Teller,
Gray,	Jones of Nevada,	Platt,	Walthall.
Harris,	Manderson,	Saulsbury,
Hiscock,	Mitchell,	Sawyer,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty-four Senators have answered to their names—not a quorum. What is the further pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. EVARTS. Something has been said in regard to——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would remind Senators that debate is not in order.

Mr. EVARTS. Not by unanimous consent?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No unanimous consent can be given by less than a quorum of the Senate.

Mr. EVARTS. Then I do not see that I can contribute anything to solve the situation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. STEWART. Let us have a call of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest that it has been the universal practice of the Senate, when a call of the Senate was going on in the absence of a quorum, to permit, by unanimous consent, Senators to make suggestions which relate to the particular condition of affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will have the rule read—the third clause of Rule V.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

RULE V.

* * * * * * *

3. Whenever upon such roll-call it shall be ascertained that a quorum is not present, a majority of the Senators present may direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to request, and, when necessary, to compel the attendance of the absent Senators, which order shall be determined without debate; and pending its execution, and until a quorum shall be present, no debate nor motion, except to adjourn, shall be in order.

Mr. HOAR. My suggestion is that it is the universal custom—I do not speak of the time pending the execution of an order—when the want of a quorum has been disclosed, to permit by unanimous consent Senators to make suggestions with a view of extricating the Senate. I never knew the Chair to interpose such an objection before in the twelve years I have served here.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request absent Senators to attend.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada moves that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the noes have it.

Mr. STEWART. I call for a division.

The motion was agreed to, there being on a division—ayes 18, noes 8.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms is directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Did a quorum vote on the motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Less than a quorum can direct the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. CALL. If there is anything that I can do by agreeing to the proposition of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] so as to avoid this difficulty, I will consent to withdraw any objection I made, that there may be unanimous consent to proceeding on Monday as the Senator from Alabama desired.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is too late now.

After a pause—

Mr. HARRIS. Pending the execution of the order of the Senate, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, there being on a division ayes 18, noes 10; and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, August 20, 1888, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, August 17, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ANTHONY L. WOODSON.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 8962) for the relief of Anthony L. Woodson, with amendments of the Senate thereto.

On motion of Mr. FINLEY, the House non-concurred in the Senate amendments and agreed to a conference.

ASSOCIATE JUSTICES SUPREME COURT, DAKOTA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 1497) to provide for two additional associate justices of the supreme court of Dakota, and for other purposes.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, a House bill for the same purpose having already passed, I move that this bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. BLANCHARD, for one week, on account of sickness.

To Mr. CUMMINGS, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. SAWYER, for this day, on account of sickness.

To Mr. ATKINSON, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. WASHINGTON, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. ENLOE, an extension of his leave, on account of sickness.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. KILGORE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 5863) authorizing the Richmond and Danville Railroad Company to lay tracks, etc., in the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. 5155) granting a pension to John S. Bryant;

A bill (H. R. 2190) granting a pension to Jane Smallridge;

A bill (H. R. 5156) for the relief of Andrew R. G. Smith;

A bill (H. R. 9263) granting a pension to Abraham J. Buckles;

A bill (H. R. 9363) granting a pension to Edwin J. Godfrey;

A bill (H. R. 9830) for the relief of Lachlan H. McIntosh; and

A bill (S. 94) for the relief of Perez Dickinson, surviving partner of the late firm of Cowan & Dickinson.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FORNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the Senate amendments to the bill known as the sundry civil appropriation bill. My object is to ask the House to agree to the report of the Committee on Appropriations, and to request a conference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY]?

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, I think there ought to be some explanation by the gentleman as to the substantial amendments which have been made, with a view to determining whether or not some of them ought not to be debated in the House. As I understand, the question of the Congressional Library is involved, and also the question of establishing a park out upon Rock Creek, which may require an expenditure of two or three millions of dollars; and if that be so, I certainly think there ought to be an opportunity for debate.

Mr. FORNEY. In reply to that I have to say that the report of the committee has been printed in the RECORD for ten days, and it shows that the committee recommend non-concurrence in the amendments to which the gentleman alludes. Hereafter if the House authorizes the committee of conference to concur in those amendments, the subjects can then be debated.

Mr. ADAMS. What is the object of the proposition of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY]? This bill, with the Senate amendments, is now on the Calendar, and can be called up at any time, I suppose. What is the purpose?

Mr. FORNEY. The object is simply to get a conference.

Mr. ADAMS. What is the object of getting a conference now instead of considering the amendments regularly?

Mr. FORNEY. To see to what extent the two Houses can agree; and where we disagree the House can hereafter direct the conferees to insist on disagreement or to concur. That is a matter to come up hereafter.

Mr. DINGLEY. The separate items pass out of the control of the House the moment it goes into a conference.

Mr. FORNEY. No, sir; they are always in the hands of the House.

Mr. DINGLEY. We know how that matter is by our own experience.

Mr. PAYSON. I object to the proposition of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY].

Mr. CANNON. I hope my colleague [Mr. PAYSON] will allow me a word before he objects. The Committee on Appropriations has recommended non-concurrence in these amendments, suspecting that many of them are proper enough. But the Senate placed on the bill many amendments in respect to which no estimates had been submitted to the House, and in regard to which, on account of the lateness of the session, the documents which might give information have not been communicated to us. In such cases it was almost impossible for the Committee on Appropriations to investigate the questions fully. Hence the committee, not being itself properly advised, thought it wise to recommend non-concurrence, in the hope that the Senate would be enabled to give in a conference such information touching the new affirmative matter inserted in the bill as would be satisfactory to the House conferees and enable them to make a satisfactory report to the House. As to the two amendments in reference to which my colleague [Mr. PAYSON] has particularly inquired, the sense of the House committee was that on their merits they ought to be non-concurred in; but I will say to my colleague I have no doubt that before those amendments are disposed of, and after all information that can be given by the Senate conferees has been given, those two amendments will be reported to the House for discussion upon the merits and for its instruction one way or the other.

But there are a great many amendments, some of them unimportant, but which collectively would take very considerable time for their consideration by the House in detail, and I think without much profit; whereas later on, upon a report from the conference committee, the material questions can be brought to the attention of the House. Hence my own opinion, as one member of the Committee on Appropriations, was, and still is, that the proposed action, especially in consideration of the stage of the session, is wise.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the gentleman desire the House to understand that before any agreement on the part of the conferees of the two Houses shall take place it is expected and is probable that the House will have an opportunity to pass on the amendments relating to the zoological garden and the public Library?

Mr. CANNON. I was not a member of the subcommittee that had charge of this bill; but from my understanding in the committee I certainly expect it. Here are two gentlemen present who have been members of the subcommittee and who can speak for themselves.

Mr. BLOUNT. I thought the gentleman was on the subcommittee.

Mr. RYAN. I will answer the question of the gentleman from Georgia, so far as I feel authorized to do so; I will answer at least for myself. I think, so far as those two important amendments are concerned, there is not likely to be and will not be any final action by the conferees without submitting the questions to the consideration of the House, though I do think it important there should be a conference upon those subjects before there is action by the House.

Mr. ADAMS. Will the gentleman state why?

Mr. RYAN. For the simple reason——

Mr. PAYSON. If there can be a distinct understanding that before final action on those questions there shall be opportunity to debate them in the House, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. ADAMS. Well, I object.

Mr. RYAN. I will answer the inquiry made a moment ago by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS]. One of the propositions is a measure for which there was no estimate whatever. It originated in the Senate; and doubtless the Senate has valuable information upon the subject which the conferees would be able to bring before the House and present for its consideration.

Mr. ADAMS. How long have the Senate amendments been on the Calendar?

Mr. FORNEY. About ten days.

Mr. RYAN. So far as concerns the proposition with reference to the Library, even if that be finally concurred in, as perhaps it ought not to be, I presume it would not be done without first submitting the proposition again to the House. So far as I am concerned, I think that would be the better course. It is at best somewhat crude in its form; and I have no doubt that in conference it would be unanimously agreed that certain amendments at least ought to be made. Hence, it would be unwise, in my judgment, to concur in it now in its present form. But in any event, my own idea about those two amendments is that before any final conclusion should be arrived at by the conferees the consideration of them ought to be brought before the House.

Mr. FORNEY. I will state to the gentleman that I agree with my colleague on the committee; and if the Senate does not recede, of course the House should have the opportunity of passing upon the propositions.

Mr. PAYSON. I withdraw my objection with that understanding, on the statement made by the gentleman from Alabama.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman's colleague has renewed the objection.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I understand that will also be withdrawn under the circumstances.

Mr. ADAMS. I do not insist.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would like to have it understood that the amendment numbered 118 of the Senate, in which concurrence is recommended, be also non-concurred in, as I desire to submit some remarks to the House on that question.

Mr. FORNEY. I am satisfied that that is right.

The SPEAKER. The question is first whether the report shall be taken up or not.

If there be no objection, the committee will be discharged, and the question is on agreeing to the report as amended by the gentleman from Indiana, to non-concur in the amendment of the Senate numbered 118.

Mr. FORNEY. I hope that will be done.

Mr. PAYSON. What is the amendment?

Mr. HOLMAN. It is in regard to the depredations on public timber lands.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. All right.

The report as amended by Mr. HOLMAN was adopted, and a conference asked on the disagreeing votes thereon.

Mr. FORNEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SYMES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up for present consideration the bill H. R. 1264——

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, in pursuance of a pledge I made to the House last evening I am compelled to demand the regular order. I move that the House dispense with private business for to-day.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 77, noes 15.

Mr. LYMAN. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. LYMAN and Mr. BURNES were appointed tellers.

Before the division began,

Mr. LYMAN said: I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. BOWDEN. I renew it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOWDEN] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] as tellers.

Mr. BOWDEN. At the request of gentlemen around me I will not insist upon the demand.

So (no further count being demanded) the motion to dispense with private business was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Private business having been dispensed with, except by unanimous consent, public business will proceed to-day as on other days, and there is an hour for the consideration of bills called up by committees.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask by unanimous consent to dispense with the morning hour for the reports of committees.

Mr. JACKSON. With the understanding that reports may be filed?

Mr. BURNES. I hope there will be no objection to that.

Mr. JACKSON. With that understanding I shall not object.

Mr. SPRINGER. I make the request that gentlemen having reports to make from committees be permitted to file them at the Clerk's desk.

There was no objection.

FILING OF REPORTS.

The following reports were filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

MRS. R. S. HORTON.

Mr. HUNTER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 8) to restore Mrs. R. S. Horton to the pension-rolls; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM BURTON.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 11143) for the relief of William Burton; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

A. W. HARPER.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 11144) for the relief of A. W. Harper; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES P. CHASE.

Mr. LAFFOON, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 9925) for the relief of James P. Chase; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

GIRLS' REFORM SCHOOL, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. ATKINSON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10873) making an appropriation for the Girls' Reform School of the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BUSINESS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON INVALID PENSIONS.

The SPEAKER. The call of committees having been dispensed with, the hour for the consideration of bills begins at 12 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m. The call rests with the Committee on Invalid Pensions. The question is on the demand of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL] for the previous question on agreeing to the resolution as proposed to be amended.

Mr. BLAND. Is not this private bill day?

The SPEAKER. The House, by a vote, having dispensed with private business, public business is in order as on other days. The Chair will cause the rule to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Paragraph 3 of clause 7 of Rule XXIV:

On Friday of each week, after the morning hour, it shall be in order to entertain a motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar, and if this motion fail, then public business shall be in order as on other days.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will also read the first clause of Rule XXVI.

The Clerk read as follows:

Friday in every week shall be set apart for the consideration of private business, unless otherwise determined by the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the demand for the previous question; and upon this the yeas and nays have been ordered. A vote was taken and no quorum appeared. The Clerk will proceed to call the roll.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I ask that the resolution be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That it is hereby ordered by the House that Wednesday, May 2, and Thursday, May 3, immediately after the hour for the consideration of bills by committees, be set apart for the consideration of bills and measures reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions in such order as may be designated by said committee, but not to interfere with revenue bills, appropriation bills, or prior orders; and if displaced by these or by any cause the same days on each subsequent week shall be substituted for those herein named until two days, or so much thereof as shall be necessary, are devoted to the consideration of measures reported by said committee.

The amendment proposed by Mr. MORRILL was read, as follows:

Strike out "May 2" and "May 3" and insert "August 29" and "August 30."

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Kansas on the Invalid Pensions Committee is not present, but I have sent for him to the committee-room. I do not know what his wishes are in this regard, and I do not feel authorized to ask unanimous consent in his absence.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, I understood that this resolution would not come up on Friday, this day being set apart for private business?

The SPEAKER. Private business has been dispensed with for to-day.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I ask that the roll-call proceed.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 119, nays 5, not voting 200; as follows:

No quorum voted.

During the roll-call,

Mr. WILLIAMS said: I am paired with Mr. STONE, of Missouri, but have voted for the purpose of making a quorum.

Mr. MCKENNA. I am paired with Mr. THOMPSON, my colleague, and it was understood between us that I should vote on this question; and if he were present, he would also vote "ay."

Mr. RICE. I am paired with Mr. T. H. B. BROWNE, of Virginia; but being satisfied that he would vote in the affirmative, I have accordingly voted in the affirmative.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I am paired with Mr. HOWARD, of Indiana, but I understand that he would vote in the affirmative, so I have felt at liberty to vote.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. I was detained and was not in my seat when the roll was called, but I would like to vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows of no rule under which the request of the gentleman can be granted.

Mr. PERKINS. I am paired with the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. WHITTHORNE. I do not know how he would vote on this question, but I have taken the responsibility of voting for the purpose of making a quorum.

Mr. PAYSON. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the names be dispensed with.

Mr. CRISP. I object.

The following were announced as being paired on all political questions until further notice:

Mr. MCCLAMMY with Mr. WOODBURN.

Mr. WADE: No excuse offered.
Mr. WASHINGTON: No excuse offered.
Mr. WEST: No excuse offered.
Mr. WHITE, of New York: No excuse offered.
Mr. WHITING, of Massachusetts: No excuse offered.
Mr. WICKHAM: No excuse offered.
Mr. WILBER: No excuse offered.
Mr. WILKINS: No excuse offered.
Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia: No excuse offered.
Mr. WOODBURN: No excuse offered.
Mr. YARDLEY: No excuse offered.
Mr. YODER: No excuse offered.
Mr. YOST: No excuse offered.

The SPEAKER. Upon this call 174 gentlemen have answered to their names.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to ask the number of minutes remaining of the hour for the consideration of bills.

The SPEAKER. There are eight minutes remaining.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER. The House is operating under a call of the House, and no business can be transacted until that is completed or dispensed with.

Mr. PAYSON. I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The question was put; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CRISP. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 68, noes 5, and so further proceedings under the call of the House were dispensed with.

Mr. DOCKERY. To avoid a further call of the roll which may disclose the lack of a quorum, and thus prevent a pension session to-night, I ask unanimous consent that the hour be considered as having expired.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not know what course I shall pursue until I know how many minutes remain of the hour.

The SPEAKER. It will expire in six minutes, the hour beginning at 25 minutes past 12. Is there objection to considering the hour as having expired?

Mr. LYMAN. I object.

Mr. CRISP. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division the ayes were 25, noes 51.

Mr. CRISP. I ask for tellers.

The question was taken on the ordering of tellers.

The SPEAKER. Thirty-five members have risen on this question, a sufficient number, and tellers are ordered. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN.]

The tellers reported—ayes 10, noes 59.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The hour for the consideration of bills has expired.

Mr. PAYSON. I ask unanimous consent that this order of business be continued until the resolution offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL] shall be considered.

Mr. WEAVER. I hope that will be done.

Mr. DUNN. Regular order.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10234) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 751) for the relief of the estate of J. J. Pulliam, deceased, in which concurrence was requested.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK, PORTLAND, OREGON.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a report from a committee of conference.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill of the House 1761, entitled "A bill for the relief of the First National Bank of Portland, Oregon, for money advanced the Oregon Iron Works, the contractor, in building the United States revenue-cutter Thomas Corwin," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and, with the following amendment, agree to the same:

Insert after the word "iron," in line 15, page 2, of the Senate amendment, the following:

"To Coffin & Hendry, of San Francisco, the sum of $1,575 for furnishing sails and rigging."

All of which is respectfully submitted.

W. P. TAULBEE,
B. HERMANN,
THOMAS L. THOMPSON,
Managers on the part of the House.
JOHN H. MITCHELL,
WM. M. STEWART,
E. K. WILSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The conferees on the part of the House submitted the following statement:

The undersigned managers on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill H. R. 1761 respectfully submit the following:

The effect of the Senate amendment is to include certain small claims of laborers who performed work on the United States revenue-cutter, and also a claim for sails and rigging, which were omitted from the Senate amendment. That all may stand on an equality it was found just that a reduction of 50 per cent. be made from the original claims.

It is the opinion of the managers that the claims are just and should be agreed to.

W. P. TAULBEE.
BINGER HERMANN.
THOS. L. THOMPSON.

The question was taken on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference; and there were—ayes 58, noes 2.

Mr. LYMAN. No quorum.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the report.

Mr. HERMANN. I do not think anybody will object to this report.

Mr. TAULBEE. The point is made that no quorum has voted.

A MEMBER. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will withdraw the point.

Mr. LYMAN. I will not withdraw it.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the request for leave to withdraw the report I ask that the report and statement as read be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. They will go into the RECORD.

FORT HALL RESERVATION.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire to present a privileged report from a committee of conference.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8662) to accept and ratify an agreement made with the Shoshone and Bannack Indians for the surrender and relinquishment to the United States of a portion of the Fort Hall reservation, in the Territory of Idaho, for the purposes of a town site, and for the grant of a right of way through said reservation to the Utah and Northern Railway Company, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2 and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Add to said amendment the following:

"Provided, That all lands acquired by said railway company near its station at Pocatello, for its use for station grounds, depot buildings, shops, tracks, side-tracks, turn-outs, yards, and for water purposes, as hereinbefore provided, shall, whenever used by said railway company, or its assigns, for other purposes, be forfeited and revert to the United States and be subject to the other provisions of this act."

Also insert, after the word "provided," in line 8, page 9 of the bill, the word "further."

And the Senate agree to the same.

S. W. PEEL,
JOHN M. ALLEN,
B. W. PERKINS,
Managers on the part of the House.

H. L. DAWES,
O. H. PLATT,
JAMES K. JONES,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. There does not seem to be a statement accompanying this report.

Mr. PERKINS. There is no statement.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman state what the bill provides as to the compensation that is to be paid by the railroad company for these lands?

Mr. PERKINS. The railroad company is required to pay to the Indians $8 an acre for their lands, and in addition to that is required to pay the appraised value, the same as is to be paid for the lands which under the provisions of the bill are opened to settlers. That is the Senate amendment. The amendment was prepared by the Interior Department, and is recommended by that Department; but we do not agree to it except with the qualification that in the event the railroad company shall cease to use the land for railroad purposes, then it shall revert to the Government of the United States, and shall be subject to the other provisions of the bill which open the land to settlers at its appraised value.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope the gentleman will make a statement of the object that is to be accomplished by the amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. The Senate amendment, as I have suggested, proposed to give the railroad company the right to purchase an additional 150 acres of land for railroad purposes. That amendment was recommended by the Interior Department and was put upon the bill at the recommendation of the Department. The House conferees consented to the amendment, with the qualification I have stated, namely, that if the railroad company should cease to use the land for railroad purposes—if they should attempt to speculate with it or to use it for any other than legitimate railroad purposes—then it is to revert to the United States and become subject to the other provisions of this bill, which are that these lands shall be opened to settlers for town-site purposes, lots to be sold to actual settlers at their appraised value.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is in the House bill.

Mr. PERKINS. That is in the House bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is not a matter of disagreement between the two Houses.

Mr. PERKINS. There is no difference between the two Houses in regard to that.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. PERKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ANTHONY L. WOODSON.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint as managers of the conference on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 8962) for the relief of Anthony L. Woodson, the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. STOCKDALE, the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. STONE, and the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. BROWER.

GEORGETOWN BRIDGE, DOCK, ELEVATOR, AND RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. COMPTON. I desire to submit a conference report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2252) to incorporate the Georgetown Barge, Dock, Elevator, and Railway Company, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House and agree to the same.

BARNES COMPTON,
JOHN T. HEARD,
Managers on the part of the House.

H. H. RIDDLEBERGER,
ISHAM G. HARRIS,
C. B. FARWELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The following statement of the House conferees, submitted under the rule, was read:

The managers on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Senate bill 2252, to incorporate the Georgetown Barge, Dock, Elevator, and Railway Company, respectfully submit the following statement:

The Senate receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the House, and thus the bill is left exactly as it passed the House.

The question being taken on agreeing to the conference report there were—ayes 43, no 1.

Mr. LYMAN. No quorum.

Mr. COMPTON. I ask leave to withdraw the report.

There being no objection, the report was withdrawn.

IMPORTATION OF ENGLISH STEAM-SHIP FOR DREDGING PURPOSES.

Mr. DUNN. I desire to make a privileged report. I am directed by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries to report the two resolutions which I send to the desk, and recommend their passage.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, August 6, 1888.

Mr. BUCHANAN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries:

"Whereas it appears by a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to the collector of customs at the port of New York, dated June 2 instant, that the said Secretary is in receipt of a letter from the Secretary of War in which, upon recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, he requests that Joseph Cumings, who has a contract under the War Department to deliver 800,000 cubic yards of material from the main ship-channel in New York Harbor, may be permitted to import through our ports without payment of duty thereon and use for the purpose of fulfilling this contract a large foreign vessel adapted to the necessary powerful machinery; and

"Whereas upon receipt of said letter from the Secretary of War the said Secretary of the Treasury instructed the said collector as follows: 'Under the circumstances you are authorized to comply with the request of the Secretary of War;' and it is alleged that under the said instructions the steam-ship State of Alabama, built at Glasgow in 1873, has been so entered and is being fitted up at Erie Basin, in the city of Brooklyn, N.Y., with machinery owned by an English syndicate, for such work: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to this House copies of said recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, of his said letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, and of all correspondence on file in his Department relating to said matter."

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Amend by adding the words: "Together with his reasons for such action."

Mr. DUNN. I ask that the amendment be agreed to; and on agreeing to the amendment and adopting the resolution I call the previous question.

The SPEAKER (having put the question on ordering the previous question) said: The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. LYMAN. Division.

The question being again taken; there were—ayes 43, noes 3.

Mr. LYMAN. No quorum.

Mr. DUNN. I ask leave to withdraw both reports.

The SPEAKER. The reports will be withdrawn, if there be no objection.

Mr. FARQUHAR. As a member of the committee which has reported this resolution, I wish to say to the House that the object of the resolution is simply to obtain information which must be had before we can proceed any further in this matter.

Mr. DUNN. I withdraw the report.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I hope the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN] will withdraw any objection to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. COX. Who was it objected?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN] has made the point that no quorum voted; and the report is withdrawn.

Mr. COX. The original resolution came from that side of the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. BURNES. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills. Pending that motion I ask unanimous consent to make an explanation not exceeding one minute in duration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to make a statement not to exceed one minute.

Mr. LYMAN. I object.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I would like to ask my colleague on the committee [Mr. BURNES] whether the general discussion in Committee of the Whole with reference to the French spoliation claims has not been completed.

Mr. BURNES. No, sir.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. How much time for that discussion remains?

Mr. BURNES. The general discussion on that subject will take about two hours more.

Mr. SPRINGER. A little more than that—one hour and thirty-six minutes on one side, and forty-seven minutes on the other.

Mr. BURNES. Two hours and about twenty minutes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills.

Mr. LYMAN. Division.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 93, noes none.

Mr. LYMAN. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa raises the point that no quorum has voted. The Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES].

Mr. BURNES. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOCKERY. I will make a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to know whether, if this roll-call should not show the presence of a quorum, the parliamentary effect would not be to destroy the pension session for this evening?

The SPEAKER. The Chair can only answer that inquiry by saying that when the record of the House discloses the fact that no quorum is present, no other business can be done during the same legislative day until a quorum appears.

Mr. DOCKERY. Then there could be no business transacted at the pension session to-night.

Mr. PAYSON. It is very evident to this side of the House that we can get no pension legislation.

Mr. BURNES. I desire to present a parliamentary inquiry. I understand that the reason——

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BURNES. I am presenting an inquiry—a statement upon which I desire the opinion of the Chair. As I understand, the reason we have no quorum is that a great many gentlemen on the one side and the other are restrained from voting because of being paired with gentlemen who are absent. If it be a proper inquiry, I would like the Chair to decide whether, upon a question with reference to a general appropriation bill, there being no politics involved, it is improper or unlawful to disregard such pairs for the purpose of making a quorum.

The SPEAKER. That is a question which each gentleman must decide for himself according to the circumstances existing at the time.

Mr. CANNON. I would be glad, Mr. Speaker, to have the Clerk read the usual pair between members.

The SPEAKER. That is in the nature of debate, but it can be done by consent. In some cases the pair is on all political questions, in others on all questions, and in some there are stipulations, how many the Chair does not know, that members shall have the right to vote when necessary to make a quorum. The Chair is advised this clause is contained in all of the pairs.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is my understanding.

The question recurred on Mr. BURNES's motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of general appropriation bills.

The question was taken, and there was no quorum; there being—yeas 158, nays none, not voting 166; as follows:

During the roll-call,

Mr. SOWDEN stated he was paired with Mr. STRUBLE, but a quorum not having voted he would record his vote in the affirmative.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas, moved that the reading of the names be dispensed with.

Objection was made.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. LANDES with Mr. NICHOLS, on all political questions, until further notice.

Mr. CUMMINGS with Mr. FELTON, for to-day.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BURNES. How many members have answered to their names?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. One hundred and fifty-eight, which is not a quorum.

Mr. BURNES. Then I move that there be a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. One hundred and sixty-two members have answered to their names, which, with the occupant of the chair, constitutes a quorum of the House.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the motion would not now be in order, as the House is now operating under a call of the House.

Mr. PAYSON. I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURNES. I now move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 80, noes 16.

Mr. LYMAN. No quorum.

Mr. BURNES. I beg leave to withdraw the motion.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be withdrawn.

Mr. BURNES. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider general appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. That is the pending motion, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 151, nays none, not voting 173; as follows:

No quorum voted.

Mr. WEAVER. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the recapitulation of the names.

There was no objection.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DOCKERY in the chair). No quorum has voted.

Mr. BURNES. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 58, noes 48.

Mr. JACKSON, Mr. LYMAN, and others demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 31 members (more than one-fifth of the last vote) supporting the demand.

Mr. DINGLEY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to ask if the House should now adjourn, if that would not vacate the evening session set apart for the consideration of pension bills?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would.

Mr. ROGERS. Of course it would; that question has been already answered several times to-day.

Mr. PAYSON. Would it be in order to ask unanimous consent to take a recess?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would not, as the record shows the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BURNES. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURNES. I wish to ask if it is not a fact, under the parliamentary law, the record having disclosed the want of a quorum on the last vote, that the evening session for pension bills is necessarily dispensed with? In other words, can there be any business whatever transacted unless the record discloses the fact that a quorum is present?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. When the record discloses the fact that no quorum has voted it is the duty of the Chair to take notice of the same, and no business can be transacted in the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BURNES. Then there is no use remaining in session longer this evening, and I insist on the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered——

Mr. MATSON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered, with a view to moving a call of the House, so that a quorum may be obtained in order to proceed with the evening session for pension bills.

Mr. CANNON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON. Is it not true that if a call of the House is ordered, and pending the call further proceedings under it are stopped, that then it will be in order to move to take a recess until 8 o'clock with a view that pension matters may be taken up as usual?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the Chair will call attention to the fact that the record of the last vote shows, on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri, only 151 members have voted, less than a quorum.

Mr. CANNON. Very true; but when there is a call of the House, and during the call of the House further proceedings are dispensed with, of course that obliterates the former record.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the call of the House reveals the presence of a quorum, any character of business can be transacted which would be in order under the rules; but until the record shows there is a quorum present there can be no business transacted except such as is necessary to secure the attendance of a quorum or to adjourn.

Mr. MATSON. I withdraw the motion to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered, as I understand that by the rising vote on the motion to adjourn, if the motion to reconsider the yeas and nays be adopted, the House would stand adjourned. I hope the motion to adjourn will be voted down.

Mr. ROGERS. Can the gentleman withdraw his motion to reconsider, except by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. He can.

Mr. MACDONALD. Allow me to suggest to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] that he withdraw his motion to adjourn and move that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock, with a view to proceed with the usual order for the consideration of pension bills on Friday evening.

Mr. BURNES. But the roll-call having disclosed the fact that no quorum is present, no motion is in order but a call of the House or to adjourn.

Mr. HOOKER. I beg to suggest to the gentleman from Missouri that if he would go on and execute the order of the House we could ascertain the fact whether there is a quorum in the city, and I think there is a quorum here.

Mr. ROGERS. It has been ascertained.

Mr. BURNES. I have no doubt there is a quorum in the city.

Mr. HOOKER. But you have not ordered the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring in the absentees.

Mr. ROGERS. It would do no good, because so many are paired, and would not vote, that if present we would not still have a quorum on a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. WEAVER. I simply wish to remark that it is now apparent that the House made a great mistake on yesterday when it refused to revoke the leaves of absence.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered having been withdrawn, the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri that the House do now adjourn, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 49, nays 90, not voting 185; as follows:

So the House refused to adjourn.

During the roll-call,

Mr. RICHARDSON said: I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the names.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, with Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana, for the remainder of to-day.

Mr. TOWNSHEND with Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois, until Monday next.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. MATSON. I move a call of the House.

The question was put; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. DOCKERY) announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MATSON. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 53, noes 42.

So a call of the House was ordered.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

A division was demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 68, noes 40.

Mr. JACKSON. I demand the yeas and nays.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays; and

The SPEAKER pro tempore said: Twenty-one gentlemen have risen, not a sufficient number. The ayes are 68, noes 40; and the motion to adjourn is agreed to.

Accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below:

By Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts: A bill (H. R. 11192) granting a pension to Emeline Carman—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BLAND: A bill (H. R. 11193) for the relief of Mrs. Rebecca Gaddy—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11194) for the relief of Sovereign Popplewell—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. J. E. CAMPBELL: A bill (H. R. 11195) granting a pension to Clarence McLefresh—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. COMPTON: A bill (H. R. 11196) to incorporate the Columbia Central Railway Company—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11197) to remove the political disabilities of Henry A. Ramsey—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. FINLEY: A bill (H. R. 11198) for the relief of Michael Lawler—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11199) for the relief of S. S. Farris—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. GROUT: A bill (H. R. 11200) granting a pension to Mary B. Peck—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MACDONALD: A bill (H. R. 11201) for the relief of William L. Rosecrans—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. STOCKDALE: A bill (H. R. 11202) for the relief of Henry M. Gastrell—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. THOMAS WILSON: A bill (H. R. 11203) granting a pension to Dorcus C. Fenton—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BLAND: Petition of citizens of Dent County, Missouri, for amendment to the interstate-commerce law—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. DUBOIS: Petition of Thomas Kennelly and 9 others, citizens of Idaho Territory, for amendments to the interstate-commerce law—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. FINLEY: Petition of William O. Murrell, for a pension—to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, petition of George W. Garner, of H. W. McCorkle for Spicy E. Huff, of James Doolin, and of T. T. Bradshaw, administrator of Seth Bradshaw, of Kentucky, for reference of their claims to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. JACKSON: Papers in the case of John Allen and of Thomas Waltz, of Pennsylvania—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MAISH: Petition of Joseph K. Null, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PETERS: Petition of A. A. Majors and others, of Fowler, Kans., for the passage of the service-pension bill—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. STONE, of Kentucky: Petition of Edmund T. Riggs, of Ballard, Ky., for reference of his claim to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

The following petitions for the repeal or modification of the internal-revenue tax of $25 levied on druggists were received and severally referred to the Committee on Ways and Means:

By Mr. CARUTH: Of druggists of Georgetown, Ky.

By Mr. FINLEY: Of druggists and physicians of Kentucky.

The following petition, indorsing the per diem rated service-pension bill, based on the principle of paying all soldiers, sailors, and marines of the late war a monthly pension of 1 cent a day for each day they were in the service, was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

By Mr. TRACEY: Of citizens of Cohoes, N. Y.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, August 18, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

J. J. PULLIAM.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 751) for the relief of the estate of J. J. Pulliam, deceased.

Mr. GLASS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of that bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to re-examine and settle the claim of the estate of J. J. Pulliam, deceased, late of Fayette County, State of Tennessee, for wood taken by the United States forces during the late war from 125 acres of land located near the village of La Grange, in said State; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum that may be found due said estate: Provided, That the amount shall not exceed $4,167.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the report be read.

The SPEAKER. This is a Senate bill.

Mr. GLASS. The House committee have adopted the report of the Senate committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. STONE, of Kentucky) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10949) for the relief of the estate of J. J. Pulliam, deceased, have considered the same, and report as follows:

The committee find the facts in this case fully and accurately stated in Senate report from the Committee on Claims of the present Congress, which report is hereto annexed and made a part of this report.

Your committee adopt the said report as their own, and report back the bill and recommend its passage.

SENATE REPORT.

This bill has been three times favorably reported by the Senate Committee on Claims and has passed the Senate twice—in the Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth Congresses.

The facts of the claim are stated in the report which was made by this committee in the Forty-ninth Congress, as follows:

"The original claim of Mr. Pulliam against the United States Government belonged to that class which, by the act of June 16, 1874, the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to report at the commencement of each session of Congress to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who should lay the same before Congress for consideration.

"On the 10th day of January, 1882, the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with the act referred to, transmitted to the Speaker of the House of Representatives lists of 1,359 claims, of which Mr. Pulliam's claim was one. By the act of May 1, 1882, all these claims were allowed.

"The committee, in its report on the bill for the allowance of these claims, make the following statement about Mr. Pulliam's claim:

"'John J. Pulliam, of Fayette County, Tennessee, is allowed in this bill the sum of $1,223. We are satisfied that Mr. Pulliam ought to have been awarded a larger sum by the accounting officers of the Treasury, but your committee do not feel justified in delaying the passage of this bill by amending it, even for the purpose of doing justice to Mr. Pulliam.

"'If Mr. Pulliam hereafter makes a claim for the balance equitably due him, and such claim is referred to your committee, as we now understand the matter, we will favor the payment to him of some additional amount.'

"Mr. Pulliam's claim is for quartermaster's stores actually furnished to the Army of the United States."

The bill now pending for the relief of his estate provides simply for a re-examination of this claim by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury and for payment to his representatives of the amount found to be due. We think that this course is due the claimant. Not only the Senate Committee on Claims, as is shown by the extract from their report in the Forty-seventh Congress, quoted above, were of the opinion that Mr. Pulliam had not been fully paid, but also the Second Comptroller of the Treasury has recorded his opinion to the same effect. The claim was presented to him in 1881, and his conclusion is given as follows:

"If this case was free from the question whether the accounting officers can lawfully exceed the recommendation of the Quartermaster-General, I should be disposed to allow a much larger amount, but I am not prepared to depart from what has been the usage on that point, and I accordingly affirm the balance certified by the honorable Third Auditor.

"W. W. UPTON, Comptroller."

We therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be again read. I think it was not distinctly understood.

The bill was again read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GLASS] that this bill be now considered?

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to make a suggestion to the gentleman. The averment in the bill is that there was a mistake as to the amount that should have been reported in favor of the estate. The facts before the House so far do not establish that with sufficient clearness to justify the statement in those positive terms. I suggest, therefore, to the gentleman having the bill in charge that he consent to amend the bill by inserting the words "as is alleged," so as to avoid making the positive statement. I suggest also that the bill be amended by striking out the name of "the Secretary of the Treasury," where it occurs in the bill, and substituting "the Quartermaster-General," who is the proper officer, under the act of 1864, to adjust these claims.

There is no objection to directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the amount that is reported to be due by the Quartermaster-General.

Mr. JACKSON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] whether he is familiar with the facts of this case.

Mr. HOLMAN. Somewhat.

Mr. JACKSON. At what time was this wood taken—before the war or during the war?

Mr. HOLMAN. During the war. This is a claim under the act of 1864 called the Fourth of July act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection, provided those two amendments are made.

Mr. GLASS. I accept the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GLASS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill as amended was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The bill H. R. 10949 for the same purpose was laid on the table.

JAMES MILLINGER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 602) for the relief of James Millinger; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. WEBER, for ten days from August 2, on account of important business.

To Mr. MCCULLOGH, indefinitely, on account of private business.

To Mr. PENINGTON, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. SAWYER, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. ELLIOTT, until Tuesday next.

To Mr. BAKER, of New York, an extension of leave for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. COGSWELL, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. RICE, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. MAISH, for this day, on account of business.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

By unanimous consent, Mr. SAYERS obtained leave to revise and extend in the RECORD his remarks on the fortifications bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate further insisted upon its amendments nonconcurred in by the House to the bill (H. R. 10540) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, disagreed to the amendment of the House to the amendment numbered 19 of the Senate, and agreed to the conference requested, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. ALLISON, Mr. HALE, and Mr. BECK.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. 3447) amendatory of an act relating to postal crimes, and amendatory of the statutes therein mentioned, approved June 18, 1888, and for other purposes, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATON BILL.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the sundry civil appropriation bill, Mr. FORNEY, Mr. BURNES, and Mr. RYAN.

INVESTIGATION OF GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON, by unanimous consent, an order was made to print the usual number of copies of the testimony taken by the Select Committee to Investigate the Affairs of the Government Printing Office.

PUBLIC BUILDING, PUEBLO, COLO.

Mr. SYMES. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 105) to provide for the erection of a public building at Pueblo, Colo., and that the bill be put upon its passage. A House bill for the same purpose has been reported favorably by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The Senate passed the bill appropriating $175,000. The House committee report a bill appropriating $100,000, and I ask unanimous consent that the House bill be laid on the table and the Senate bill be amended so as to make the amount $100,000, and that the bill so amended be now considered.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I must object to the consideration of any such bill at this time.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I demand the regular order.

Mr. SYMES. Will the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] withhold his objection while I make a brief statement about the bill?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. The gentleman has made a statement, and no statement can alter the facts I have in view.

Mr. SYMES. I have not made a statement regarding the merits of the bill.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Well, Mr. Speaker, there are doubtless many good bills which gentlemen would like to get through here, but we have already passed at this session a two years' quota of public-building bills.

Mr. DIBBLE. I would like the gentleman to explain to the House what he calls a "two-years quota."

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Bills which have already passed and become laws under a recent computation amounted to nearly $4,000,000; nearly $2,000,000 had passed the House and was pending before the Senate. There was also pending over $2,000,000 of Senate increases. This makes over $8,000,000 of bills passed into law and in position to become law. The appropriations for the last Congress were hardly more than this, amounting to, say, $9,000,000.

Mr. DIBBLE. There have not become law bills amounting to that much, and that amount is not up to the quota of the two years' work of any Congress of late years.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Speaker, is it not in order to submit a conference report?

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. TAULBEE. I did not demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understood.

Mr. BLAND. I demand the regular order.

Mr. SYMES. I believe I am allowed to make one short statement in regard to this bill.

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded by several gentlemen.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK, PORTLAND, OREGON.

The following conference report, sent to the desk by Mr. TAULBEE, was read:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill of the House 1761, entitled "A bill for the relief of the First National Bank of Portland, Oregon, for money advanced the Oregon Iron Works, the contractor in building the United States revenue-cutter Thomas Corwin," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and, with the following amendment, agree to the same:

Insert, after the word "iron," in line 15, page 2 of the Senate amendment, the following:

"To Coffin & Hendry, of San Francisco, the sum of $1,575 for furnishing sails and rigging."

All of which is respectfully submitted.

W. P. TAULBEE,
B. HERMANN,
THOMAS L. THOMPSON,
Managers on the part of the House.
JOHN H. MITCHELL,
WM. M. STEWART,
E. K. WILSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The statement accompanying this report was read yesterday and is in the RECORD. The question is on agreeing to the report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. TAULBEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FILING OF REPORTS.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that leave be given to file reports with the Clerk during to-day for appropriate reference.

There being no objection, the leave requested was given.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to make a brief personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to permitting the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] to make a brief personal explanation? The Chair hears none.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I notice in the Washington Post of this morning a statement that on yesterday I resorted to "filibustering tactics" to prevent the consideration of general pension legislation. I did ask unanimous consent (there being only eight minutes of the hour remaining) that the hour be considered as having expired; but my purpose was, as appears by the RECORD, to avoid a call of the roll, which call I apprehended would disclose the lack of a quorum and prevent the pension session last night. The result of that roll-call failed to show the presence of a quorum and my fears were fully realized. The statement to which I have referred is therefore an error (unintentional no doubt) and without any foundation whatever in fact.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. MCCREARY. Mr. Speaker, Senate bill No. 3304 was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs on the 10th instant with authority to report the bill at any time for consideration. I now report back favorably with an amendment, and for immediate consideration, the bill (S. 3304) to prohibit the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is the reading of the bill at length demanded? It was read when previously before the House.

Mr. MORROW. This is the bill which I asked to have considered a few days ago.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair has stated, the bill has heretofore been read; and unless the reading be now demanded it will not be read again.

The bill is as follows:

A bill (S. 3304) to prohibit the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the date of the exchange of ratifications of the pending treaty between the United States of America and His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of China, signed on the 12th day of March, A. D. 1888, it shall be unlawful for any Chinese person, whether a subject of China or of any other power, to enter the United States, except as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. That Chinese officials, teachers, students, merchants, or travelers for pleasure or curiosity, shall be permitted to enter the United States, but in order to entitle themselves to do so they shall first obtain the permission of the Chinese Government, or other government of which they may at the time be citizens or subjects. Such permission and also their personal identity shall in such case be evidenced by a certificate to be made out by the diplomatic representative of the United States in the country, or of the consular representative of the United States at the port or place from which the person named therein comes. The certificate shall contain a full description of such person, of his age, height, and general physical features, and shall state his former and present occupation or profession and place of residence, and shall be made out in duplicate. One copy shall be delivered open to the person named and described, and the other copy shall be sealed up and delivered by the diplomatic or consular officer as aforesaid to the captain of the vessel on which the person named in the certificate sets sail for the United States, together with the sealed certificate, which shall be addressed to the collector of customs at the port where such person is to land. There shall be delivered to the aforesaid captain a letter from the consular officer addressed to the collector of customs aforesaid, and stating that said consular officer has on a certain day delivered to the said captain a certificate of the right of the person named therein to enter the United States as a Chinese official, or other exempted person, as the case may be. And any captain who lands or attempts to land a Chinese person in the United States, without having in his possession a sealed certificate, as required in this section, shall be liable to the penalties prescribed in section 9 of this act.

SEC. 3. That the provisions of this act shall apply to all persons of the Chinese race, whether subjects of China or other foreign power, excepting Chinese diplomatic or consular officers and their attendants; and the words "Chinese laborers," wherever used in this act, shall be construed to mean both skilled and unskilled laborers and Chinese employed in mining.

SEC. 4. That the master of any vessel arriving in the United States from any foreign port or place with any Chinese passengers on board shall, when he delivers his manifest of cargo, and if there be no cargo, when he makes legal entry of his vessel, and before landing or permitting to land any Chinese person (unless a diplomatic or consular officer, or attendant of such officer), deliver to the collector of customs of the district in which the vessel shall have arrived the sealed certificates and letters as aforesaid, and a separate list of all Chinese persons taken on board of his vessel at any foreign port or place, and of all such persons on board at the time of arrival as aforesaid. Such list shall show the names of such persons and other particulars as shown by their open certificates, or other evidences required by this act, and such list shall be sworn to by the master in the manner required by law in relation to the manifest of the cargo.

The master of any vessel as aforesaid shall not permit any Chinese diplomatic or consular officer or attendant of such officer to land without having first been informed by the collector of customs of the official character of such officer or attendant. Any refusal or willful neglect of the master of any vessel to comply with the provisions of this section shall incur the same penalties and forfeitures as are provided for a refusal or neglect to report and deliver a manifest of the cargo.

SEC. 5. That from and after the passage of this act no Chinese laborer in the United States shall be permitted, after having left, to return thereto, except under the conditions stated in the following sections.

SEC. 6. That no Chinese laborer within the purview of the preceding section shall be permitted to return to the United States unless he has a lawful wife, child, or parent in the United States, or property therein of the value of $1,000, or debts of like amount due him and pending settlement. The marriage to such wife must have taken place at least a year prior to the application of the laborer for a permit to return to the United States, and must have been followed by the continuous cohabitation of the parties as man and wife.

If the right to return be claimed on the ground of property or of debts, it must appear that the property is bona fide and not colorably acquired for the purpose of evading this act, or that the debts are unascertained and unsettled, and not promissory notes or other similar acknowledgments of ascertained liability.

SEC. 7. That a Chinese person claiming the right to be permitted to leave the United States and return thereto on any of the grounds stated in the foregoing section, shall apply to the collector of customs of the district from which he wishes to depart at least a month prior to the time of his departure, and shall make on oath before the said collector a full statement descriptive of his family, or property, or debts, as the case may be, and shall furnish to said collector such proofs of the facts entitling him to return as shall be required by the rules and regulations prescribed from time to time by the Secretary of the Treasury, and for any false swearing in relation thereto he shall incur the penalties of perjury. He shall also permit the collector to take a full description of his person, which description the collector shall retain and mark with a number. And if the collector, after hearing the proofs and investigating all the circumstances of the case, shall decide to issue a certificate of return, he shall at such time and place as he may designate, sign and give to the person applying a certificate containing the number of the description last aforesaid, which shall be the sole evidence given to such person of his right to return. If the last named certificate be transferred, it shall become void, and the person to whom it was given shall forfeit his right to return to the United States. The right to return under the said certificate shall be limited to one year; but it may be extended for an additional period, not to exceed a year, in cases where, by reason of sickness or other cause of disability beyond his control, the holder thereof shall be rendered unable sooner to return, which facts shall be fully reported to and investigated by the consular representative of the United States at the port or place from which such laborer departs for the United States, and certified by such representative of the United States to the satisfaction of the collector of customs at the port where such Chinese person shall seek to land in the United States, such certificate to be delivered by said representative to the master of the vessel on which he departs for the United States. And no Chinese laborer shall be permitted to re-enter the United States without producing to the proper officer of the customs at the port of such entry the return certificate herein required. A Chinese laborer possessing a certificate under this section shall be admitted to the United States only at the port from which he departed therefrom, and no Chinese person, except Chinese diplomatic or consular officers, and their attendants, shall be permitted to enter the United States except at the ports of San Francisco, Portland, Oregon, Boston, New York, New Orleans, Port Townsend, or such other ports as may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall be, and he hereby is, authorized and empowered to make and prescribe, and from time to time to change and amend such rules and regulations, not in conflict with this act, as he may deem necessary and proper to conveniently secure to such Chinese persons as are provided for in Articles II and III of the said treaty between the United States and the Empire of China, the rights therein mentioned, and such as shall also protect the United States against the coming and transit of persons not entitled to the benefit of the provisions of said articles. And he is hereby further authorized and empowered to prescribe the form and substance of certificates to be issued to Chinese laborers under and in pursuance of the provisions of said articles, and prescribe the form of the record of such certificate and of the proceedings for issuing the same, and he may require the deposit, as a part of such record, of the photograph of the party to whom any such certificate shall be issued.

SEC. 9. That the master of any vessel who shall knowingly bring within the United States on such vessel, and land, or attempt to land, or permit to be landed any Chinese laborer or other Chinese person, in contravention of the provisions of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof, shall be punished with a fine of not les than $500 nor more than $1,000, in the discretion of the court, for every Chinese laborer or other Chinese person so brought, and may also be imprisoned for a term of not less than one year nor more than five years, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 10. That the foregoing section shall not apply to the case of any master whose vessel shall come within the jurisdiction of the United States in distress or under stress of weather, or touching at any port of the United States on its voyage to any foreign port or place. But Chinese laborers or persons on such vessel shall not be permitted to land, except in case of necessity, and must depart with the vessel on leaving port.

SEC. 11. That any person who shall knowingly and falsely alter or substitute any name for the name written in any certificate herein required, or forge such certificate, or knowingly utter any forged or fraudulent certificate, or falsely personate any person named in any such certificate, and any person other than the one to whom a certificate was issued who shall falsely present any such certificate, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $1,000, and imprisoned in a penitentiary for a term of not more than five years.

SEC. 12. That before any Chinese passengers are landed from any such vessel, the collector, or his deputy, shall proceed to examine such passengers, comparing the certificates with the list and with the passengers; and no passenger shall be allowed to land in the United States from such vessel in violation of law; and the collector shall in person decide all questions in dispute with regard to the right of any Chinese passenger to enter the United States, and his decision shall be subject to review by the Secretary of the Treasury, and not otherwise.

SEC. 13. That any Chinese person, or person of Chinese descent, found unlawfully in the United States, or its Territories, may be arrested upon a warrant issued upon a complaint, under oath, filed by any party on behalf of the United States, by any justice, judge, or commissioner of any United States court, returnable before any justice, judge, or commissioner of a United States court, or before any United States court, and when convicted, upon a hearing, and found and adjudged to be one not lawfully entitled to be or remain in the United States, such person shall be removed from the United States to the country whence he came. But any such Chinese person convicted before a commissioner of a United States court may, within ten days from such conviction, appeal to the judge of the district court for the district. A certified copy of the judgment shall be the process upon which said removal shall be made, and it may be executed by the marshal of the district, or any officer having authority of a marshal under the provisions of this section. And in all such cases the person who brought or aided in bringing such person into the United States shall be liable to the Government of the United States for all necessary expenses incurred in such investigation and removal; and all peace officers of the several States and Territories of the United States are hereby invested with the same authority in reference to carrying out the provisions of this act, as a marshal or deputy marshal of the United States, and shall be entitled to like compensation, to be audited and paid by the same officers.

SEC. 14. That the preceding sections shall not apply to Chinese diplomatic or consular officers or their attendants, who shall be admitted to the United States under special instructions of the Treasury Department, without production of other evidence than that of personal identity.

SEC. 15. That the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese,' approved May 6, 1882," approved July 5, 1884, is hereby repealed.

Passed the Senate August 8, 1888.

Attest: ANSON G. McCOOK, Secretary.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs was read, as follows:

Strike out section 15 and insert:

"That the act entitled 'An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese,' approved May 6, 1882, and an act to amend said act, approved July 5, 1884, are hereby repealed, to take effect upon the ratification of the pending treaty, as provided in section 1 of this act."

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Speaker, the President of the United States on the 16th of March, 1888, transmitted to the Senate of the United States for constitutional approval a convention or treaty, signed and concluded in the city of Washington on the 12th of March, 1888, under his direction, between the United States and China, to prohibit Chinese laborers from coming into this country for a period of twenty years, and providing further that if six months before the expiration of said period of twenty years neither government shall formally have given notice of the termination of the treaty to the other, it shall remain in full force for another like period of twenty years. Hon. Thomas F. Bayard, Secretary of State, acted as plenipotentiary of the President of the United States, and Chang Yen Hoon, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, acted as plenipotentiary of the Emperor of China.

The provisions of the treaty preclude the return of Chinese laborers who are not now in this country, and forbid the coming into the United States of Chinese laborers from any quarter whatsoever; but from this inhibition are excepted any Chinese laborer who has a lawful wife, child, or parent in the United States or property therein of the value of $1,000, or debts of like amount due him and pending settlement. And Chinese officials, teachers, students, merchants, or travelers for pleasure or curiosity are permitted to enter the United States, but in order to entitle them to do so they are required to first obtain the permission of the Chinese Government, evidenced by certificates duly made out by the diplomatic representative of the United States in the country, or of the consular representative of the United States at the place from which the person named therein comes. On the 7th of May, 1888, the Senate ratified the treaty with two amendments, as follows:

To Article I:

And the prohibition [of Chinese laborers] shall extend to the return of Chinese laborers who are not now in the United States, whether holding return certificates under existing laws or not.

To Article II:

And no such Chinese laborer shall be permitted to enter the United States by land or sea without producing to the proper officer of the customs the return certificates herein required.

These not very important amendments have delayed the ratification of the treaty for several months. The Chinese minister is now in Peru, and it will not probably take effect until the latter part of the present year, as the treaty with the Senate amendments must be resubmitted to the Chinese Government for approval. If the Senate had ratified the treaty without amendments, then as soon as we pass the pending bill, which came to the House of Representatives about one week ago, and it is approved by the President, Chinese laborers would be absolutely prohibited from coming to the United States.

The Chinese Government may refuse to accede to the changes in the treaty proposed by the Senate. If this occurs, the whole negotiation will fail; but as it is probable the amendments will be agreed to, in view of the public interest taken in the question of Chinese immigration, and the necessity for legislation to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty as soon as it is properly approved and ratified, the pending bill and amendment should pass without delay.

The object of the bill is to give effect to the treaty when the ratifications are exchanged, and it presents questions which are worthy of the most careful consideration and the most deliberate discussion.

In order to understand and appreciate the great demand for the treaty and for the bill it is proper that I should briefly refer to the treaties heretofore made between the United States and China, and also to bills passed by Congress to give effect to those treaties.

The treaty of amity and commerce between the United States and China which existed in 1869 was supplemented by another treaty ratified in that year, and commonly known as the Burlingame treaty. By Article V of this treaty the right was conferred upon all Chinese subjects to emigrate to the United States either for purposes of curiosity or trade or for permanent residence.

Article VI conferred a similar right upon citizens of the United States in respect to Chinese territory at such places only where foreigners were permitted to reside.

The practical effect of this treaty was soon found to be pernicious and injurious to the States and Territories of the United States bordering on the Pacific Ocean.

While very few Americans desired to become permanent residents of China, vast hordes of ignorant and immoral Chinese were brought into the United States and thrown into competition with American labor.

Earnest appeals for relief were made by the citizens of the Pacific States and Territories, and Congress in 1877 appointed a joint committee, consisting of three Senators and three members of the House of Representatives, to visit the Pacific coast and investigate the subject. The committee made a full and fair investigation and an exhaustive report, and the following paragraph indicates the views of the committee:

Many of the people of the Pacific coast believe that this influx of the Chinese is a standing menace to republican institutions upon the Pacific and the existence there of Christian civilization. From all the facts they have gathered for and against the Chinese, the committee believe that this opinion is well founded. They believe that free institutions founded upon free schools and intelligence can only be maintained where based upon intelligent and adequately paid labor. Adequate wages are needed to give self-respect to the laborer and the means of education to his children. Family life is a great safeguard to our political institutions.

Chinese immigration involves sordid wages, no public schools, and the absence of a family. This problem is too important to be treated with indifference. Congress should solve it, having due regard to any rights already accrued under existing treaties, and to humanity. But it must be solved in the judgment of the committee, unless our Pacific possessions are to be ultimately given over to a race alien in all its tendencies which will make it practically provinces of China rather than States of the Union. The committee recommend that measures be taken by the Executive, looking toward a modification of the existing treaty with China, confining it strictly to commercial purposes, and that Congress legislate to restrain the great influx of Asiatics to this country.

It is not believed that these measures will be looked upon with disfavor by the Chinese Government. Whether it is so or not, a duty is owing to the Pacific States and Territories which are suffering under a terrible scourge and are patiently waiting for relief from Congress.

The injurious effects of Chinese immigration became so burdensome and produced so much indignation that in 1879 the Forty-fifth Congress attempted to correct the wrong. A bill was passed by both Houses providing that no vessel entering any port of the United States should thereafter land more than fifteen Chinese passengers on any one trip, and the bill also directed the President to abrogate Articles V and VI of the Burlingame treaty conferring mutual rights of permanent residence on Chinese and Americans. This bill was vetoed by President Hayes March 20, 1879. Steps were then immediately taken to effect a modification of our treaty obligations, and on the 27th of November, 1880, commissioners of the United States negotiated at Pekin a new treaty with the Chinese Government, the first article of which provided:

Whenever, in the case of the Government of the United States, the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States or their residence therein affects or threatens to affect the interest of that country or to endanger the good order of the said country or of any locality within the territory thereof, the Government of China agrees that the Government of the United States may regulate, limit, or suspend such coming or residence, but may not absolutely prohibit it. The limitation or suspension shall be reasonable and shall apply only to Chinese who may come to the United States as laborers, other classes not being included within the limitations.

The Forty-seventh Congress passed an act to give effect to this treaty, containing a provision absolutely prohibiting Chinese immigration for a term of twenty years. President Arthur vetoed this bill April 4, 1882. Congress thereupon passed another bill which became a law May 6, 1882, suspending the immigration of Chinese laborers for a term of ten years, but providing that return certificates should be issued to laborers who were in the United States at the time of the ratification of the treaty of 1880 or who should arrive in the United States within ninety days of the passage of the act. This law was amended July 5, 1884, by adding additional restrictions, but notwithstanding their attempt to make it effective it was found that the flood of Chinese immigration continued to increase, a very large portion of the influx being ascribable to the fraudulent use of return certificates. Legislation was attempted by the Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth Congresses, but without success.

The Senate bill now under consideration is substantially the same as House bill No. 10605, which was unanimously reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs on the 23d of June last, but inasmuch as the final exchange of ratifications of the treaty must necessarily be delayed for some months on account of amendments made to the treaty by the Senate, the Committee on Foreign Affairs believed that the passage of the bill in the shape in which it came from the Senate repealing the restriction act of 1882 from and after the approval of the bill might throw open our ports to unrestricted Chinese immigration for probably several months or until there shall have been time for the exchange of ratifications of the amended treaty, and they therefore presented the amendment which has been reported giving effect to the repealing clause from and after the exchange of ratifications instead of from and after approval of the act.

Mr. Speaker, I have thus given a brief history of the treaties between the United States and China and the laws enacted to carry them into effect. This I have done not only for a proper understanding of the bill, but also to show the earnest efforts that have been made to reach the position taken in the treaty sent by the President to the Senate on the 16th of March, 1888.

In my opinion too much credit can not be given to President Cleveland and his able Secretary, Hon. Thomas F. Bayard, for their success in negotiating a treaty far in advance of any ever negotiated between the United States and China, and which, I think, will furnish an effective remedy for the evils of Chinese immigration so long complained of.

Mr. BLOUNT. What is there in this bill to prevent the immigration of Chinese to this country that will make it more effectual than the previous legislation we have had on that subject?

Mr. McCREARY. The gentleman was not in when I read extracts from the Burlingame treaty and also extracts from the Pekin treaty of 1880. The treaty recently negotiated goes further than any previous treaty made with China. It absolutely prohibits the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States, and the bill under consideration provides all proper means for carrying the treaty into effect when ratified.

Mr. BLOUNT. I propose to go as far in this matter as the gentleman from Kentucky. My only object now is to ascertain whether this bill meets all the difficulties of the situation.

Mr. McCREARY. We think it does. The bill has been carefully considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate and carefully considered by the House Committee on Foreign Affairs. We think the bill is prepared in accordance with the treaty, and that it is a step very much in advance of any action which has been taken heretofore. We believe it will prohibit the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States.

Mr. HERBERT. Will the gentleman explain the penalties and safeguards this bill carries?

Mr. McCREARY. The bill provides that the master of any vessel arriving in the United States from any foreign port or place with any Chinese passengers on board shall, when he delivers his manifest of cargo or makes legal entry of his vessel, and before landing or permitting to land any Chinese person (other than a diplomatic or consular officer or attendant of such officer), deliver to the collector of customs of the district in which the vessel shall have arrived the certificates and letters identifying Chinese persons, together with a list of all such persons taken on board of his vessel, and such list shall be sworn to by the master of the vessel.

The master of any vessel who shall knowingly bring within the United States on such vessel, and land, or attempt to land, or permit to be landed, any Chinese laborer or other Chinese person, in contravention of the provisions of the bill, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished with a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $1,000, in the discretion of the court, for every Chinese laborer or other Chinese person so brought, and may also be imprisoned for a term of not less than one year nor more than five years, in the discretion of the court.

The bill further provides that any Chinese person or persons of Chinese descent found unlawfully in the United States or its Territories may be arrested upon a warrant issued upon a complaint under oath filed by any party, on behalf of the United States, by any justice, judge, or commissioner of any United States court, returnable before any justice, judge, or commissioner of a United States court, and when convicted, upon a hearing, and found and adjudged to be one not lawfully entitled to be or remain in the United States, such person shall be removed from the United States to the country whence he came.

These are some of the important provisions of the bill. I think if the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] will examine the bill he will be satisfied with it.

Mr. Speaker, a demand comes from the States and Territories on the Pacific coast asking for legislation on the Chinese question which must be heeded. A cry of distress comes to us from millions of people of our own race which should be responded to promptly.

In the language of another, they have said to us—

That everything which men hold dear, their traditions, their liberties, their sympathies, social habits, and political rights, are all in jeopardy unless a check shall be put to the incoming and terrible wave of an approaching Mongolian overflow of everything like Christian or American civilization in the States of the Pacific Slope.

The history of the world does not show an illustration of greater unanimity of feeling on the part of a people expressing their wishes and desires than was shown by an election held in California under an act of the Legislature wherein the question as to whether Chinese immigration was beneficial or otherwise was submitted to the vote of the people. The vote showed this significant result—for Chinese immigration, 883; against Chinese emigration, 154,638. Less than one-half of 1 per cent. of the voters of that population expressed their wish for non-interference with Chinese immigration, and over 99½ per cent. testified to their hatred and abhorrence of it.

I am in favor of opening our ports to the worthy of every land and of giving them a cordial welcome to a country, which is the freest and best in the world; but the Chinese have not proved themselves worthy to enjoy the blessings and benefits of our country. They do not appreciate our institutions nor our laws, and they only come here for temporary purposes, and they do not desire to become a part of our civilization.

We therefore have to choose between the civilization of the United States and the civilization of China—between the social, political, and religious institutions of the United States and the customs, manners, and heathenism of the Chinese. Their habits, interest, customs, manners, aspirations, and system of labor are totally different from ours. I believe that "labor should be honorable and honored, and not degraded by being compelled to compete with this debased and servile race."

In the struggle between Chinese labor and free white labor the latter is at a heavy disadvantage. The cooly brings neither wife nor family with him; therefore he can underbid the American laborer. He comes here for the sole purpose of accumulating money, and it is said that the conflict of the two races in California has so far only been a question of "the survival of the cheapest, and not a survival of the fittest."

The permanent prosperity of a country depends upon fair dealing and a proper regard for the interests of those who labor. A just distribution of the wealth of labor among the producers of it is an axiom which all should appreciate and uphold. The appeal of the representative assembly of trades and labor unions of the Pacific coast fitly and appropriately express the situation in California. They say:

It has been calculated that the number of Chinese in California is about 150,000, or nearly 20 per cent. greater than is the number of mail whites capable of bearing arms.

Although forming one-sixth of the total population of California, they pay less than one four-hundredth part of the revenue required for the State government. They send nearly $8,000,000 home annually to China from the Pacific coast. They underbid our white men in the labor market, purchase little or no American products and manufactures, live squalidly, crowded together, constantly engendering disease. Unlike white emigrants, they do not come to make homes with us and help build up the country; they come without wives and children.

They do not and can not assimilate with the Caucasian race, they continue their heathenish religion and customs, evade our laws, especially internal revenue, whenever possible; use the State and Federal laws frequently to carry out sentences which have been awarded by their own secret tribunals, and also keep Chinese women in a state of bondage and prostitution, these poor creatures being openly bought and sold among them; have secret tribunals of their own for trying and punishing those who dare to rebel against the arbitrary authority of the Chinese Government which under the name of benevolent associations virtually control nearly all the Chinese in the State.

The bill now under consideration, taken in connection with the sweeping concessions of the pending treaty, seems to apply a more effective remedy to the evils so long complained of than any bill ever presented to the Congress of the United States.

It receives the hearty indorsement of the Department of State and is in accordance with the provisions of the treaty.

Its prompt passage is earnestly desired by millions of our countrymen, and I hope the bill will pass with the amendment reported by the committee.

I append the message of the President and the treaty with my remarks.

To the Senate:

I have the honor to transmit herewith, and recommend for your constitutional approval, a convention signed and concluded in this city on the 12th instant, under my direction, between the United States and China for the exclusion hereafter of Chinese laborers from coming into this country.

This treaty is accompanied by a letter from the Secretary of State in recital of its provisions and explanatory of the reasons for its negotiation, and with it are transmitted sundry documents giving the history of events connected with the presence and treatment of Chinese subjects in the United States.

In view of the public interest which has for a long time been manifested in relation to the question of Chinese immigration, it would seem advisable that the full text of this treaty should be made public, and I respectfully recommend that an order to that effect be made by your honorable body.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, March 16, 1888.

TREATY OF MARCH 12, 1888.

Whereas on the 17th day of November, A. D. 1880, a treaty was concluded between the United States and China for the purpose of regulating, limiting, or suspending the coming of Chinese laborers to and their residence in the United States; and

Whereas the Government of China, in view of the antagonism and much deprecated and serious disorders to which the presence of Chinese laborers has given rise in certain parts of the United States, desires to prohibit the emigration of such laborers from China to the United States; and

Whereas the Government of the United States and the Government of China desire to co-operate in prohibiting such emigration, and to strengthen in other ways the bonds of friendship between the two countries;

Now, therefore, the President of the United States has appointed Thomas F. Bayard, Secretary of State of the United States, as his plenipotentiary; and His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of China has appointed Chang Yen Hoon, minister of the third rank of the imperial court, civil president of the board of imperial cavalry, and envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, as his plenipotentiary; and the said plenipotentiaries, having exhibited their respective full powers found to be in due and good form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

The high contracting parties agree that for a period of twenty years, beginning with the date of the exchange of the ratifications of this convention, the coming, except under the conditions hereinafter specified, of Chinese laborers to the United States shall be absolutely prohibited; and this prohibition shall extend to the return of Chinese laborers who are not now in the United States, whether holding return certificates under existing laws or not.

ARTICLE II.

The preceding article shall not apply to the return to the United States of any Chinese laborer who has a lawful wife, child, or parent in the United States or property therein of the value of $1,000, or debts of like amount due him and pending settlement. Nevertheless, every such Chinese laborer shall, before leaving the United States, deposit, as a condition of his return, with the collector of customs of the district from which he departs, a full description in writing of his family, or property, or debts, as aforesaid, and shall be furnished by said collector with such certificate of his right to return under this treaty as the laws of the United States may now or hereafter prescribe and not inconsistent with the provisions of this treaty; and should the written description aforesaid be proved to be false, the right of return thereunder, or of continued residence after return, shall in each case be forfeited. And such right of return to the United States shall be exercised within one year from the date of leaving the United States; but such right of return to the United States may be extended for an additional period, not to exceed one year, in cases where, by reason of sickness or other cause of disability beyond his control, such Chinese laborer shall be rendered unable sooner to return, which facts shall be fully reported to the Chinese consul at the port of departure, and by him certified, to the satisfaction of the collector of the port at which such Chinese subject shall land in the United States. And no such Chinese laborer shall be permitted to enter the United States by land or sea without producing to the proper officer of the customs the return certificate herein required.

ARTICLE III.

The provisions of this convention shall not affect the right at present enjoyed of Chinese subjects, being officials, teachers, students, merchants, or travelers for curiosity or pleasure, but not laborers, of coming to the United States and residing therein. To entitle such Chinese subjects as are above described to admission into the United States they may produce a certificate from their Government or the Government where they last resided, visaed by the diplomatic or consular representative of the United States in the country or port whence they depart.

It is also agreed that Chinese laborers shall continue to enjoy the privilege of transit across the territory of the United States in the course of their journey to or from other countries, subject to such regulations by the Government of the United States as may be necessary to prevent said privilege of transit from being abused.

ARTICLE IV.

In pursuance of Article III of the immigration treaty between the United States and China, signed at Peking on the 17th day of November, 1880, it is hereby understood and agreed that Chinese laborers, or Chinese of any other class, either permanently or temporarily residing in the United States, shall have for the protection of their persons and property all rights that are given by the laws of the United States to citizens of the most favored nation, excepting the right to become naturalized citizens. And the Government of the United States reaffirms its obligation, as stated in said Article III, to exert all its power to secure protection to the persons and property of all Chinese subjects in the United States.

ARTICLE V.

Whereas Chinese subjects, being in remote and unsettled regions of the United States, have been the victims of injuries in their persons and property at the hands of wicked and lawless men, which unexpected events the Chinese Government regrets, and for which it has claimed an indemnity the legal obligation of which the Government of the United States denies; and whereas the Government of the United States, humanely considering these injuries and bearing in mind the firm and ancient friendship between the United States and China, which the high contracting parties wish to cement, is desirous of alleviating the exceptional and deplorable sufferings and losses to which the aforesaid Chinese have been subjected; therefore, the United States, without reference to the question of liability therefor (which as a legal obligation it denies), agrees to pay, on or before the 1st day of March, 1889, the sum of $276,619.75 to the Chinese minister at this capital, who shall accept the same on behalf of his Government as full indemnity for all losses and injuries sustained by Chinese subjects as aforesaid, and shall distribute the said money among the said sufferers and their relatives.

ARTICLE VI.

This convention shall remain in force for a period of twenty years, beginning with the date of the exchange of ratifications; and if, six months before the expiration of the said period of twenty years, neither Government shall formally have given notice of its termination to the other it shall remain in full force for another like period of twenty years.

[Mr. MORROW withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, I presume there is not much difference of opinion in this House as to the propriety of adopting the bill which has been reported back by the Committee on Foreign Affairs. It is intended to be in aid of and in execution of the treaty which has been negotiated by the present Administration of the United States with the Government of China, and which has just been brought to a conclusion. I must be permitted to say, Mr. Speaker, that I regard it as extremely unfortunate for the interest of both governments after the amicable adjustment of the questions in dispute between the Government of the United States and the Government of China that the Senate of the United States should have made any amendment of that treaty which necessitated delay in its promulgation by the two respective governments who are parties to it.

I say that it is unfortunate that the Senate of the United States should have made any amendment to this treaty, inasmuch as they are in my judgment immaterial and unnecessary for the purpose of effecting the amicable object which seems to be of as much interest to one Government as to the other, and in which one Government is as earnest in its desire to execute as is the other. There should be no delays in giving relief to our people upon the Pacific coast against what they consider an evil. If there is any impediment to giving prompt, immediate, and instant relief against what they regard now as an unfortunate condition of affairs, it is to be attributed to these amendments which engender this debate. As the chairman of our committee presented the various treaties which we have made with China from time to time, beginning with the earliest treaty that that Government made with us and down to the present time, I need not go into detail, Mr. Speaker, in reference to them, but desire to address myself particularly to this treaty, and to this law which is intended simply to carry out the treaty.

The history of the two governments, Mr. Speaker, in regard to treaties between them is one in which whatever may be said about the civilization of the nineteenth century as demonstrative of the advance and progress of our Anglo-Saxon race, I say that in the spirit and temper of the two governments in regard to this treaty, the Government of the United States can claim nothing in advance of civilization over the Government with which we have been treating. The history of the matter may be briefly stated to be this. At the time that we sent the commissioners from the United States as envoys extraordinary to the Chinese Government—Mr. Burlinghame and Mr. Stanton—for the purpose of breaking down the Chinese wall, as it was termed, and inducing that Government to enter into a treaty of amity and commerce between the United States and China, it was looked upon almost as a hopeless effort to secure the various provisions which we desired to secure from the Chinese Government.

We were the parties seeking negotiations. We were the parties asking to have treaties of amity and commerce between the two countries. Ours was the Government asking that our commercial men should be allowed to carry to China whatever we had that the Chinese desired to buy, and bring back from China whatever our people wanted from that country. It was considered an almost hopeless task, and these two distinguished gentlemen were selected for the purpose of endeavoring to accomplish these results between China and the United States. And when that grand commission landed at San Francisco on their return, no two men in the United States ever received such an ovation as Mr. Burlingame and Mr. Stanton.

They were congratulated upon their accomplishment of the treaty which is designated in the history of the country as the Burlingame treaty. Not only on the slopes of the Pacific were they received with such demonstrations of regard, but they were taken from the cars at Pittsburgh and a great ovation given them; and that ovation continued all along their line of travel up to the capital. They were welcomed as having consummated a great treaty, and that treaty was ratified by the two Governments. It gave rise to the first large importation of Chinese into this country. Subsequently it was found that they came from a race of people who it was not desired should be mixed with the American population.

Mr. MORROW. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Burlingame treaty gave rise to the first importation of Chinese?

Mr. HOOKER. Oh, no; but the Burlingame treaty broke down the wall of partition between the two governments. But, as I was about to say when interrupted by the gentleman from California, after this treaty was ratified between the two governments we found that we were receiving a race of people that were not desirable or that we would not desire should come to this country. We found that they were not a people we would desire to amalgamate with our own people and become a part of ourselves. We found that they isolated themselves, were estranged from our American population, did not desire citizenship, and we did not desire that they should have citizenship. Hence it became necessary, Mr. Speaker, that we should modify the Burlingame treaty.

Mr. MCCREARY. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him, it was Article V of the Burlingame treaty which conferred the right upon all Chinese subjects to immigrate into the United States, either for purposes of curiosity, trade, or as permanent residents.

Mr. HOOKER. Undoubtedly so. And I will embody in my remarks the provisions of the Burlingame treaty upon that subject, and also some of the other treaties that we have made since, but I do not think it necessary to occupy the time of the House now in discussing them.

The first article of the treaty provides—

SECTION 1. Whenever, in the opinion of the Government of the United States, the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States, or their residence therein, affects or threatens to affect the interest of that country, or to endanger the good order of said country, or of any locality within the territory thereof, the Government of China agrees that the Government of the United States may regulate, limit, or suspend such coming or residence, but may not absolutely prohibit it.

Mr. Speaker, I was going on to give a history of the negotiations and treaties between the two countries in relation to this subject. Under the Burlingame treaty we found that we were receiving a large population that was not disposed to intermingle with our people, and hence we proposed amendments to the Burlingame treaty. The first amendment that we proposed was to exclude all Chinese criminals. The Government of China at once responded, "yes, we agree to that." We then proposed to prevent the coming of persons who were afflicted with disease, and that was assented to by China. Then the bill of 1882 was introduced and engineered through this House by a gentleman then representing one of the districts of California, Mr. Page, which bill proposed to prevent all Chinese from coming to this country.

There was a provision in the later treaty which we had made with China assenting to another amendment to the Burlingame treaty and another modification, namely, that the Government of the United States should have the power by law—not by treaty, but by law—to prohibit the immigration of Chinese for a reasonable period of time; that is, our Government should have the right by law to suspend the right of Chinese immigration. The Chinese Government agreed to that modification, and under the power thus conceded by China to exist in the legislative department of the Government of the United States the act of 1882 was introduced into Congress.

That act proposed to prevent the landing of all Chinese coolies or laborers in this country for a period of twenty years. I rose in my place in this House—for I was a member of the House then—and proposed an amendment to the bill introduced by the gentleman from California, Mr. Page. I stated that in my judgment the extension of the period to twenty years was a violation of the spirit of the treaty, and I proposed ten years instead of twenty. The gentleman who was engineering the bill through the House, Mr. Page, declined to accept that amendment.

I predicted in my place here that the then President of the United States, animated by a desire to maintain our treaty obligations, as he ought to have been whether he was the President of one party or the President of another party, would insist upon preserving the treaty and would veto the bill of the gentleman from California, even if it should pass. The gentleman declined to listen to my word of warning. He passed his bill through the House and through the Senate, and it went to the Executive Mansion and it was vetoed by the President. In the same session of Congress the very amendment which I had proposed was adopted by the gentleman from California, and the bill so amended passed both Houses and became a law.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I say that the Chinese Government has in all respects exhibited the most liberal spirit whenever we have proposed to prevent the immigration of its subjects to this country. There was a very memorable commission created in connection with this Chinese question a few years ago in the Senate of the United States, and at the head of it was the then leader of the Republican party in the Senate, Governor Morton, of Indiana. He went to California and investigated the question of the Chinese and of their influence upon the labor of the Pacific coast. He came back and made a report to the Senate in which he took the ground that the Chinese did not seriously at that time interfere with labor on the Pacific coast, that they had been instrumental in building many of the railroads in California, in reclaiming the lands of that country, and that they had been, in the main, a peaceable and law-abiding class of people. He says in his report:

> At a time when those countries have adopted a liberal policy, and in that respect have yielded to Western civilization, and have especially recognized the force of the example and policy of the United States, it is proposed that we shall take a step backward by the adoption of their cast-off policy of exclusion. The argument set up here in favor of this is precisely that which was so long used to excuse or justify the same policy in China and Japan, namely, that the admission of foreigners tended to interfere with their trade and the labor of their people, and corrupt their morals and degrade their religion.

That was the report made by the commission that was presided over by Governor Morton.

Subsequently the indisposition to have these people come to the Pacific coast has increased, and we have proposed now another treaty with the Chinese Government, and this Administration, at the head of which stands Mr. Cleveland as the President of the United States, and Mr. Bayard as his Secretary of State, have recently negotiated a new treaty, and again we have the spectacle presented of prompt and ready acquiescence on the part of the Chinese Government. If that treaty had been ratified in the Senate as it left the hands of the men who made it, the plenipotentiaries of the two Governments, it would be to-day the law of the land and this Administration would have the credit, as it should have, of inducing the Chinese Government to accede to an agreement by which all Chinese immigration into this country shall be excluded for a period of twenty years; but the amendments made in the Senate have given rise to delay and probably necessitated the passage of this bill.

I may be permitted to say, sir, that I am credibly informed that the Chinese Government is not only willing, but that it is absolutely desirous and anxious to prevent its subjects from emigrating to the United States. It will be found, when in my speech shall be read the paragraph from the Burlingame treaty to which I have referred, that the correlative rights were embraced in that treaty of our citizens going to China and Chinese citizens coming here, and when we obtained that right it was looked on as a great achievement.

It was regarded as a wonderful and memorable feat that we had induced the Chinese Empire, an empire embracing 400,000,000 of the people of this earth, nearly one-half of the entire population of the globe, to abandon its time-honored policy. China had lived within the limits of her own wall, having her own people and her own wants to provide for, and she had supplied her wants from the labors of her own people for centuries.

I here insert Articles IV and V of the treaty:

> The twenty-ninth article of the treaty of the 18th of June, 1858, having stipulated for the exemption of Christian citizens of the United States and Chinese converts from persecution in China, on account of their faith, it is further agreed that citizens of the United States in China of every religious persuasion, and Chinese subjects in the United States shall enjoy entire liberty of conscience, and shall be exempt from all disability or persecution on account of their religious faith or worship in either country.
> ART. V. The United States of America and the Emperor of China cordially recognize the inherent and inalienable right of man to change his home and allegiance, and also the mutual advantage of the free migration and emigration of their citizens and subjects respectively from the one country to the other for the purposes of curiosity, of trade, or as a permanent residence. The high contracting parties therefore join in reprobating any other than an entirely voluntary emigration for these purposes. They consequently agree to pass laws making it a penal offense for a citizen of the United States or Chinese subjects to take Chinese subjects either to the United States or to any other foreign country, or for a Chinese subject or citizen of the United States to take citizens of the United States to China or to any other foreign country without their free and voluntary consent, respectively.

Up to that period of time China had been an exclusive nation; and her history, Mr. Speaker, has been one of very extraordinary advancement. Her civilization, it may be said, dates back of the earliest stages of civilized government in the world, back of that in this country or in the country from which our ancestors, speaking a like language with our own, came. It goes back to the days of Confucius; and far beyond the time of Confucius this august dynasty extends, until its origin is lost in the twilight of fable.

China is a great nation, great in power, great in intellect, great in numbers, great in resources. When has she displayed her greatness more conspicuously than in the generous concessions which she has been at all times disposed to make in response to the demands of our Government for fair and liberal treaties? When we found that we did not want her population, that her people were not homogeneous with our own and never would become so, that it would be undesirable they should become so, we proposed that they should be excluded, and she assented to every such proposition, as she has now assented to this treaty which has been formed between the two governments, absolutely excluding the importation into our country of Chinese except those who may come here as plenipotentiaries, as merchants, as students, or in some other of the accepted classes.

It is provided by treaty stipulation that the vast body of the laboring population of that nation shall be excluded from this country for the period of twenty years—the very period which, when embraced in the original bill of 1882, was regarded by Mr. Arthur, then President of the United States, as violative of the spirit of the treaty, he having based his veto on that ground. China has agreed to this restriction in a spirit of liberality which challenges the admiration of the enlightened world. She has agreed to a treaty which embraces the very provision embodied in the original act of 1882, which was vetoed by a Republican President of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I have said thus much in regard to the treaties formerly existing between the Chinese nation and our own in order that I might pay a just tribute to that nation, with whom we have been upon such friendly terms. She has assented to every modification of every treaty that we have ever proposed from the time when she violated what had been her traditions and history for centuries, and agreed to the provisions of the Burlingame treaty, conceding to us not only the right to carry our commerce to that country, selling to her our products and getting hers in return, but absolutely according to our ministers of the gospel the opportunity to go there and preach Christianity without let or hinderance. No more liberal treaty was ever entered into between any two nations than those which China has always been willing to enter into with the United States.

Article XXIX of the treaty provides as follows:

> The principles of the Christian religion, as professed by the Protestant and Roman Catholic churches, are recognized as teaching men to do good, and to do to others as they would have others do to them. Hereafter those who quietly profess and teach these doctrines shall not be harassed or persecuted on account of their faith. Any person, whether citizen of the United States or Chinese convert, who, according to these tenets, peaceably teaches and practices the principles of Christianity shall in no case be interfered with or molested.

I say, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that when I found this treaty had been amended in the Senate it was to me a subject of regret. I am in favor of this bill. I hope it will receive the votes of a large majority of the House on both sides. I am in favor of it because it is in keeping with and is in spirit a part and parcel of this treaty, which has been negotiated by the plenipotentiaries appointed by Mr. Cleveland and by the Chinese Emperor. I believe it would have been better if this treaty had received the approbation of the United States Senate in the form in which it came from the hands of the plenipotentiaries, and had been in that form ratified and promulgated, leaving us to enact whatever laws might become necessary for the purpose of carrying the treaty into effect. While the amendments which have been incorporated in the treaty by the Senate may possibly be acceptable to the Chinese Government, we do not know that such will be the case, and I think it a great misfortune that in this way the Senate should have risked anything in regard to the ratification and promulgation of this very liberal treaty.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs I approve of this bill, and as a member of this House it is my intention to vote for it. I am not prepared to say that I think it goes as far as it might go. I am not prepared to affirm that it will effectually exclude a very large class of Chinese people who, we are told, slip across our northern and Mexican borders and thus become residents of our country, and mix with the business of the people; but the bill, so far as it goes, is a good bill; it is in the right direction, and for that reason I accept it, and shall heartily support it.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is offered here under the treaty-making power. It would, in my judgment, make very little difference under what power of the Constitution it might come here. The Constitution is affluent in power to protect our labor, in power to protect the integrity of our institutions, to protect the purity and decency of our race. The courts have decided this matter. As far back as Gibbons vs. Ogden (a remarkable case and a leading one) the doctrine was announced that commerce does not include mere traffic, but that it means intercourse; that immigration, like importation, is embraced within this power. So far as I can learn, this has never been questioned by a justice of the Supreme Court, save by Chief Justice Taney, in the passenger cases, who held that the same power which regulated foreign commerce regulated commerce "among the States," and that as Congress could not prevent a citizen from going from one State to another and living therein, that because the power over domestic and foreign commerce were collocated in the same clause, that therefore the same interpretation should be put on the power of Congress in each case. I need not say that was folly—the folly of a wise lawyer, but still folly.

We know now the radical difference between the power over commerce "among the States" and foreign commerce, and I need not pause to cite the multitude of decisions up to the present moment which respect the decisions of Chief-Justice Marshall on this point. Then there is the power of naturalization, which, undoubtedly, implies a choice as to who Congress will permit to be naturalized. Beyond all this is the power of self-protection and the responsibility the United States as a nation must bear as to the status of every foreigner who enters our borders.

True, sir, the civilization of the Chinese is not our civilization; true, they have neither capacity nor desire to become citizens of this country; and it is true, too, that they are offensive in many respects to our own people. But I will not enter into that question. I hail this bill as a step in favor of liberty—a step to protect the laboring men and women of this country against the evils of a cheapening competition; and I beg to say, while it is right to exclude the Chinese, they are not the only enemy who are at our door.

Labor is threatened in many forms by immigrants of various nationalities; threatened—nay, not only threatened but actually suffering. The crime of which the Chinese are guilty is the crime against labor. The crime of working too cheaply, the crime of depleting wages. That is their exact crime, and that is the exact reason why this legislation excluding them entirely from this country is justifiable. In the section of country from which I come our lumber woods are filled with Canadian aliens, our shipping is navigated through the lakes by the same people. Why? Because they will work for less wages. We hear the same complaint in regard to the shipping on our Atlantic coast. Why, gentlemen, have you not read the testimony taken lately by the Ford committee; if you have, you must have noticed that the labor employed in the great industries of the country has been nearly blotted out of existence by the importation of cheap pauper labor from abroad.

Take the cigar industry, for instance (it is a great industry in my city). The testimony given in regard to that industry is appalling. It is the same in reference to industry after industry. Why, sir, our committee last winter went into the coal regions of Pennsylvania. Go into mine after mine in that regions and you will see American labor denied adequate compensation by being brought into competition with cheap pauper labor from all parts of the world. In every contest of labor for proper compensation the world is drawn on for re-enforcements, which are hurled against our workingmen to snatch victory from them.

Our workingmen are called on to fight against such odds a losing battle. In this country where manhood suffrage is the rule, decent, well-housed, well-clothed, educated families are a necessity. We are pledged to the future; to the great American race which time will evolve from the mingling of blood and the fusion of nationality. These decent, well-housed, well-clothed, educated folk are the only foundation upon which the perpetuity of our institutions can rest. Yet by the importation of cheap pauper labor, brought into competition with our labor, it has become impossible to protect and preserve the dignity of our laboring men, and it is to prevent the continuance of that evil that restrictive legislation has been found to be absolutely necessary.

Mr. HERMANN. Let me ask the gentleman from Michigan what avail this legislation will be if we permit the introduction of the products of Chinese cheap labor into the ports of the United States to be brought into competition with the products of American free labor?

Mr. CHIPMAN. We will come to that in a minute. I expected before the debate was concluded you would come to that. You say that you protect our labor against the product of Chinese cheap labor. I will not say you, because I do not know, but I do know somebody brings in this pauper labor, and that it comes into competition with our laboring men. I do not find them in the employ of the farmers of the country, I do not find them in the employ of the humble artisan, but I do find them in your great mills. I find them amid the whirl of machinery, I find them in all of your protected industries, I find them in the great manufactories, I find them in the employment of the railroads of the country, I find them everywhere in the army of capitalists. You find them driving out our own labor.

There is a remedy needed. Something must be done for the protection of our own labor. Something must be done to keep up the free character and dignity of our own labor. Something must be done in order to insure the continuance of the stock of American labor for the future. Unless it is done it will be replaced by this cheap pauper labor from abroad.

How does this imported labor come into the country? You have statutes against it. Let two hundred men strike against inadequate wages, and like magic two hundred men from abroad will take their places. It is so in all parts of the country, and in every department of industry.

How are these men brought into the country? The provisions of the statutes prohibit their coming into the country, and yet their coming does not seem to be prevented, but, on the contrary, is constantly on the increase. The cry is, still they come. The evil still continues.

Day after day, hour after hour, minute after minute, the cry of our laborers goes up that they are being crushed to the earth by the competition of this cheap pauper labor from abroad. The present law seems to be inefficient, and something must be done either here or abroad by which this cheap labor can be prevented from destroying our own home labor. Something must be done to insure our laboring men against this ruinous competition.

It has been proposed we shall have inquiry made by our consuls abroad to ascertain whether every man who comes here intends to become a citizen of the United States. It is proposed that before coming here they shall in some way be compelled to make a declaration of their intention to become citizens of the United States, and in that way to prevent the influx of cheap pauper labor under contract, which has been so ruinous to our own labor.

That might be done. We have done it in regard to coolies. We impose the duty upon consuls to ascertain the business of parties coming here. We have acted upon that already. We have done it in the case of Japanese and Chinese. Why not do it in the case of these others? Why not do it in the case of every man who comes here and is willing to work for less than that which will keep him and his family in a decent living? I think, sir, that no man should be allowed to work in this country who has not at least taken out his first papers (to use a common phrase), who has not declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States.

You say that you can not do that without amendment of the laws. We can amend the laws, but I would give him a shorter time than the laws give him now. They give him the two years out of the five years necessary to become a citizen just before the expiration of the full five years. He may do it the moment he comes here. Any man who wishes to be a citizen may declare his intention the very day he enters the country. I would require him to do it within three to six months after his immigration.

I would require a man who came among us to make his living to give a hostage in some form that he would become a citizen of this country, that he would help us to accumulate wealth, that he and his children would be our soldiers and our voters, and that they would be good citizens. Why should we not make such a provision? Is there any good reason to the contrary? Under our present system of immigration when an immigrant lands he may declare his intention to become a citizen if he chooses.

There is nothing to prevent him. Then in five years he can take out his final papers. Why should not his time to take out his first papers be limited to three, to six months? Say to him, "If you intend to make your living in this country and to compete with our workingmen, you must declare your intention to become a citizen in a reasonable time, during which time you may work, and if you do not do it in that time you shall not earn wages until you do it."

A man who comes here and intelligently and honestly intends to be a settler and citizen would certainly do it and put himself under the obligations of the Constitution and the protection of the flag. My experience, which has been large upon the bench and otherwise, is that immigrants should take out their first papers as soon as possible. In my State the Irish, the Germans, and the Poles have come in great numbers. Every one of them, as soon as possible, goes to court and takes out his first papers. As a rule they are good citizens. But on the contrary, on the whole northern frontier there is another class who never shouldered a musket, who never paid a dollar's tax, who never spent a cent in the country that they could help, but who take every dollar they can out of it, and compete with our own people. They are white Chinamen, of our own color, but not of our own spirit.

To every man of every race and nationality and to every honest man who comes to us to become one of us and undertakes to become a good citizen of this country, and who comes here without the marks of handcuffs around his wrists, I say welcome! welcome! whatever his nationality may be; but when the halt, the lame, and the blind, morally, when the refuse of prisons, when the beggars and the wicked and criminals come amongst us, then it is surely time to make laws to protect our own, whether naturalized or native-born.

A man who debauches the price of labor is a public enemy, and when many men come for that purpose you have a greater public enemy to be resisted with the full power of the Republic. I would have the world understand that this country is not a hunting ground for every adventurer who chooses to come here; that the hearths of our homes are not El Doradoes for reckless speculation: that the happiness of our people and the permanency of our institutions are founded in the necessities of our best nature. No power may surround with imported labor as in a grand battue the workingmen of this country and hunt them to indecency and discomfort.

I would have the world understand that our people will not greet every adventurer who chooses to make this country a home; that our workingmen are not outlaws. I would have it understood that American citizenship and American labor and American homes shall be sustained in all the dignity which the Constitution and the laws throw around them and confer upon them, and that none shall be permitted to come in who would depreciate or lower that high standard.

To be an American, a child of the Republic, is to be a great one of the earth. Wherever we may be born, the institutions of our country are alike our shrine and defense. A grand American spirit in the hearts of all citizens, native-born or naturalized, is the fortress of our strength, the assurance of self-government forever.

Mr. McCREARY. It is very important that we should take a vote upon this bill this evening, and I ask unanimous consent that debate shall close at 4.30, and that the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the pending amendment and the third reading of the bill; the time for debate to be equally divided between both sides.

Mr. CANNON. I think the gentleman had better let the debate run on until 4 or half past 4 o'clock, and then take the sense of the House as to when it shall close.

Mr. McCREARY. If we let it run on until that time we shall not be able to get a vote to-day. Mr. Speaker, how much time did the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CHIPMAN] yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL]?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan spoke twenty minutes, and he has yielded the remainder of his hour, forty minutes, to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker, would it not be proper for the Chair to recognize some one on this side of the House at this time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will endeavor to divide the time equally.

Mr. McCREARY. It appears that we are all agreed upon this bill, and I desire we shall reach a vote this evening.

Mr. FELTON. I suggest that leave be given to gentlemen to print remarks upon this bill.

Mr. McCREARY. I ask unanimous consent that members may be permitted to extend their remarks in the RECORD, or to print remarks upon this bill.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I think the House is ready now to vote upon this bill.

Mr. CANNON. I have no objection, nor, so far as I know, have the gentlemen around me any objection, to voting upon the bill now, but if there is to be debate I suggest to the gentleman that he let it run on until 4 or half past 4.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Speaker, I find that there are several gentlemen who desire to speak on this subject, so I withdraw my request for the present.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CHIPMAN] for his courtesy. I have ever found him a true friend and earnest worker for the cause of labor whenever labor measures were before the House.

And now, Mr. Speaker, concerning the pending bill, while I favor it, I think it but proper to suggest that every two years or thereabouts we have a bill passed by Congress in regard to the Chinese. It is one of the incidents of a political campaign. A campaign does not appear to be complete without some additional Chinese legislation. We have now pending this bill, which has passed the Senate, and is it not a singular coincidence that at this same time we have also a committee of this House taking testimony in the city of New York in regard to violations of previous laws passed by Congress to prohibit the importation of contract labor, and thereby protect the workmen of this country?

My object in taking the floor to-day is to call the attention of the country to the fact that the passing of laws by Congress will not remedy these evils until you have a public opinion that will respect and back up those laws and carry them out. Whenever you have a public opinion in California that will enforce the laws you will need but little additional legislation upon this subject.

Mr. FELTON. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. With pleasure.

Mr. FELTON. Does the gentleman think there is a man beyond the Rocky Mountains who is not firm and pronounced in his opinion upon this question? The record of the vote given in the State of California, which has been read by the gentleman who opened this discussion, is conclusive upon that point.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I will answer the gentleman, whom I regard as an honest friend of this bill and opposed to the Chinese, that it was my pleasure some two or three years ago to visit California, and I then found that instead of being an object of ostracism, an element that the people desired to eliminate from their midst, the Chinaman as a servant or laborer was a favorite with a certain class of people. I found that from the moment you landed at the Palace Hotel, when the Chinese hotel servant came up to remove the marks of travel from your clothes, through all the hotels, in the private residences, and in the vineyards, and in the orange groves of California, in the mines, in the flumes, on the railroads, the Chinaman was to be found. And it is because they want him that the Chinaman is in California to-day. I have talked with laborers there and they have told me that men who go to that country under the impression that there are fields of employment open to them are compelled to leave because the Chinese laborer is preferred. He is more docile, more servile, and answers better the purposes of that class of employers who, with the importers of contract labor, would prefer slaves if they could get them.

I know that the laborers of the Pacific coast are asking for this legislation; but it is your so-called better classes; it is your gentlemen in your banks, in your hotels, and in your counting-houses, your mining and railroad owners, that employ the Chinaman. And Chinese labor is not always cheap labor. People will tell you there that they pay their Chinese cooks $40 or $50 a month, and their other Chinese servants in proportion. It is not always cheap labor. Wherever you turn you will find the Chinaman. That was my experience, and I went over a good deal of the gentleman's State.

Mr. FELTON. They are compelled to employ the Chinese from the fact that they can get no other labor. The presence of the Chinamen there, and the fact of their peculiarly docile nature and their industry, prevent the coming in of other labor which would compete with them. I will admit this fact, that there is a class of men who always buy everything as cheap as they can; but I tell this House that the moral sentiment of the community, the feeling pervading all classes there is that they would like to do away with this labor and substitute for it a labor which would be homogeneous with our people and would be a part and parcel of our civilization. It is but as a dernier ressort that we have been compelled to do things which otherwise we would not do.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. If the people of the Pacific coast, instead of adopting the dernier ressort, would take the first remedy at hand and advertise the fact that they desired and had employment for laborers and servants, they would find in this city, in every city of the Union, even in the cities in his own neighborhood, hundreds and thousands of laborers and servants who would be glad to have employment, many of whom have gone out there and have been obliged to come back, finding no chance for employment.

Mr. FELTON. Will you pay their passages?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Oh, there have been cheap rates offered often, and they have gone there, but they have had to come back empty-handed because they could not find employment.

Mr. Speaker, what I have said about Chinese legislation is true also in regard to the importation of contract labor. We pass laws upon that subject, and when they are evaded we amend them. But what is the result? Americans, citizens of this country, men who have their money invested in business enterprises, and who care no more about the humanities of life than they do about the animals they employ, send for cheap European laborers and bring them over here and employ them to the exclusion of our people. It is ignoring the rights of our own citizens; it is ignoring the humanities of life, because after they have used these poor fellows, either for the purpose of breaking down a strike or reducing wages, they turn them out on the hillsides, utterly careless whether they starve to death or not. That has been the experience in the mining regions; that has been the experience in the manufacturing regions.

We are talking to-day about the question of labor. That is the question that is paramount to all others. Your tariff question is recognizable as a question only in so far as it affects labor. Gentlemen, we will pass this bill, as you have passed many other labor bills in this Congress, and I believe that this Congress will go into history as having accomplished more for the cause of labor than any other Congress that has ever sat here, and I intend to add to my remarks an abstract of the various labor measures that have passed this House, namely: The bill creating a Department of Labor, the arbitration bill, convict-labor bills, letter-carriers' eight hour bill, prohibiting employment of alien labor, and to protect laborers, servants, and mechanics in their wages; not to encumber this discussion I will have them printed in the RECORD as an appendix.

Mr. Speaker, I want to go back to this question of public opinion. But is it not remarkable that Governor Waterman, the governor of the State of California—a State where they propose to do so much for labor—should write to members of this Congress appealing to them to defeat the convict-labor bill, the passage of which every laboring man in this country is now asking, in order to protect honest labor from convict labor? The governor of that State has sent his letter here to various members, basing his appeal on the ground that their prison is now making money out of this labor, and that it would be unfortunate to displace it. What a commentary on protecting labor when mere matters of dollars and cents are weighed against the homes and the welfare of the wives and children of the workmen of this country! What does he care if prison labor destroys every trade in this land? If your prison contractors can wipe out one trade after another, what does he care? It is with him a mere question of dollars and cents—a mere question how far human labor can be used for the purpose of making money out of it. And that is pertinent to this bill; it is involved in this discussion, being a greater evil than the Chinese question.

We want the Chinese excluded, not as a matter of race prejudice, but because their seething population could be dumped upon our shores by the hundreds of thousands; and it is a matter of self-preservation, "the first law of nature," that we should protect ourselves against an inroad of that kind, and their habits and manners do not admit of their assimilation with our people. But the Chinese question, I again tell the members of this House, is not the only remaining question involving the interests of labor to be disposed of by this House. When you have passed this bill, together with the other labor bills which have been passed by this House, you have not answered the demands of labor. Petitions have come to this House representing over 300,000 laborers of this country who have asked this Congress to pass a bill to protect honest labor against convict labor. Members can not defend themselves at home in their opposition to a measure of this kind on some legal quibble or by stating that they refuse to give a day to the cause of labor because a day is not granted for the consideration of pension legislation. There is not a pensioner in this country who will indorse a sentiment of that kind. Every such man would say, "I want what I believe to be just, but in order to secure that I do not ask you to injure my fellow-men; do not refuse an opportunity to protect them against a more insidious enemy than Chinese labor." Chinese labor, in the competition which it creates, is not nearly so disastrous and far-reaching as convict labor. The representatives of trade after trade have come here and told us that where formerly hundreds of men were employed the shops are now closed and the men idle. In one case it is 50 per cent. of the hollow-ware trade that has been absorbed by convict labor; in another case it is 40 per cent. of the matting industry, the coopering industry, or the harness trade; in another case it is 15 per cent. of all the shoe trade of the country.

I am bringing this home to you, gentlemen, for the reason that your workmen will tell you the question of protecting free American labor against convict labor is more important than even protecting the home labor against the pauper laborer of Europe or against Chinese labor. You have here a live issue; and I have seized this opportunity of appealing to the patriotism of this House. I appeal to the love which members profess, and I believe nearly all of them honestly feel, for the cause of labor, and ask them to stand by me in securing a day for the consideration of the labor bills still pending in the House.

I have about finished all I desire to say. I believe the pending bill ought to be passed. [Applause.]

APPENDIX.

ABSTRACT OF LABOR BILLS PASSED BY THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, AND CONVICT LABOR BILL AS AMENDED AND PREVIOUS QUESTION ORDERED ON ENGROSSMENT.

[H. R. 8560. Introduced by Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, passed both Houses, and signed by the President.]

An act to establish a department of labor.

That there shall be at the seat of Government a department of labor, the general design and duties of which shall be to acquire and diffuse among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with labor, in the most general and comprehensive sense of that word, and especially upon its relation to capital, the hours of labor, the earnings of laboring men and women, and the means of promoting their material, social, intellectual, and moral prosperity.

The department of labor is under the charge of a Commissioner of Labor appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who holds his office for four years unless sooner removed, and to receive a salary of $5,000 per annum.

The Commissioner of Labor is specially charged to ascertain, at as early a date as possible, and whenever industrial changes shall make it essential, the cost of producing articles at the time dutiable in the United States, in leading countries where such articles are produced, by fully-specified units of production, and under a classification showing the different elements of cost, or approximate cost, of such articles of production, including the wages paid in such industries per day, week, month, or year, or by the piece; and hours employed per day; and the profits of the manufacturers and producers of such articles; and the comparative cost of living, and the kind of living. "It shall be the duty of the Commissioner also to ascertain and report as to the effect of the tariff, and the effect thereon of the state of the currency, in the United States, on the agricultural industry, especially as to its effect on mortgage indebtedness on farmers;" and what articles are now controlled by trusts, and what effect said trusts have had on limiting production and keeping up prices. He shall also establish a system of reports by which, at intervals of not less than two years, he can report the general condition, so far as production is concerned, of the leading industries of the country. The Commissioner of Labor is also specially charged to investigate the causes of and facts relating to all controversies and disputes between employers and employés as they may occur, and which may tend to interfere with the welfare of the people of the different States, and report thereon to Congress. The Commissioner of Labor shall also obtain such information upon the various subjects committed to him as he may deem desirable from different foreign nations, and what, if any, convict-made goods are imported into this country, and if so, from whence.

The Commissioner of Labor shall also annually make a report in writing to the President and Congress of the information collected and collated by him, and containing such recommendations as he may deem calculated to promote the efficiency of the Department. He is also authorized to make special reports on particular subjects whenever required to do so by the President or either House of Congress, or when he shall think the subjects in his charge requires it.

The Commissioner of Labor is provided with a large force of clerks, statistical experts, stenographers, special agents, traveling agents, and other employés deemed necessary, and the Government appropriates nearly $170,000 per annum for the successful working of this department.

[H. R. 1645. Introduced by Mr. MCADOO. Passed both Houses, and signed by the President.]

An act to limit the hours that letter-carriers in cities shall be employed per day.

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter eight hours shall constitute a day's work for letter-carriers in cities or postal districts connected therewith, for which they shall receive the same pay as is now paid as for a day's work of a greater number of hours. If any letter-carrier is employed a greater number of hours per day than eight, he shall be paid extra for the same in proportion to the salary now fixed by law.

[Amendment to H. R. 6437, enforcing eight hour law in Government Printing Office. Proposed by Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, February 17, 1888, passed by both Houses, and now a law.]

And the Public Printer is hereby directed to rigidly enforce the provisions of the eight-hour law in the department under his charge.

[H. R. 3405. Introduced by Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri.]

An act to protect mechanics, laborers, and servants in their wages.

Be it enacted, etc., That for all personal services rendered by any person acting in the capacity of mechanic, laborer, or servant in the District of Columbia and Territories of the United States, to an amount not exceeding $100, no property shall be exempt from seizure and sale under execution: Provided, That in order to secure the benefits of this act such mechanic, laborer, or servant shall commence their action within six months next after the last service shall have been rendered.

SEC. 2. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Passed the House of Representatives March 20, 1888.

Attest: JNO. B. CLARK, Clerk.

[H. R. 3406. Introduced by Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri.]

An act to prevent the product of convict labor from being furnished to or for the use of any Department of the Government, and to prevent the product of convict labor from being used upon public buildings or other public works.

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act, it shall be unlawful for any agent or officer of the United States Government to purchase, or, if under his control, to permit the purchase, of supplies of every description to be furnished to or for the use of Army or Navy of the United States or other Government Department, or for use among any of the Indian tribes, or any of the Departments, or materials to be used in the erection, construction, or completion of public buildings or other public works, when said supplies or materials are, in whole or in part, the product of convict labor: And provided further, That in all advertisements for the purchase of supplies to be furnished to or for the use of any of the Departments, or for the erection, construction, or completion of public buildings or public works, and in all contracts made under or in pursuance of such advertisements, there shall be inserted a condition that no convict or prison labor whatsoever, or the product thereof, shall be used by or furnished to any Department of the Government, or employed or used upon any public building or work, or in the preparation or manufacture of any of the articles, materials, or supplies contracted to be furnished therefor.

SEC. 2. That any willful breach of any of said conditions by any contractor shall authorize and work a forfeiture of the contract, and shall constitute a complete defense in bar against any claim or action against the United States for the recovery of any sum or sums under said contract; and it shall be the duty of the officer letting any such contract, upon being advised that any contractor has knowingly violated the terms of such contract, to declare the same forfeited.

Passed House of Representatives March 21, 1888.

Attest: JNO. B. CLARK, Clerk.

[H. R. 8724. Introduced by Mr. TARSNEY.]

An act to prevent the employment of alien labor upon public buildings or other public works and in the various departments of the Government, and so forth.

Be it enacted, etc., That in all advertisements for the erection or construction or completion of public buildings or other public works, and in all contracts made under or in pursuance of such advertisements, there shall be inserted a condition that no person who is not a bona fide resident within the limits of the United States, and who is not a citizen, or who has not declared his intention to become a citizen thereof, in the manner provided by law, shall be employed in the erection, construction, or completion of any public building or other public work.

SEC. 2. That any willful breach of any of said conditions by any contractor shall authorize and work a forfeiture of the contract, and shall constitute a complete defense in bar against any claim or action against the United States for the recovery of any sum or sums under said contract; and it shall be the duty of the officer letting any such contract, upon being advised that any contractor has knowingly violated the terms of such contract, to declare the same forfeited.

SEC. 3. No person shall be employed in any department of the Government of the United States (except persons employed in the consular or diplomatic service abroad) who is not a citizen and resident of the United States, or who has not previously declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States.

Passed the House of Representatives March 21, 1888.

Attest: JNO. B. CLARK, Clerk.

[H. R. 8665. Introduced by Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri.]

An act to create boards of arbitration or commission for settling controversies and differences between railroad corporations and other common carriers engaged in inter State and Territoral transportation of property or passengers and their employés.

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever differences or controversies arise between railroad or other transportation companies engaged in the transportation of property or passengers between two or more States of the United States, between a Territory and State, within the Territories of the United States, or within the District of Columbia, and the employés of said railroad companies, which differences or controversies may hinder, impede, obstruct, interrupt, or affect such transportation of property or passengers, if, upon the written proposition of either party to the controversy to submit their differences to arbitration, the other party shall accept the proposition, then in such event the railroad company is hereby authorized to select and appoint one person, and such employé or employés, as the case may be, to select and appoint another person, and the two persons thus selected and appointed to select a third person, all three of whom shall be citizens of the United States and wholly impartial and disinterested in respect to such differences or controversies; and the three persons thus selected and appointed shall be, and they are hereby, created and constituted a board of arbitration, with the duties, powers, and privileges hereinafter set forth.

SEC. 2. That the board of arbitration provided for in the first section of this act shall possess all the powers and authority in respect to administering oaths, subpœnaing witnesses and compelling their attendance, preserving order during the sittings of the board, and requiring the production of papers and writings relating alone to the subject under investigation now possessed and belonging to United States commissioners appointed by the circuit court of the United States; but in no case shall any witness be compelled to disclose the secrets or produce the records or proceedings of any labor organization of which he may be an officer or member; and said board of arbitration may appoint a clerk and employ a stenographer, and prescribe all reasonable rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, looking to the speedy advancement of the differences and controversies submitted to them to a conclusion and determination. Each of said arbitrators shall take an oath to honestly, fairly, and faithfully perform his duties, and that he is not personally interested in the subject-matter in controversy, which oath may be administered by any State or Territorial officer authorized to administer oaths. The third person so selected and appointed as aforesaid shall be the president of said board; and any order, finding, conclusion, or award made by a majority of such arbitrators shall be of the same force and effect as if all three of such arbitrators concurred therein or united in making the same.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of said board of arbitration, immediately upon their selection, to organize at the nearest practicable point to the place of the origin of the difficulty or controversy, and to hear and determine the matters of difference which may be submitted to them in writing by all the parties, giving them full opportunity to be heard on oath, in person and by witnesses, and also granting them the right to be represented by counsel; and after concluding its investigation said board shall publicly announce its decisions, which, with the findings of fact upon which it is based, shall be reduced to writing and signed by the arbitrators concurring therein, and, together with the testimony taken in the case, shall be filed with the Commissioner of Labor of the United States, who shall make such decision public as soon as the same shall have been received by him.

SEC. 4. That it shall be the right of any employés engaged in the controversy to appoint, by designation in writing, one or more persons to act for them in the selection of an arbitrator to represent them upon the board of arbitration.

SEC. 5. That each member of said tribunal of arbitration shall receive a compensation of $10 a day for the time actually employed. That the clerk appointed by said tribunal of arbitration shall receive the same fees and compensation as clerks of United States circuit courts and district courts receive for like services. That the stenographer shall receive as full compensation for his services 10 cents for each folio of an hundred words of testimony taken and reduced to writing before said arbitrators. The United States marshals or other persons serving the process of said tribunal of arbitration shall receive the same fees and compensation for such services as they would receive for like services upon process issued by United States commissioners. That witnesses attending before said tribunal of arbitration shall receive the same fees as witnesses attending before United States commissioners. That all of said fees and compensation shall be payable by the United States in like manner as fees and compensation are payable in criminal causes under existing laws: Provided, That the said tribunal of arbitration shall have power to limit the number of witnesses in each case where fees shall be paid by the United States: And provided further, That the fees and compensation of the arbitrators, clerks, stenographers, marshals, and others for service of process, and witnesses under this act shall be examined and certified by the United States district judge of the district in which the arbitration is held before they are presented to the accounting officers of the Treasury Department for settlement, and shall then be subject to the provisions of section 846 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and a sufficient sum of money to pay all expenses under this act and to carry the same into effect is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: And provided likewise, Not more than $5,000 shall be expended in defraying the costs of any single investigation by the commission hereinafter provided for.

SEC. 6. That the President may select two commissioners, one of whom at least shall be a resident of the State or Territory in which the controversy arises, who, together with the Commissioner of Labor, shall constitute a temporary commission for the purpose of examining the causes of the controversy, the conditions accompanying, and the best means for adjusting it; the result of which examination shall be immediately reported to the President and Congress, and on the rendering of such report the services of the two commissioners shall cease. The services of the commission, to be ordered at the time by the President and constituted as herein provided, may be tendered by the President for the purpose of settling a controversy such as contemplated, either upon his own motion, or upon the application of one of the parties to the controversy, or upon the application of the executive of a State.

SEC. 7. That the commissioners provided in the preceding section shall be entitled to receive $10 each per day for each day's service rendered, and the expenses absolutely incurred in the performance of their duties; and the expenses of the Commissioner of Labor, acting as one of the commission, shall also be reimbursed to him. Such compensation and expenses shall be paid by the Treasurer of the United States on proper vouchers, certified to by the Commissioner of Labor and approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 8. That upon the direction of the President, as hereinbefore provided, the commission shall visit the locality of the pending dispute, and shall have all the powers and authority given in section 2 to a board of arbitration, and shall make careful inquiry into the cause thereof, hear all persons interested therein who may come before it, advise the respective parties what, if anything, ought to be done or submitted to by either or both to adjust such dispute, and make a written decision thereof. This decision shall at once be made public, shall be recorded upon proper books of record to be kept in the office of the Commissioner of Labor, who shall cause a copy thereof to be filed with the secretary of the State or Territory or States or Territories in which the controversy exists.

SEC. 9. That in each case the commissioners who may be selected as provided shall, before entering upon their duties, be sworn to the faithful discharge thereof. The Commissioner of Labor shall be chairman ex officio of the commission, and may appoint one or more clerks or stenographers to act in each controversy only, which clerks or stenographers shall be compensated at a rate not exceeding $6 per day each, and actual expenses incurred shall be reimbursed.

SEC. 10. The Commissioner of Labor shall, as soon as possible after the passage of this act, establish such rules of procedure as shall be approved by the President; but the commission shall permit each party to a controversy to appear in person or by counsel, and to examine and cross-examine witnesses. All its proceedings shall be transacted in public, except when in consultation for the purpose of deciding upon the evidence and arguments laid before it. The chairman of the commission is hereby authorized to administer oaths to witnesses, in all investigations conducted by the commission, and such witnesses shall be subpœnaed in the same manner as witnesses are subpœnaed to appear before United States courts and commissioners, and they shall each receive the same fees as witnesses attending before United States commissioners: Provided, That said temporary board of commissioners shall have power to limit the number of witnesses in each case where fees shall be paid by the United States.

SEC. 11. All fees, expenses, and compensation of this commission shall be paid as hereinbefore provided in section 5 of this act.

Passed the House of Representatives April 18, 1888.

JNO. B. CLARK, Clerk.

[H. R. 8716. Introduced by Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, pending in the House as amended, and previous question ordered on engrossment.]

A bill to protect free labor and the industries in which it is employed from the injurious effects of convict labor by confining the sale of the goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured by convict labor to the State in which they are produced:

Be it enacted, etc., That every person who knowingly transports, or causes to be delivered for transportation, for commercial purposes, from the State or Territory in which they are in whole or in part manufactured, any goods, wares, or merchandise, in whole or in part manufactured by convict labor in any penitentiary, prison, reformatory, or other establishment in which convict labor is employed, to or into any other State or Territory, or into the District of Columbia, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment at the discretion of the court, and such goods, wares, or merchandise shall be forfeited to the United States. The importation for commercial purposes of all goods, wares, or merchandise from any foreign country into the United States, which in whole or in part were manufactured or produced by convict labor, is hereby prohibited, and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to prescribe rules and regulations for the enforcement of this provision and to enforce the same. Every person who knowingly violates this provision shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be subject to the penalties and punishment provided in this act. And the words goods, wares, and merchandise are intended and shall be construed to include coal, iron ore, lead ores, all kinds of marble products, lumber in all its forms, and all other articles of commerce produced, wrought, cut, or mined by convict labor.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the several United States district attorneys to prosecute all violations of this act by any person making the complaint under oath, and the same shall be heard before any district or circuit court of the United States or Territorial court holden within the district in which the violation of this act has been committed.

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect at the expiration of two years from and after its passage, except as to goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured under existing contracts that have been made by any State for the employment of its convict labor, and in such cases this act shall take effect immediately upon the expiration of such contracts.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I yield the balance of my time.

Mr. YOST. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. YOST. Will you tell the House where the objection to the consideration of the convict-labor bill came from?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The last objection came from the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN].

Mr. YOST. No, sir; the objection came from the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES].

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. As the gentleman from Alabama is not present, I can not refer to him.

Mr. YOST. The gentleman from Alabama objected to setting apart a day for the Labor Committee unless the convict-labor bill was excluded.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I said that the last objection came from the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LYMAN. I never objected to the consideration of a labor bill on this floor.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. You objected to a day being set apart for the consideration of labor legislation.

Mr. LYMAN. I did not. I simply asked the gentleman to modify his request for a day for the Labor Committee by including a day for the Invalid Pensions Committee; and I shall continue to ask that.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The record will bear me out. It was the gentleman's objection which prevented us from getting a day; it was not his asking me a question.

Mr. JOHNTSON, of Indiana. Has the gentleman any information as to the reason why the Committee on Rules does not report in favor of giving a day to the Labor Committee?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I know of no reason on earth except that they have not so reported.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. They can do so, can they not?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I think this House in its wisdom can give us a day.

Mr. BYNUM obtained the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COX). The gentleman from Indiana now has the floor for twenty minutes. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CHIPMAN] occupied twenty minutes of his hour, yielded twenty minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL], and there are twenty minutes remaining.

Mr. BYNUM. Twenty minutes will not be sufficient to enable me to conclude what I have to say, and unless the members of the committee are willing that I should occupy probably forty minutes, I will give way to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT], reserving my right to speak hereafter.

Mr. HITT. I suggest that the gentleman go on now, with the understanding that the time shall be equally divided.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will endeavor to divide the time equally.

Mr. McCREARY. I now renew my proposition that the debate on this question be closed at half past 4 o'clock.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I move to amend that proposition so as to name 3 o'clock.

Mr. BYNUM. I do not yield for any purpose of that kind.

Mr. McCREARY. I ask that at half past 4 o'clock the debate be closed and the previous question be considered as ordered on the pending amendment and on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I move to amend by naming 3 o'clock instead of half past 4 o'clock.

Mr. BYNUM. I decline to yield for that motion.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, have I not the right to offer an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky has not the floor to make any motion. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. McCREARY. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not press his proposition, but will permit us to agree to the proposition I have stated, so that we may have a vote this evening.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. If we are going to have a vote this evening, we might as well have it at 3 o'clock.

Mr. McCREARY. Does the gentleman withdraw his proposition?

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. No, sir; I insist upon it.

Mr. McCREARY. Then I withdraw my motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] is now entitled to the floor.

Mr. BYNUM addressed the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (after twenty minutes had expired). The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BYNUM. No, I think not, as I was to occupy forty minutes of my own hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood the gentleman from Michigan yielded twenty minutes of his time to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BYNUM. Yes; and it was also understood that I would then proceed for forty minutes in my own hour. I expressly stated that I would proceed to submit my remarks upon that understanding, and that after the twenty minutes yielded to me by the gentleman from Michigan had expired I would then continue for forty minutes in my own hour. I would not have proceeded under any other understanding. The twenty minutes yielded to me by the gentleman from Michigan having expired, I now proceed to occupy forty minutes of my own hour.

Mr. FELTON. Allow me to ask the Chair whether there has been any understanding arrived at by which the debate on this question is limited, and whether any understanding has been reached to take the vote at half past 4 o'clock?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No limitation of the debate has been provided for, nor has any agreement been come to that the vote shall be taken at half past 4 this afternoon as at one time was suggested.

Mr. FELTON. I do not object to the gentleman from Indiana proceeding upon that understanding.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman from Indiana will proceed.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, I shall make no apology to the House for occupying the floor at this time. I desire to bring to the attention of the members of the House and to the attention of the people some matters of record, and I avail myself of this opportunity to do so.

The subject of legislation affecting the interests of the laboring classes has become an important matter.

Our wage-workers are in a great measure an organized class, and as such have become a most potent factor in educating and influencing the masses upon political questions. All parties, therefore, are making great efforts to win their approbation and support.

The most ardent professions for their interest and welfare have been and will be expressed in platforms and proclaimed upon the stump.

This class of our citizens, however, have long since realized that but little faith could be put in the pledges of platforms or the professions of politicians, and that the only sure guide to the principles which control a party is to be found in the record which it has made.

The members of the Republican party are boastful in their professions of devotion to the interests of American labor. They profess to be its special protectors, and without their guardianship one would conclude, from their pretensions, that our laboring classes would long since have been reduced to a condition of dependency and servitude more deplorable than that of the poorest-paid labor of Europe.

I shall attempt at this time to do little more than call attention to some of the legislation which seriously affected the welfare of our laboring classes, so that they may readily fix the responsibility for their enactment or non-enactment where it rightfully should be.

In 1864 Congress passed an act substantially entitled an act to encourage immigration. This was its ostensible purpose, but its real object was to clothe contractors, mine-owners, and manufacturers with power to contract with and import laborers from Europe to supplant American workmen and to reduce the price of American wages.

Senator SHERMAN, in reporting this measure to the Senate, very adroitly tried to conceal its real purpose, but inadvertently disclosed the secret before concluding his statement. He said:

> The special wants for labor in this country at the present time are very great. The war has depleted our workshops and materially lessened our supply of labor in every department of industry and mechanism. In their noble response to the call of their country our workmen in every branch of the useful arts have left vacancies which must be filled or the material interests of the country must suffer. The immense amount of native labor occupied by the war calls for a large increase of foreign immigration to make up the deficiency at home. The demand for labor never was greater than at present, and the fields of usefulness were never so varied and promising.

It was true, as stated by Senator SHERMAN, that there was "a noble response to the call of their country" by the workingmen, but while absent fighting its battles their vacant places should not have been filled with cheap laborers imported from Europe under contract. Paupers unable to get to this country under the terms and provisions of this law could virtually enslave themselves in foreign countries to American contractors and American manufacturers, and the contract would be enforced here to the fullest extent.

The second section of this law reads as follows:

> SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all contracts that shall be made by emigrants to the United States in foreign countries, in conformity to regulations that may be established by the said commissioner, whereby emigrants shall pledge the wages of their labor for a term not exceeding twelve months, to repay the expenses of their emigration, shall be held to be valid in law, and may be enforced in the courts of the United States or of the several States and Territories; and such advances, if so stipulated in the contract, and the contract be recorded in the recorder's office in the county where the emigrant shall settle, shall operate as a lien upon any land thereafter acquired by the emigrant, whether under the homestead law when the title is consummated, or on property otherwise acquired until liquidated by the emigrant; but nothing herein contained shall be deemed to authorize any contract contravening the Constitution of the United States, or creating in any way the relation of slavery or servitude. (U. S. Stats. at Large, vol. 15, 1863-'65.)

The extent to which the authors of this measure knew they were going is apparent from the last lines of this section—"but nothing herein contained shall be deemed to authorize any contract contravening the Constitution of the United States or creating in any way the relation of slavery or servitude."

When we ask Republicans why they took advantage of the absence of the wage-workers who were in the Army, they say it was necessary! Labor was scarce and wages were high! Will they answer why, when the war was over, when the armies disbanded and the men returned home to take their places, this law was not repealed? Will they inform us why, when a half million or more of men were discharged from the mills and factories in 1873, this law was kept upon the statute-books? Will they answer why during that long period of depression, when hundreds of thousands of men were out of employment and seeking work, it was necessary to import, as was done under this law, large numbers of European laborers? The fact that this statute remained in force nearly twenty years, eighteen after the war had closed, and that every effort to repeal it in the interest of American labor was thwarted is sufficient to satisfy the most skeptic person that it was fashioned and framed in the interest of the contractor and manufacturer. From the time of the enactment of this law till its repeal over 6,500,000 immigrants came to our shores. How many of these left their native land and came to us voluntarily upon their own resources because of their admiration for our institutions, and how many debased and vicious characters were brought here under this contract system can not be told. Laborers were imported under the provisions of this law up to the time of its repeal, and the statutes now in force prohibiting the same are being evaded in every possible way by the men who cry loudest "protection to American labor!" The Republican party, supreme in all the Departments of the Government, was cognizant of the fact, but no step was taken to protect American labor from this competition.

Dump all the paupers and criminals of Europe and all the Mongolians of Asia in here. What cared the manufacturers? Labor was made more dependent and wages cheaper. This was the policy and is the policy of that party to-day. Open wide the doors for the importation of cheap labor, but close them tight against the importation of cheap clothing and cheap food. Let us see if the attention of the Republican members of Congress was ever called to this matter.

On the 13th of December, 1869, Senator Wilson, of Massachusetts, introduced a bill (S. 378) to regulate the importation of immigrants under contract. This bill was called up by him on the 22d of April, 1870, and its consideration urged; but Senator Ferry, of Michigan, objected, and the bill was referred to the Committee on Commerce, a majority of whom were Republicans, who reported against its passage. They were unwilling to consider a bill to even regulate the subject four years after the war was over.

On the 5th of February, 1870, Senator Wilson introduced another bill (S. 563) to make the importation of immigrants under contract unlawful. He made several efforts to secure consideration of the same without reference to a committee, but objections were made, and on December 12, 1870, it was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and was never heard of again. No power was strong enough to carry a bill through the committee; the ears of Republicans were deaf to all appeals. They saw American workmen out of employment, wages going down, strikes and lock-outs daily occurring, but none of these aroused their attention. It remained for a Democratic House of Representatives to repeal this odious and injurious measure, and to force the Republican Senate to take action before anything could be accomplished. On the 8th of January, 1884, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN] introduced a bill (H. R. 2550) to prohibit the importation of foreign labor under contract. This bill passed the House on the 19th of June, 1884.

The bill was sent to the Senate, where it was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor. It was reported back at an early day, and repeated but fruitless efforts made to secure consideration of it until in February, 1885, when it finally passed that body. I ask every intelligent workingman in the country to examine without prejudice this record, and if he does not come to the conclusion that those who upheld this law for the importation of contract labor for so many years were not his friends, I shall doubt his ability to select them.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

There is another equally important and interesting question which affected the welfare and prosperity of American labor to which I desire to call attention. The capitalists of the country, not satisfied with the law giving them the power to import and enslave the pauper labor of Europe, looked with wistful eyes across the Pacific to Asia, where 300,000,000 of Chinese laborers of greater skill and talent could be obtained at still lower wages. On the 28th day of July, 1868, the Republican administration negotiated a new treaty with the Chinese Government, which is known as the Burlingame treaty. Articles V and VI of this treaty provide as follows:

5. The United States of America and the Emperor of China cordially recognize the inherent and inestimable right of man to change his home and allegiance, and also the mutual advantage of the free migration and emigration of their citizens and subjects respectively from one country to the other for the purpose of curiosity, of trade, or as permanent residents, etc.

6. Citizens of the United States visiting or residing in China shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, or exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nations; and reciprocally, Chinese subjects visiting or residing in the United States shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, and exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nations, etc.

The Republican party claims to have superior intelligence and wisdom in negotiating treaties with foreign governments. They insist, without the least hesitation, that the rights of American citizens can safely be intrusted to none but themselves; but you search in vain to find what additional rights and benefits American citizens secured by the Burlingame treaty.

Senator Grimes, in calling attention to this fact in the Senate, said:

It may strike the Senate with surprise on a careful reading of the treaty of 1868 to find that in no one of the eight articles composing it is there to be found one substantial right of value to any American citizen which he could not enjoy under the former treaties, while to Chinese subjects in the United States every privilege, except citizenship, is thrown wide open, even the ownership and working of our mines of gold and silver, which are liberties never freely granted to a foreigner by any other government in the world.

I shall not stop to inquire what the motives of the administration were in negotiating this treaty or what power instigated it. Directly it had but one effect, and that was to deluge the Pacific States with Chinese laborers. In 1867, the year before the adoption of this treaty, only 3,863 Chinese landed upon our shores; while in 1869, the year after, 14,614 came; and thus it continued until 1882, when the number had increased to 35,614.

Under the law of 1864, protecting and enforcing contracts made with immigrants, rich and powerful companies, after the adoption of the treaty, organized for the importation of this class of laborers. The cooly trade was revived and they came by hundreds and thousands, consigned to one of these companies like so many horses or cattle, and were by them hired out to work in manufactories, in mines, upon railroads, and in every place where American labor had profitable employment. The rapid increase of their numbers soon alarmed the people of California. They were an undesirable population from every consideration. They were debased beyond conception; vice and immorality unspeakable were universal amongst them. Their abodes reeked with filth and their dens with infamy. Their presence was degrading to society and to civilization. They consumed but little, and therefore worked for wages so low that no white laborer could live in competition with them. The people of the Pacific Slope, without regard to party, arose and with one voice demanded that this immigration should cease. The evils resulting from such an influx of population were so disastrous to all classes that there was no division of sentiment. No one but those profiting by it could be found to express any other sentiment than that its continuance would be ruinous.

The American wage-workers were fast being crowded out and their appeals to Congress to save them from degradation were sincere and unanswerable, but their voice was unheeded, capital reigned supreme in the councils of the Republican party; the contractor, the manufacturer, the mine operator demanded cheap labor, and their demands were heeded.

Mr. Speaker, I want here to call attention to a statement made by the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. WOODBURN], and I do so with great reluctance, because I believe this portion of his speech is about all there is left that has not already been shown to be incorrect. He said:

Mr. Chairman, it was not the Democratic party but the Republican party that passed the anti-pauper immigration bill. It was not the Democratic but the Republican party that passed a bill prohibiting the importation of cooly laborers under contract.

Mr. Speaker, I have already shown that the first proposition was not true. The Republican Senate never considered the question until driven to do so by a Democratic House. I now propose to show that the Republican party never passed, at any time, a bill to prohibit the importation of Chinese laborers under contract, but that in one or the other end of the Capitol there was a majority of the Republican votes against every such a measure. I not only propose to show this, but to show that the Republican party was not only opposed to the passage of any such bill, but, upon the contrary, was in favor of conferring greater rights and privileges upon the Chinese. Further, I shall show that their candidate for the Presidency, General Harrison, when present, without exception, voted against every bill to restrict or suspend immigration, voted in favor of every amendment which gave greater freedom and conferred greater rights, even to that of citizenship, upon the Chinese. The repeated efforts that were made by the Representatives and Senators from the Pacific States and elsewhere to check the importation of Chinese laborers were without avail. Like the efforts to have repealed the statute authorizing and protecting the importation of laborers from Europe, no attention was paid to them or the proposed measures were summarily dealt with.

On the 6th of December, 1869, Senator Williams, of Oregon, introduced a bill (S. 279) to regulate the immigration of Chinese and prohibit their importation under contract. On the 24th of February, 1871, Senator Chandler, of Michigan, a Republican, from the Committee on Commerce, to which the bill had been referred, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and moved that it be indefinitely postponed. The motion was agreed to.

On the 10th of January, 1870, Mr. Johnson, of California, introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 102) to regulate and restrict Chinese immigration, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The committee, a majority of whom were Republicans, refused to report it back to the House.

On the 6th of June, 1870, Senator STEWART, of Nevada, introduced in the Senate a bill (S. 973) to prohibit contracts for servile labor, but even this measure could not meet with favor at the hands of a Republican Senate, and it was defeated.

On June 7, 1870, Mr. Sargent, of California, introduced a bill (H. R. 2168) to prohibit contracts for servile labor, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, but the influences were strong enough to prevent this measure from ever being reported back to that body.

On July 7, 1870, Mr. Mungen, of Ohio, introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 362) in regard to the protection of our laboring classes against Chinese immigration, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, but there it remained. This was not the way to protect labor in the opinion of the Republican party, and the resolution was pigeonholed.

On July 9, 1870, Mr. Cake, of Pennsylvania, introduced a resolution against the importation of Chinese coolies under contract and directing the Committee on Education and Labor to investigate the subject. The resolution was referred to that committee, but was never heard of afterwards.

On the 18th of December, 1871, Mr. Coghlan, of California, introduced a bill (H. R. 755) to prohibit contracts for servile labor, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The reference of this bill was subsequently changed to the Committee on Education and Labor, which reported a substitute, which was recommitted to the same committee, and that was the last of it.

On the 30th of April, 1872, Senator Casserly, of California, a Democrat, having previously received a memorial on the subject from the Legislature of his State, introduced a bill (S. 1058) to prohibit contracts for servile labor and to amend and enforce existing laws against the cooly trade. This bill, like all others of its kind, was referred to a hostile Republican committee, and was never heard of again. What a record of devotion to the interests of American labor this is! Their petitions spurned, their resolutions ignored, and their bills strangled in committee by the Republican party.

This, however, is not all; it is only the beginning of the record of that party. The time arrived when they were compelled to meet the question. After ten years of agitation the laboring classes and their friends secured the consideration of measures for their protection against the further importation of Chinese, and what record did the Republican party make when forced to take a decided position? Of the three bills considered, but one received a majority of the Republican votes in the House, and not a single one received a majority of the Republican votes in the Senate. All the leading Republican Senators, including the Republican candidate for the Presidency, General Harrison, voted against every measure, when present, that was proposed.

General Harrison now says that he voted against the different measures because he thought they violated our treaty obligations and because he did not fully understand the necessity of the legislation.

With all due respect to General Harrison, the record he made, to say the least, does not support his statements. These late statements and discoveries should, when visions of the White House, however dim and remote, loom up, be accepted with little faith. There was not a shadow of an excuse at any time for any Senator or Representative to vote against either of the measures proposed because its provisions violated our treaty stipulations with China. There would have been in case of the enactment of the first measure proposed an abrogation of some, and if the Chinese Government so determined, of all our treaty stipulations, but no violation. There would have been a repeal, but not a violation. It was a contract terminable at the will of either party. The administration had for ten years neglected and failed, and therefore I say refused, to make an endeavor to secure any modification of the treaty of 1868, and there was no other course open for relief except through legislation. This question was fully and unanswerably met upon the consideration of the measure first proposed.

Senator Sargent, February 13, 1879, said:

It is also objected, and I desire to advert to these considerations very hastily in passing, that there is a treaty with China with which, if this law is passed, there will be a conflict, and that a treaty is the supreme law of the land; that we have no right to legislate so as to abrogate a treaty or contravene its provisions. If this were true it would be a fatal objection to this legislation. That it is not true in principle is settled by the practice of this Government from time immemorial. It is not true as shown by the action of our executive department and our judicial authorities.

In 1851 John J. Crittenden, Attorney-General of the United States, in what was called the Florida claims case, decided that a subsequent law of Congress repealed a prior treaty, set it aside. In 1870 the same doctrine was held by Attorney-General Ackerman. The doctrine was held by the United States circuit court in a case where the interests of Russia were involved, where by treaty with Russia we had provided that hemp from Russia should be received at as low a rate of duty as that from any other country whatever, and subsequently we passed a tariff law which provided that Russian hemp should pay $40 a ton and Manila hemp should pay $20 a ton.

An action of assumpsit was brought in a United States court against the collector of New York to recover the difference in the duties, on the ground that the rights of the parties were measured by the treaty and could not be affected by the subsequent statute. The United States court held that a subsequent law repealed pro tanto the prior treaty, and that the power must reside in Congress, because the President and Senate could not have the power to bind the interests of the people beyond any relief by Congress, placing it upon the high ground that Congress itself, composed of the Senate and House of Representatives, and the President of the United States were those who must have the final decision upon all questions involving treaties and the power to set them aside. From that decision down through the Clinton bridge case, through the Choctaw case and others, the courts have uniformly held to this doctrine, and I only regret that I have not time to call the attention of the Senate to these decisions in extenso. The last decision was made by the United States Supreme Court recently, fully sustaining the doctrine to which I advert.

Senator Allan G. Thurman, of Ohio, said:

Mr. President, I have a very few words to say on this bill, and scarcely anything at all upon the general question involved in it. I shall assume the arguments already made at this session and at previous sessions have convinced the Senate that a limit ought to be placed upon the emigration of Chinese to the United States, if, indeed, that migration ought not to be stopped altogether. What I shall say, therefore, will relate mainly to the mode by which a stop or limit is to be put to that migration. It has been said that it can only be done by the negotiation of a new treaty. I do not know that that proposition has been distinctly advocated upon this floor, but if it does lurk in the mind of any Senator, I beg him to listen to the very few observations that I have to make upon it. To me it seems perfectly clear that the proposition can not for a moment be sustained, and that it would be ruinous to this country or to any other to hold that a treaty can only be put an end to by the negotiation of another, for that would put you completely at the mercy of the party with whom you had negotiated a treaty. Take, for instance, this very case. If we can only put an end to this treaty by negotiating a new treaty with China, then it is in the power of China, by refusing to negotiate a new treaty, or such a one as we desire, to hold us to this treaty, however detrimental to our interests it may be.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him if he knows of any one who holds that doctrine?

Mr. THURMAN. I said I did not know.

General Harrison had not been discovered at that time. [Laughter and applause on Democratic side.]

Mr. Thurman continuing, said:

Treaties are like partnerships. There is no such thing as an indissoluble partnership. There is no such thing as an indissoluble treaty. Either party may declare it abrogated.

I say, therefore, Mr. President, that the true way is, there having been no modification of this treaty by the treaty-making power, and, so far as we know, no attempt having been made to modify it, there having been nothing of that kind done, many, many years having elapsed since the treaty was made and the evils growing every year greater and greater, and the danger to which we are exposed by this migration becoming every year more and more imminent, it is now the duty of Congress without delay to take this matter in hand.

[Applause on Democratic side.]

Could there have been a doubt in the mind of any Senator or any other person upon this question? There was nothing left for Congress to do but to pass the bill and repeal the provisions of the treaty. The Republican administration, the treaty-making power, for ten years had ignored the appeals of all classes and failed to take any steps whatever. The Democratic party and its representatives were not so tender of the feelings of the Chinese Government that they were willing to longer tolerate this abomination. Our own citizens were the sufferers; their rights were in peril, and it was no time to stop to see whether the proposed measure for their relief met the approval of the good graces of the Emperor of China or not. House bill No. 2423, to restrict Chinese emigration, by limiting the number of emigrants to be transported by vessels to the United States to fifteen each trip, passed the House of Representatives on the 28th of January, 1879, by the following vote: Yeas—Democrats 104, Republicans 51, total 155. Nays—Republicans 56, Democrats 16, total 72.

A majority of the Republican members voted against the bill, while of the Democratic members more than six out of seven voted in favor of it. In the Senate the vote was as follows: Yeas—Democrats 22, Republicans 19, total 41. Nays—Republicans 20, Democrats 8, Independent 1, total 29. In order that there may be no controversy about the votes on this and other measures to which I shall call attention, I have here and shall append to my remarks a tabulated vote upon all of them.

This bill was vetoed by President Hayes. His objections were not that Congress had no power to enact such a law, but that it contravened articles 5 and 6 of the Burlingame treaty. Upon the question as to whether the bill should pass, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding, the vote in the House of Representatives was as follows: Yeas—Democrats 88, Republicans 22, total 110. Nays—Republicans 81, Democrats 15, total 96. Eighty-eight Democrats voted for its passage over the President's veto and only 15 against it; while 81 Republicans voted against its passage and only 22 for the same. The bill failed for the want of a two-thirds majority.

The Republican party not only prevented legislation on this subject as long as they had the power to do so, but when unable to longer suppress it a large majority of them voted against the proposed legislation, and, when defeated in Congress, the veto of the President was used as a last resort. The administration, in the fall of 1880, realized that something must be done; that public sentiment would no longer tolerate inaction. A new treaty was negotiated with China; or, more properly, the Burlingame treaty was modified so that the Government of the United States might regulate, limit, or suspend for a reasonable period the immigration of Chinese laborers.

Under this treaty, made on the 17th of September, 1880, we reacquired the power to limit or suspend the immigration of Chinese laborers for a reasonable period of time.

General Harrison became a member of the Senate on the 4th of March, 1881. The objections that had been urged against the bill in the prior Congress, namely, that it contravened our treaty stipulations, if there was the least excuse for them, did not, in the remotest degree, lie against a bill regulating, limiting, or suspending the immigration of Chinese laborers after the ratification of the new treaty. In conformity with the provisions of the modified treaty, Senator Miller, of California, introduced a bill (S. 71), the first section of which was as follows:

That from and after the expiration of ninety days next after the passage of this act and until the expiration of twenty years next after the passage of this act, the coming of Chinese laborers into the United States be, and the same is hereby, suspended; and during such suspension it shall not be lawful for any Chinese laborer to come or having so come after the expiration of ninety days to remain within the United States.

This was the first bill General Harrison was called to vote upon. Where were the treaty stipulations to be found that would be violated by its passage? If General Harrison was so firmly convinced that this bill would so violate our obligations that his conscience would not permit him to support it, why did he not rise in his place in the Senate and give to the country, and especially to his constituency at least, a brief statement of his objections? The opportunity was tendered to him. The gage of battle was thrown down by Senator MORGAN, of Alabama, who said:

Has the power been denied, or will any Senator here rise in his place and deny it, that the Congress of the United States by the enactment of a statute has the right to repeal any treaty that has been adopted and ratified by the treaty-making power?

Will any Senator undertake to say that the treaty-making power of this country is not after all subordinate to the legislative power? If he does he will deny the whole legislative history of our country, and he will set aside and hold for naught the opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States. It is the right and province of the legislative power of this country to repeal treaties where they are found to contravene the best interests or general welfare of the people.

Was General Harrison's opposition because of the length of time proposed? There was no other conceivable objection. How conscientious he must have been. No matter what hardships were being inflicted upon American laborers; no matter what their sufferings might be, every doubt must be resolved in favor of the Chinese. Sir, had he borne a commission to the United States Senate from the Emperor of China instead of from the State of Indiana, he could not have served his majesty more faithfully or guarded with greater vigilance the interests of his subjects.

General Harrison's opposition to this measure was upon other grounds. The amended treaty was as plain as language could make it. The power to suspend the immigration of Chinese laborers was, in plain terms and express words, surrendered to the United States, and that was all that it proposed to do. If the time, in his judgment, was unreasonable, why did he not seek to shorten it? This shallow pretext that he now makes might be believed by members of his own party if his record upon the subject ended here, but it does not; his subsequent votes too clearly disclose the convictions he entertained and which influenced and controlled his actions.

It is not, however, with General Harrison alone that I am dealing, but with the Republican party as well. He entertained the views of his party upon this question. The opposition made to this measure by the leading Republican Senators was not that it was in violation of any treaty, but that it was in violation of the natural rights of the Chinese. Upon the passage of this bill in the Senate the vote was as follows: Yeas—Democrats 30, Republicans 8, total 38. Nays—Republicans 22, Democrat 1, Independent 1, total 24. In the House of Representatives it was as follows: Yeas—Democrats 98, Republicans 61, Independents 8, total 167. Nays—Republicans 62, Democrats 4, total, 66. If the gentleman from Nevada will cast his eyes over this vote he will find that in the Senate 22 Republican Senators voted against the bill and only 8 in favor of it, while in the House 61 members of his party supported it, and 62 voted against it, a majority of his party in both Houses voting against it. It, however, by Democratic support, passed, but fell a victim to the veto of President Arthur. In a short paragraph of the President's veto message may be found the secret of the opposition of himself and his party to this legislation. In speaking of the Chinese he said:

No one can say that the country has not profited by their work. They were largely instrumental in constructing the railways which connect the Atlantic with the Pacific. The States of the Pacific Slope are full of evidences of their industry.

Here, summed up in a few words, may be found the secret of the opposition of General Harrison and his Republican colleagues in the Senate to the bill.

Chinese labor was cheap; it was profitable; and the contractors, the manufacturers, and the owners of mines, who have always controlled the Republican party, wanted it and were loath to see it excluded from the country.

When the bill was returned to the Senate with the objections of the President the vote as to whether it should pass notwithstanding the same resulted as follows: Yeas—Democrats 31, Republicans 6, total 37. Nays—Republicans 28, Independent 1, total 29; Harrison voting in the negative.

The bill vetoed by President Arthur was then modified so that the suspension of immigration should be for ten instead of twenty years. This bill, which originated in the House, contained the following sections:

SEC. 14. That hereafter no State court or court of the United States shall admit Chinese to citizenship; and all laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

SEC. 15. That the words "Chinese laborers," wherever used in this act, shall be construed to mean both skilled and unskilled laborers and Chinese employed in mining.

This bill passed the House of Representatives by the following vote: Yeas—Democrats 103, Republicans 91, Greenbackers 7. Nays—Republicans 34, Democrats 3. This was the first and only vote, either in the House or the Senate, during this long struggle, in which a majority of the Republicans voted in favor of the suspension of emigration.

This bill was reported to the Senate and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. It was reported back at an early day, the committee proposing a number of amendments, amongst others to strike out sections 14 and 15. Section 15 simply provided that the words "Chinese laborers" should include both skilled and unskilled laborers and miners.

It was at this point and upon this amendment that General Harrison threw off that mantle of frigid silence which had continually concealed his great wisdom and statesmanship about which we hear so much of late. He could content himself no longer. His forbearance ceased at this attempt to include within the provisions of the law the skilled Chinaman who could delve in the mine, work upon the cigar-maker's bench, labor in the shoe factory and in the tailor shop. Rising from his place in the Senate, he said:

Will the Senator from Oregon allow me to make a suggestion to him? He read an extract from a paper to the effect that the word "laborers" as used in the treaty or as used in the law may be limited by a meaning applied to those who are unskilled. If the courts should so decide, giving that meaning to the word "laborers" as used in the treaty, would the Senator from Oregon be in favor of going beyond what we are authorized to do by our treaty?

Mr. Speaker, this, substantially, was all the utterance of this great statesman and extremely conscientious Senator to this entire legislation. How extremely careful of the interests of his Chinese constituency. The Chinese embassy, it had been stated, had no objection to that provision of the bill, but General Harrison could not think of allowing the same to be adopted. The sacred rights of the Chinamen were constantly before his mind. He could think of nothing else, could see nothing else. Why quibble over such a petty matter when the happiness, the welfare, and almost the life of American men and women depended upon the speedy adoption of some measure of relief? General Harrison knew, if he knew anything about law, that the definition, if too broad, could do no harm; he knew that words were more strictly construed in penal statutes than elsewhere, and that it was always safest, if words were used in such enactments in their broadest sense, to so define their meaning. He, however, was not alone upon this proposition. His Republican colleagues were nearly all with him. Upon the motion to strike out section 15 the vote stood as follows: Yeas—Republicans 31, Democrat 1, Independent 1, total 33. Nays—Democrats 29, Republicans 3, total 32. Harrison voted in the affirmative.

This amendment, although agreed to in Committee of the Whole, was rejected in the Senate, Harrison still voting in the affirmative. Upon the amendment to strike out section 14, which prohibited the courts from admitting Chinese to citizenship, the vote stood as follows: Yeas—Republicans 28, Democrat 1, Independent 1, total 30. Nays—Democrats 31, Republicans 5, total 36; Harrison voting in favor of the amendment. The vote upon the final passage of the bill in the Senate stood as follows: Yeas—Democrats 32, Republicans 9, Independent 1. Nays—Republicans 24, Democrat 1; Harrison voting against the bill. If the gentleman from Nevada will investigate the vote on the passage of this measure he will find that 24 Republican Senators voted against it, and only 9 for it. Mr. Speaker, does it require more proof to satisfy the great body of the American people as to grounds of the opposition of General Harrison and his party to this legislation?

It was not that they believed it a violation of existing treaties, but because they believed that Chinese laborers, skilled and unskilled, and all other classes, should have the right to come here, not only to labor, but to vote, to hold office, to legislate, to govern as well as be governed by American labor. What other motive influenced General Harrison to vote to admit them to citizenship? This section in no wise violated any provision of our treaty with China. It was to carry out and enforce such a provision. In all the later treaties made between the United States and China it had been expressly stipulated that nothing therein contained should be construed to confer the rights of citizenship upon the citizens of either in the other country. The late Mr. Orth, at the time a member of this House from Indiana, in speaking upon this subject, said:

He takes no interest in our Government! Do you mean by this that he does not immediately on his arrival repair to the "sand lots" of San Francisco and harangue the boisterous multitude upon their special duty on election days? This objection comes with a poor grace when it is known that we refuse to give him an interest in our Government or permit him to assume the rights and responsibilities of citizenship. We deny to him the rights which we cheerfully accord to every other immigrant, and, as if to emphasize this denial, the fifteenth section of this bill provides that hereafter no State court or court of the United States shall admit Chinese to citizenship, and all laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

Senator HOAR, of Massachusetts, April 25, 1882, said:

I will not deny to the Chinaman, any more than I will to the negro, or the Irishman, or Caucasian, the right to bring his labor, bring his own property to our shores and the right to fix such a price upon it as according to his own judgment and his own interest may seem to him best. I denounce this legislation not only as a violation of the ancient policy of the American Republic, not only as a violation of the rights of human nature itself, but especially as a departure from the doctrine to which the great party to which I belong is committed in its latest declaration of principles.

Here we have a clear and bold statement of the position of the Republican party upon this question. This statement was unchallenged. No Republican Senator repudiated it either for himself or his party. General Harrison heard, acquiesced, and accepted it as the reason for his opposition to the measure; and the paltry, trifling, and frivolous excuse he now attempts to make, in the hope of winning the support of the laboring classes he did not deign to consider for a moment in the dozen or more votes that he cast, will only subject him to greater ridicule and contempt. This is not all the evidence going to show that his opposition to this legislation was because he wished to open wide the doors to Chinese emigrants and to welcome them to full fellowship as citizens of this Republic.

In 1880 in the city of Indianapolis a number of Chinamen were induced by Republicans to declare their intentions of becoming citizens. Upon this declaration they were marched to the polls and voted the Republican ticket. That General Harrison was cognizant of the intentions of his party to vote these persons there can be no doubt. He was the candidate of his party for the United States Senate, active in politics, and the oaths were administered to them by his most intimate friend and loyal supporter. In addition to this it has been publicly charged in the Indianapolis Sentinel, and not denied by him, that during the agitation of this question he read a production before a literary club in that city advocating in strong terms the right of the Chinese to become citizens of the United States.

Why, Mr. Speaker, the Republican party had such a tender regard for the rights of the Chinese that it placed joss-sticks and joss-lights on the free-list while the Bible was made to bear a duty of 25 per cent. [Laughter and applause on Democratic side.]

I notice, however, that General Harrison and his friends offer another excuse for his position on this question. They say that he did not understand the question at the time, but that he has since learned all about it and is all right now. Of all the subterfuge that has been attempted this certainly is the shallowest. This question had engaged the serious attention of the American Congress, when he entered the Senate, for more than ten years.

In February, 1879, Mr. Thurman said in the Senate:

Mr. President, this is no new subject. It can not be contended for a moment that this subject is sprung upon the American Congress now for the first time. Every Senator who has held a place upon this floor from the Pacific coast since I have had the honor to sit here, without regard to his political proclivities, without regard to his party connections or affiliations, has been urging and earnestly urging upon us the enactment of some such law at this. I believe the same thing may be said of every Representative from the Pacific slope in the other branch of the Legislature. They have called our attention to it again and again; they have called it by resolutions; they have called our attention to it by the able arguments of their Senators and Representatives; they have called attention to it by their laws and their constitutional conventions; they have caused the two great political parties of this country to consider it in their national conventions. And it will not do to say now that this thing is sprung here in hot haste upon the Senate of the United States. It is time, in my judgment, Mr. President, for us to act upon it and now is the proper moment.

It had agitated the minds of the people and especially the laboring classes for over twelve years. General Harrison's entire absence of association with and want of sympathy for the great masses of the people may have destroyed his intuition of this question, but if he had never heard of the subject before he entered the Senate, he heard enough during the debate to have satisfied any person with one spark of sympathy for that class of our citizens who were compelled to earn their bread by the sweat of their brow. He may daily mount his platform during this campaign and declare "that the standard of American wages must be maintained," but I challenge any one to point out a single word or expression of sympathy by him for the wage-workers during this entire debate. From the beginning to the end he remained callous, heartless, and immovable to every appeal. [Applause.]

Senator JONES, of Nevada, presented the question of protection to our own laborers most eloquently and truthfully, and, coming from a Republican, there is a double significance and force in his language as applied to the present. He said:

I have noticed, Mr. President, that most of those who are in favor of the largest liberty being extended to the Chinese immigrant to this country are also in favor of a tariff—a tariff which has been urged as necessary to protect the American laborer from the degradation of competition with the pauper labor of Europe, as it is usually termed. In reality, if we may judge of their motives by the action of the men who are now advocating a tariff, it was not the American laborer they wished to protect against the pauper labor of Europe, but it was the American capitalist, the lordly manufacturer, that they wished to protect against the free competition of the capitalist of Europe. Our capitalist manufacturer wanted a larger interest on his money than the capitalist of Europe was willing to accept, and he was given the benefit of a tariff.

Let us see how that tariff works. It works in this wise, that everything that the capitalist manufacturer has to sell he sells in a protected market, he sells in a market in which foreign capitalists can not compete with him.

How is it with what he has to buy? For the principal article he has to buy—to wit, the labor of men—he demands free trade in the broadest sense, not only free trade in bringing in laborers of our own race who can soon accommodate themselves to our conditions of life, but the bringing in a class of laborers who have been inured to poverty by thousands of years of training. The capitalist asks the broadest free trade for that, his own market in any event being protected.

Now, how is it with the laborer? Everything he wants to buy he has to buy from his capitalist master in a protected market; everything he has to sell, to wit, his labor (and, unlike the capitalist, he can not hold it away from sale; unlike the capitalist, he can not wait for better times, or travel here and there where he pleases to sell it, but he must sell it every day), he must sell in the openest market in the world. This is the theory in favor of the laborer that the gentleman [Mr. DAWES, of Massachusetts] propounds to us. We reject it, and by this bill propose to bar out this degrading, this shocking competition with our own people. And yet he tells us we are striking a blow at labor, that we are proposing to inflict injury on the laborers of our country.

Ah! sir, when the artisans and laborers of this country shall be made to understand that they are subjected to free trade in labor they will demand as one of the conditions of their existence that they shall have an open market in which to buy that which they want if it is an open market in which they must sell their labor, the only thing they have to sell. They will never consent to a tariff on bales and boxes and hampers of goods coupled with free trade in human brain and muscle.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] told us that he wanted the American people to know that this bill was a blow struck at labor. Yes, sir, it is a blow struck at degraded, underpaid, underclothed, underfed labor, and it is a blow in favor of that fair remuneration which the forces of our civilization up to this hour have decreed that the laborer should get.

Senator GEORGE, of Mississippi, presented the question with a fervor and sentiment that would have aroused the innermost feelings of the very soul of a man who had one atom of sympathy for those doomed to endless toil. He said:

It will really and truly protect American labor. It furnishes no sham protection in the shape of a tax levied on all the labor of the country for the benefit of the capitalist, in the hope (often, if not always, a vain one) that he will divide it and give some small part to that inconsiderable number of laborers whom he employs.

This bill protects the American laborer directly and clearly, and not in a roundabout and second-hand way. It gives this protection by its own force and the vigor of its own beneficent provisions, independent of either the magnanimity or the charity of another, and that other too directly interested in withholding the protection.

As so well shown in the very able and exhaustive discussion of this subject by the Senator from California [Mr. Miller], the Chinese laborer has an advantage over the American laborer. This is an undue advantage. It does not arise from superior industry, larger intelligence, or greater skill. It comes from the simple fact that the one is an American citizen, with the hopes and aspirations of an American citizen, and charged with the performance of the high duties to his country and his family incident to American citizenship; the other has none of these. For ages he has from necessity been inured to that hard and scanty sort of living, joined to incessant toil, which barely supports life. To compete with him the American laborer must be reduced to the same standard of living, condemned to the same ceaseless toil.

Are we prepared, sir, to invite the American laborer to this competition—to yoke him with this fellow to plow the fields, delve in the mine, or work in the shops of capital seeking the cheapest labor? Sir, we want no such laborers, either foreign or native. We want no class that can or will accept the bare necessaries of life only as the price of its labor. We want no class to whose vision is forever closed all prospect of advancement, comfort, independence, and progress. If there be such now anywhere in this broad land, it would be our first and highest duty, so far as we had constitutional power, to lift the dark veil of despair which shuts out the prospect of elevation and advancement. It is our duty to dignify and ennoble labor, not to debase and degrade it.

* * * * * * *

It is, sir, in my judgment, our duty to pass this bill. To reject it is to invite to our shores millions of an inferior and degraded race to drag down to their own level the American laborer.

Here was General Harrison's opportunity to show his sympathy for the wage-earners of his own country. Here was a test. He refused to recognize them in a time of need and they will not accept his company now, however much he may boast of his friendship for their cause. Their motto is to put none but tried and true on guard. Mr. Coghlan, of California, tersely but truly stated the real animus of the opposition of the Republican party to this legislation when he said:

But the opposition to this bill which I most fear comes neither from ignorance of the enormities of the Chinese slave-trade nor from a misapprehension of the character of the Chinese. It comes from the capitalists' cry that the influx of Chinese cheapens the wages of labor. This is the true enemy of this bill, let gentlemen sugar-coat it as they will.

Mr. Speaker, the injuries inflicted upon the working men and women of California can not well be conceived by those of us whose States and cities have never been blighted by this immigration. They constitute about one-fourth of the working population of San Francisco to-day. In the manufacture of clothing, cigars, boots and shoes, and in fact in all the industries, they are rapidly making their way and excluding American workmen from employment. From the report of the special committee of the board of supervisors of San Francisco in 1885 on the condition of the Chinese quarters I quote the following:

In the manufacture of clothing, ladies' underwear, shirts, etc., 1,245 sewing machines are kept actively at work all operated by male laborers with a skill that is equal to the best efforts of the American woman, as well as the American man, in this direction, and all run with such quick-handed, untiring energy, that it suggests one of the most curious physiological problems of the day to understand how a people, nurtured and fed as they are, can possess the vitality and physical force necessary to the results which they achieve in this direction.

Most of this labor is carried on by "piece work" and to fill orders for large "down-town commercial houses" engaged in the sale of the class of goods thus produced. The heavy, strong-stitched jean overalls which find so large a market on the coast are made by the Chinese workmen at the rate of about 55 cents per dozen pairs. The work thus produced—at a price which would reduce the American worker, male and female, to a lower level than the "woman" in "The Song of the Shirt"—the Chinaman thrives upon and is prosperous and happy. But it is a prosperity and happiness that is based upon a mode of life that a homeless cur upon the streets might not envy, upon which the American laborer could not exist until a succession of generations had so brutalized and blunted his race proclivities that he had degenerated into a condition worse than barbarism and become a curse to civilization, instead of what he is to-day, the vital strength of a nation.

We are now told, however, that in 1884 and in 1886 the Senate passed measures to restrict the immigration of Chinese, and that General Harrison did not oppose them, and that his silence should be accepted as an indorsement of them. What strange logic! If he had changed his opinions, if he had acquired new light on this question, is it not more reasonable that he would have said so than that he would have mutely disavowed his long-cherished principles and stultified his most conspicuous record?

His friends are boastful of his powers of speech—they say he is no Lilliputian—yet upon these occasions upon a matter of great interest and importance he did not open his mouth to explain his position when the action of the Senate was to be in direct contravention of his principles and his record. Sir, this is but a poor apology to those whose interests were so vitally affected by this immigration and who had won their victory in spite of the opposition of General Harrison and a majority of his party.

The passage of the act of 1882 forever settled the policy of this Government upon the subject of Chinese immigration. Since then no Representative or Senator has raised his voice in favor of it. General Harrison knew in 1886 that more than twenty-five thousand organized wage-workers in Indiana were, without regard to their political opinions, opposed to this immigration, and as a candidate for re-election to the Senate he dared not even call attention to his former votes, much less again place himself on record as favorable to it, so he silently let the bills pass. Whether he voted for them or against them, or whether he slipped into the cloak-room and did not vote at all, the records do not disclose. Is it possible that a record of more than a dozen votes against the restriction of this immigration and two in favor of conferring the rights of citizenship upon these people vanishes upon the mere silence of this august personage?

The Republican members of the Senate never passed a measure restricting this immigration or permitted one to pass until a majority of their votes were recorded against it, until after the act of 1882 became a law, but since then they have been swift to legislate upon this question. The bill under consideration, if it had been passed by the House as it came from the Senate, would have left us without any law whatever upon the subject except at the pleasure of the Chinese Government. Instantly it would have repealed existing laws, while its other provisions would not have taken effect until the Chinese Government ratified the pending treaty.

The bill under consideration is in conformity with a treaty negotiated by our Government with China on the 12th of March last. The first section of the proposed treaty provides—

That for a period of twenty years, beginning with the date of the exchange of the ratifications of this convention, the coming, except under the conditions hereinafter specified, of Chinese laborers to the United States shall be absolutely prohibited.

The Senate amended this section by adding the following:

And this prohibition shall extend to the return of Chinese laborers who are not now in the United States, whether holding return certificates under existing laws or not.

The treaty as first negotiated was certainly strong enough in its provisions. It was satisfactory to everybody who for twenty years had been contending for a prohibition of this immigration, but it seems that its terms were not sufficient to satisfy the Republican members of the Senate, who had up to that time opposed every measure of restriction. That this amendment has had a reverse effect to its provisions is perfectly evident. By its adoption the treaty had to be again sent to the Chinese Goverament for ratification in its amended form. That Government can withhold its ratification until every Chinaman holding a return certificate gets back. The complaints are numerous that our present laws are not effective, and that Chinese laborers are coming in daily in violation of them. The delay, therefore, occasioned by the Senate amendment, will not only let all those that hold certificates have time to return, but will also allow all those that may be able to get in in violation of law. Its adoption has therefore resulted in increasing instead of restricting the number of immigrants.

The Senate is so earnest in its efforts to now exclude the Chinese that it can not wait for a ratification of the treaty, but has passed this bill to take effect upon the happening of that event. They refused to even consider a measure to regulate this evil for ten years. I have shown that bill after bill was introduced in the Senate from 1869 to 1879, and not one of them was even taken up and considered. A large majority of the Republican members of that body voted against the bills to suspend immigration for twenty and ten years, as I have specifically shown, and upon the grounds that the Chinese had a natural right to come here and to bring their property and to work at what and for what they chose. But now that the Chinese have consented to remain away for twenty years, they can not wait for that Government to ratify the treaty before passing a law to enforce its provisions.

What, Mr. Speaker, has brought about this sudden change? Why this abandonment, without a struggle and without a word, of the great principles of the Republican party for which the Senator from Massachusetts so earnestly contended.

I have searched the records but can find no expressions of repentance, no confessions of sins, no prayers for forgiveness—all is darkness. Can it be, Mr. Speaker, that this great, sudden, silent and mysterious change has taken place because an election is to be held in the coming November.

I hope this bill will unanimously pass. The Democratic members of this House can give it an earnest support without swallowing their words or stultifying their records. [Great applause on Democratic side.]

Vote in the House of Representatives, January 28, 1879, on the bill (H. R. No. 2423) to restrict Chinese immigration.

YEAS.

The following sections were in the above bill (H. R. No. 5804) when sent to a Republican Senate by a Democratic House of Representatives:

"SEC. 14. That hereafter no State court or court of the United States shall admit Chinese to citizenship; and all laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

"SEC. 15. That the words 'Chinese laborers,' wherever used in this act, shall be construed to mean both skilled and unskilled laborers and Chinese employed in mining."

The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations recommended that the above sections be stricken from the bill.

On April 25, 1882, when section 14 of the bill was reached, Senator Farley, of California, said:

"I hope that amendment [to strike out] will not be adopted. For many reasons I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate just now in the discussion of this amendment. At the time that it was put into the first bill I know that some distinguished Senators took the ground that there was no necessity for this provision because the statute already provided for it. But, notwithstanding that statute, the courts have been naturalizing Chinamen; and I shall insist on the rejection of the amendment at this time."

The vote on the amendment to strike out section 14 was then taken, as follows:

So the amendment to strike out section 14 was rejected.

The next amendment reported by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations was to strike out section 15.

On this amendment Senator Grover, of Oregon, said:

"I hope this amendment will not be agreed to. The Chinese embassy declare that they do not desire that artisans shall be excluded. This is proposed to exclude the artisans. If they are not excluded by the terms of this bill it will be found that nearly every Chinaman desiring to come to the United States will claim to be an artisan, and they will all be admitted; and thus the purposes of the late treaty will be avoided and the purposes of the bill will be avoided, unless this amendment is disagreed to."

The vote on the amendment to strike out section 15 was then taken, as follows:

"I give notice that I will reserve a vote on the question concerning skilled and unskilled laborers when the bill comes up in the Senate."

† Vote to pass Senate bill No. 71 over President Arthur's veto.
‡ Vote to pass House bill No. 2423 over President Hayes's veto.

Mr. HITT obtained the floor.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] a question.

Mr. HITT. Certainly.

Mr. DINGLEY. While the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] was speaking I attempted to ask him a question, but he declined to yield to me for that purpose, not having time then to answer it. I wish now to repeat that question.

I noticed the gentleman from Indiana, in describing the want of forwardness on the part of the Republican party in taking action against Chinese immigration, stopped at 1879. I now wish to ask the gentleman whether from 1879 to 1881, when the Democratic party had control of the Senate and House, this much-desired legislation was carried out?

Mr. BYNUM. I have not investigated the records [laughter and applause on the Republican side], but I wish to say to the gentleman from Maine——

Mr. DINGLEY. I observe——

Mr. BYNUM. Just wait; let me answer you, as you have asked me the question and yielded me the floor for that purpose. The question was not brought up by any of the Representatives of the Pacific Slope during that time nor any other member, for the reason, I presume, that President Hayes was hostile to the legislation.

Mr. DINGLEY. It was. The gentleman from California, Mr. Page, introduced a bill into this House, but that bill was not enacted into law by the House and Senate at that time, although the Democrats had control of both Houses. No Democrat asked for its consideration. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BYNUM. It was because the vetoes of the Republican President had cut off all such legislation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DINGLEY. No, the bill was vetoed in 1882. I am speaking of the years 1879 to 1881, when the Democrats had control of the two Houses, in both the Senate and House, and when no Democrat undertook to legislate on the subject.

Mr. BYNUM. President Hayes vetoed the first bill in March, 1879; he continued to occupy the executive chair till March 4, 1881. The Congress next after Garfield's inauguration did not assemble till December, 1881, and the bill suspending immigration for twenty years was passed in March, 1882. If the gentleman will look at the votes in the two Houses on those bills he will find that the majority of the Republicans voted against the passage of those bills, while the majority of the Democrats voted in favor of them. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to that fact. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WEBER. I should like to ask a question if the gentleman from Illinois will permit me. It is in connection with the statement which is made by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. HITT. Certainly.

Mr. WEBER. I understood the gentleman from Maine to say that during the years 1879 and 1881 both Houses of Congress were in the hands of the Democratic party.

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes, both Houses; the Senate by a majority of 8 or 9, and the House by a large majority.

Mr. WEBER. I do not know whether that is so or not, but I wish to ask whether the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] did not get his information from the Speaker of this House, who in the October number of the Forum made the statement that not since the close of the war did the Democratic party have control of both Houses of Congress at the same time.

And if the gentleman is right, it will be in order to have that correction made, so that the country may be undeceived.

Mr. DINGLEY. In the Forty-sixth Congress the Democrats had the control both of the Senate and the House.

Mr. BYNUM. The majority in the Senate in favor of the Democrats was obtained by the vote of Senator Davis. That is my recollection. Our majority was never as great as stated by the gentleman from Maine. No action was taken, I presume, because of the opposition of President Hayes. Even the members from the Pacific Slope seemed not to have urged legislation during this period.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. BYNUM. It was a very slight majority. Judge Davis was elected as President of the Senate and voted with the Democrats upon most questions, but upon the Chinese question he voted mostly with the Republicans.

Mr. DINGLEY. Senator Davis held the balance of power in the Senate in the Forty-seventh Congress, but in the Forty-sixth Congress, from 1879 to 1881, the Democrats had a majority of 7 in the Senate, and yet there was no attempt to carry out this legislation.

Mr. CANNON. I want to ask the gentleman a question in that line. The treaty negotiated while Mr. Evarts was Secretary of State was concluded on the 17th of November, 1880, when this same Democratic Congress was in existence, and remained in existence until the 4th of March, 1881. Now, then, as stated by the gentleman from California [Mr. MORROW], there was no legislation to enforce the provisions of the treaty until 1882, and the Chinese came and went practically at will, while within thirty days after that treaty was concluded a Democratic Congress met and remained in session until the subsequent 4th of March and never even attempted to originate any legislation upon that subject. I ask the gentleman, why did he not refer to that omission?

Mr. HITT. I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. FELTON]; but if the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] desires to respond, I will yield to him.

Mr. BYNUM. I do not think there is anything to respond to. I am not here to respond to what was not done. I am charging what was done by the Republican party, and the mere fact that no action was taken during a certain period is no answer to the charge of the continued opposition of the Republican party to this legislation.

Mr. KERR. To charge upon the Republican party what it did not do.

[Mr. FELTON withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. HITT. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OWEN].

[Mr. OWEN withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. CANNON. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] to yield to me.

Mr. HITT. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will yield to me I will move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MCCREARY rose.

Mr. CANNON. I do not want to take the motion out of the mouth of the gentleman from Kentucky who has the bill in charge.

Mr. MCCREARY. Do I understand that the gentleman yields me the floor?

Mr. CANNON. I yield the floor for you to make that motion.

Mr. MCCREARY. I supposed that we might make some arrangement this evening about closing the debate. This bill was brought in here from the Senate. It was stated that it was very important that there should be immediate action upon it, and an effort was made to have a vote upon it without referring it to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The Committee on Foreign Affairs reported the bill with an amendment, and I desire that the bill shall be voted upon. It is important that it should be disposed of at an early day, and we should vote upon this so that the bill and amendment could go back to the Senate. Now I suggest to gentlemen on the other side that we agree to a time when we shall take a vote upon the measure.

Mr. HITT. There are gentlemen not now present, but who have left the House, and who desire to speak upon this bill, and I would not want to cut them off.

Mr. MCCREARY. I would propose that debate be limited to two hours—one hour on each side.

Mr. MORROW. That is not fair.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I desire to say a word in answer to the gentleman who has charge of this bill.

Mr. MCCREARY. I did not yield the floor; but I will yield in order that the gentleman may make a statement.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I think the time should not be fixed limiting debate on this measure at the present time. At 3 o'clock to-day we were prepared to vote upon this question and get rid of this bill, but for political purposes the gentleman permitted gentlemen on his side of the House who were not members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs to make political speeches.

Now, it seems that until gentlemen on our side shall have time to look around and see who shall speak, the debate should not be closed. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MCCREARY. Does the gentleman concede that they are in trouble over there? [Renewed laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I believe I can make a suggestion ——

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I demand the regular order.

Mr. MCCREARY. I then give notice that after debate has proceeded for two hours longer on this bill I shall move the previous question.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. The gentleman from Kentucky has yielded the floor for me to make a suggestion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state the time that has been consumed in the debate and what is remaining. The gentleman from California [Mr. MORROW] has five minutes of his hour remaining. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT], from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, has fifteen minutes of his hour remaining; and as between one side and the other, the Republican side has exhausted one hundred minutes and the Democratic side one hundred and fifty minutes.

Mr. MCCREARY. I desire to raise this point of order here: I was in charge of this bill and I was entitled to the floor. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] yielded to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] for debate, and he then moved the adjournment of the House. I hold, sir, that under the rules of the House I am entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois was entitled to the floor and yielded it.

Mr. MCCREARY. But did he have the right to make the motion to adjourn?

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] yielded the floor to me, and I yielded it to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] for him to make that motion.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. Will the gentleman yield to me——

Mr. MCCREARY. I take the floor in my own right and move to adjourn.

Mr. CANNON. I only rose for the purpose of making the motion to adjourn, and I make that motion now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pending that motion the Chair will lay before the House the following personal request:

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CANDLER asks leave of absence on urgent business.

There was no objection, and leave was granted as requested.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I ask unanimous consent to make a suggestion. My suggestion is that there seems to be no difficulty about the passage of this bill. Both sides of this House seem to have agreed that the bill is a good one and ought to pass, but both of them seem to be anxious to appear as the most earnest friend of the workingman. They are both in favor of passing this bill, and why not take it up and pass it now?

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

The question was taken on the motion to adjourn; and there were—ayes 50, noes 57.

Mr. BAYNE. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. BLAND (pending the report of the tellers). I move that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. That is a motion that I would like to occupy one or two minutes upon. [Laughter.]

Before the completion of the count by tellers, the hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the House under its previous order adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below:

By Mr. FITCH: A bill (H. R. 11204) for the relief of John Ziegeler—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SOWDEN: A bill (H. R. 11205) granting a pension to Solomon R. Ruch—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. A. C. THOMPSON: A bill (H. R. 11206) for the relief of Madison Wall—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BACON: Petition of William E. Tuttle, Jacob O. Polhnus, of Rockland County, New York, for the passage of the bill for the relief of Jessie Isherham—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BARNES: Papers in the case of Edward Gallaher, for relief—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. BELDEN: Petition of surviving soldiers and sailors of Cortland County, New York, asking passage of per diem pension bill—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. McCOMAS: Petition of Hiram B. Snirely and Albert G. Lovell, executors of George Snirely, deceased, of Washington County, Maryland, and of Joshua Ahalt, of Frederick County, Maryland—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, petition of 34 citizens of the Sixth Congressional district, Maryland, asking that the liquor-saloon nuisance be banished from the city of Washington—to the Select Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

By Mr. NEAL: Petition of administrator of Thomas McCallie, of Hamilton County, Tennessee—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. ROGERS: Petition of administrator of Henry N. McCray, deceased, late of Saline County, Arkansas—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. SOWDEN: Petition of Solomon R. Ruch, of the Tenth Congressional district of Pennsylvania, for pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SENATE.

MONDAY, August 20, 1888.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

Mr. HOAR called the Senate to order and said: The Secretary will read a communication from the President pro tempore of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK (Mr. C. W. JOHNSON) read as follows:

VICE-PRESIDENT'S CHAMBER, Washington, August 20, 1888.

I name the Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. HOAR, to perform the duties of the Chair to-day.

JOHN J. INGALLS,
President pro tempore.

Thereupon Mr. HOAR took the chair as Presiding Officer for to-day.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOAR) announced the signature by the President pro tempore of the following enrolled bills, which had previously been signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

A bill (H. R. 2190) granting a pension to Jane Smallridge;

A bill (H. R. 5155) granting a pension to John S. Bryant;

A bill (H. R. 5156) for the relief of Andrew R. G. Smith;

A bill (H. R. 5863) authorizing the Richmond and Danville Railroad Company to lay tracks, and so forth, in the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. 9263) granting a pension to Abraham J. Buckles;

A bill (H. R. 9363) granting a pension to Edwin J. Godfrey;

A bill (H. R. 9830) for the relief of Lachlan H. McIntosh; and

A bill (S. 94) for the relief of Perez Dickinson, surviving partner of the late firm of Cowan & Dickinson.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of August 13, 1888, correspondence and communications passing between the Department of Justice and any officer thereof and any officer under the Government of the United States in the State of New York since the 1st of January, 1887, on the subject of registration, elections, or any matter connected therewith, or with the conduct, duties, powers, or compensation of any such officer in respect of registration or election matters; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, inclosing a report from the Quartermaster-General concerning the amount due to the State of South Carolina for the rent of the Citadel Academy, etc.; which, on motion of Mr. HAMPTON, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PLUMB presented a petition of a large number of citizens of Saline County, Kansas, praying for certain amendments to the interstate-commerce law; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Las Vegas, N. Mex., praying that provision be made at the present session of Congress for the payment of Indian depredation claims filed in the Indian Bureau of the Interior Department by the pioneers and early settlers on the frontier; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. REAGAN presented a petition of 19 citizens of Eastland County, Texas, praying that provision be made for the payment of Indian depredation claims; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9423) to restore to the public domain and to regulate the sale and disposition of certain lands east of the Mississippi River, in the State of Mississippi, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. I am also directed by the Committee on Public Lands to report adversely bill (S. 3362) to restore to the public domain and to regulate the sale and disposition of certain lands east of the Mississippi River, in the State of Mississippi, it being on the same subject and in the same terms as the House bill just reported favorably. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TURPIE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 10525) to increase the pension of Edward Jardine;

A bill (H. R. 2908) to increase the pension of W. B. Stokes;

A bill (H. R. 5446) granting a pension to William H. Dowdall;

A bill (H. R. 9253) granting an increase of pension to Richard Hogan; and

A bill (H. R. 2120) granting a pension to Elizabeth Evans.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 2341) for the relief of Thomas Chambers, of Mackinac Island, Michigan; and

A bill (S. 3442) for the relief of E. R. Shipley.

GUSTAVUS W. SMITH.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. By direction of the Committee on the Judiciary I report favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 11062) for the removal of the political disabilities of Gustavus W. Smith; and I ask that it may be considered at the present time.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed (two-thirds of the Senators present voting in the affirmative).

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 3461) granting a pension to Harrison Landsdown; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3462) granting a pension to John Watson; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SAWYER introduced a bill (S. 3463) granting a pension to Patrick H. McNamee; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLAIR (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3464) requiring the removal, by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, of breweries for the manufacture of beer or malt liquors beyond Boundary street, in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 3465) to regulate tonnage and other charges on foreign vessels in the ports of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENT TO THE FORTIFICATION BILL.

Mr. TELLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the fortification appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no concurrent and other resolutions, the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from Friday last; which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. EDMUNDS August 15, 1888, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and it hereby is, instructed to inquire into the matter of deposits in the late Freedman's Savings and Trust Company of Washington, and report how many white depositors of said company there are who were in no way connected with the alleged mismanagement and failure of said company and the amount of deposits due to them respectively.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. BECK. That resolution was offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS]. I stated the other day as fully as I cared to do so the reasons why I thought the matter should not be referred to the Committee on Finance, and why nothing more ought to be done about the Freedman's Bank in the way of extension to white depositors. As the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] is not here this morning, I ask that the resolution go over until he comes in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will go over if there be no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS entered the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] is now here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the Senate to take up the resolution about the deposits in the Freedman's Bank. I see that my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is here.

Mr. BECK. I only asked that the resolution might be passed over until the Senator from Vermont came in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, I see.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the resolution will be again laid before the Senate. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I wish to make an appeal to my friend from Kentucky, as representing the Committee on Finance, to allow this resolution to be adopted, so that the committee may inquire into the matter. I do it upon this ground, which I press upon his consideration with absolute confidence, that when he examines the statute of 1865, which is the foundation of this institution, and examines the decisions of the Supreme Court upon precisely analogous questions as to the powers of corporations whose general object, as is the language of the act of 1865, is to receive the deposits of those who had been slaves and their descendants, on that examination I am confident that my friend from Kentucky will be perfectly convinced that the deposits of the poor white depositors were perfectly lawfully made and perfectly lawfully received, as at least a half dozen of these poor people have written to me and come to see me personally since the matter came up, stating that they were led to make these deposits in what they supposed, just as the colored people did, to be a Government institution, relying, just as the colored people did, upon the fact that the Government had the control of it, that the money was going to be invested in Government bonds, and so on, and that they would be perfectly safe.

If that turns out to be true, and my view of the legal construction (saying nothing about the morals of it, if these people were led in this way) is correct, as I am confident it is, and as the action of the Departments winding it up, and of the President in his message, make no distinction in reference to the rights, moral or legal, then I think it is not asking too much of my honorable friend and of that committee to make an inquiry and ascertain the number of these few, poor, sorrowful, broken-down persons who were taken in by the management of that bank, just as the colored people were; and if the committee are satisfied that in point of law and in point of moral justice the whites should not be excluded who were innocent and small depositors, they should make provision as readily as they would for the colored depositors.

That is the object of the resolution, and I should hope that the committee would be willing to have it sent to them for that purpose.

Mr. BECK. I have no objection, of course, to the reference, but I am very clear that any attempt to extend the relief beyond persons who were provided for by the act of 1865, for the reasons set forth in the report of the commissioner, will mean its absolute defeat to everybody. After full conversation with the Comptroller and a pretty thorough examination, I do not want the bill which we have passed to be defeated by any attempt to do something which will turn out to be ineffective and only result in the defeat of it. That is the only objection I had to the inquiry. Of course I make no objection to the reference of the question to the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

CLAIMS OF POSTMASTERS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate another resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. PLUMB August 16, 1888, as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be directed to report to the Senate at the next session, so far as such claims have already been computed upon applications presented under the act of March 3, 1883, the amounts due postmasters and their representatives in the several States and Territories for services rendered the United States between July 1, 1864, and July 1, 1874, the gross amount of earnings for each biennial term of service to be stated on the basis of the act of 1854, and the amount of compensation paid for the same term of service to be deducted therefrom, showing the actual difference in each case between the salary paid and the compensation computed on the basis of the act of 1854 for each biennial term of service; such report to be limited to cases in which the compensation paid is 10 per cent. or more less than the compensation already computed on the basis of the act of 1854, and to be made to the Senate from time to time as the statement covering the claims from each State shall be completed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had appointed Mr. FORNEY, Mr. BURNES, and Mr. RYAN managers at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10540) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1761) for the relief of the First National Bank of Oregon for money advanced the Oregon Iron Works, the contractor in building the United States revenue-cutter Thomas Corwin, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the said bill and the amendments, and had appointed Mr. TAULBEE, Mr. HERMANN, and Mr. BIGGS managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 751) for the relief of the estate of J. J. Pulliam, deceased, with amendments in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

CLAIMS FOR COMMISSARY AND QUARTERMASTER'S STORES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate another resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. SPOONER August 17, 1888, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to the Senate, at the earliest practicable date, a list of the claims for commissary and quartermaster's supplies and stores, and for fuel, fences, and other property, alleged to have been taken and used by the armies of the United States during the late rebellion, upon which there has been adverse departmental action, with the names of claimants, alphabetically arranged, the State of the claimant's residence, and the nature and amount of each claim.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am inclined to think that it would be better to make the resolution specific. It reads: "A list of the claims for commissary and quartermaster's supplies and stores, and for fuel, fences, and other property, alleged to have been taken and used by the armies of the United States during the late rebellion." I think it would probably be better to add, after the word "rebellion," the words "and presented to the departments under the act of July 4, 1864," so that there will be a limit. I know that is the object of the Senator from Wisconsin, and I think that amendment had probably better be made.

Mr. SPOONER. All I want is that the Committee on Claims of the Senate and the Committee on Claims of the House shall have in convenient form, for easy and ready reference, every claim, under whatever act it may have been presented, for quartermaster's stores and commissary's supplies growing out of the war which has been adversely acted upon by the Department.

The suggestion of the Senator from Missouri limits the scope of the resolution in a way which perhaps might defeat the accomplishment in part of the purpose which I desire to accomplish. There may be a great many claims which have been presented and which will now be presented before Congress which were not presented under the act to which the Senator refers, which were nevertheless fairly investigated and fairly considered, and probably justly decided. The Senator from Missouri, I think, is in entire sympathy with the purpose I desire to subserve.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no doubt but that Congress ought to have before it the information. There is no question on that point at all; but the only law which authorized claims for commissary and quartermaster's stores in the non-insurrectionary States was the law of July 4, 1864. In the insurrectionary States all claims were required to be filed before the Southern Claims Commission. I do not know how it is, but I think there might be quite a number of claims in the insurrectionary States filed before the Quartermaster-General and the Commissary-General which were rejected or disallowed simply because they had no jurisdiction.

Mr. SPOONER. That would not go to the merit of the claim at all.

Mr. COCKRELL. But it would be difficut to set out that fact as the reason of the rejection.

Mr. SPOONER. I want information of each claim which has been acted upon, however it originated, by the department, which has been adversely decided. We can investigate afterwards the ground upon which the decision was made, and if it was made upon ground which does not go to the merits of the claim at all of course it will have no weight.

My friend will see that if the only claims which have been investigated by the department are those which were presented under the law to which he refers, the amendment he suggests is unnecessary, because the report of the department will only embrace such claims. But if, in addition to claims presented under that act, there are a large number of other claims which were presented and of which the department took jurisdiction, which they investigated and which they have passed upon adversely, we ought to have a list of those claims, notwithstanding they were not presented under the law to which the Senator refers.

Mr. COCKRELL. The trouble will be the delay and the additional labor. Under the law of July 4, 1864, there were about sixty thousand claims filed before the Quartermaster-General. That is a very large number, and it will take an immense work to furnish them; but they have all those arranged in order. They have books in which they are already kept; they have them bound. I have been in the office of the Quartermaster-General and seen them; they are immense volumes. The report called for here will comprise four or five large volumes.

About forty-five thousand claims have been rejected by the Quartermaster-General, and probably seven thousand or eight thousand claims have been rejected by the Commissary General, making over fifty thousand claims which have been rejected by the two offices. They have all those claims already arranged in good order; but if you bring in other claims it will cause them to overhaul all their records and mix them up unless they keep them entirely separate.

The claims under the law of July 4, 1864, ought certainly to be reported to us separately, even if the other claims are reported. That is the point I want to get at. I want to get at those claims in the order in which they stand, so that they can be quickly and conveniently furnished.

Mr. SPOONER. The state of facts out of which grows the necessity for this information is one which perhaps I may properly bring to the attention of the Senate.

The Senator from Missouri states correctly (and his statements are usually accurate) that there have been rejected by the Quartermaster's Department about 45,000 of these Southern claims. There were rejected also by the Commissary of Subsistence about 10,000 of those claims. That makes 55,000 claims made by alleged loyal claimants in Tennessee and other States called "non-insurrectionary" States which have been carefully investigated by the department and rejected. Under the law as it stands to-day bills for the payment of these rejected claims are introduced in Congress accompanied by petitions very simple in form; they are referred to the committee, and referred by the committee to the Court of Claims for investigation. Sixteen hundred of these claims were referred to the Court of Claims by the War Claims Committee of the House and the Committee on Claims of the Senate in the last Congress, and 4,000 of them have been referred to the Court of Claims at this session of Congress, mostly by the committee in the House of Representatives.

It will happen, unless some means are taken to prevent it, that every one of these claims presented under law to the department, investigated by the department, and decided upon adversely by the department will be referred to the Court of Claims by Congressional committees, and bills based upon the reports from that court will be passed by Congress, so that notwithstanding the adverse action of the department they will all be paid.

I have looked somewhat into the methods by which these claims are investigated in the Court of Claims. What I say does not reflect at all upon the court, because the court must pass upon the evidence which is presented to it. It is not the function or the duty of the court to hunt up witnesses or superintend the taking of testimony. In many of the cases which I have examined, cases which have been reported upon by the court, I have gone to the trouble to go through all the testimony, which in some cases is very elaborate, and given attention to the method in which the witnesses were examined and cross-examined, so as to see to what extent and with what efficiency the interest of the Government was represented; and I will venture to say that no citizen of the United States would be willing to pay a claim adjudicated against him upon such testimony, testimony so produced, elicited by such methods of examination and cross-examination, as those which in most of the cases I have examined are the foundation of large claims against the Government.

Some of these claims have been investigated by the Quartermaster's Department and by the Commissary Department and reported adversely which probably are just claims, and there ought to be perhaps some method of reviewing the action of those departments upon them; but to-day the House of Representatives holds that as the Government has established a tribunal before which it invites its citizens to go it ought to be bound by the decision, and that therefore if the Court of Claims finds in favor of a claimant he should be paid.

There is great force in that position, but the trouble is in the proceedings out of court in obtaining the testimony upon which the court acts. I desire, however, that there shall be put in the hands of Senators and members of the House the list, alphabetically arranged, indicated by this resolution, to which one can easily turn, so that we may know whenever a claim of this character is presented and referred to the appropriate committee whether it has been acted upon by the department adversely. Then we can investigate without delay and easily the ground of the departmental action. That purpose is only subserved by having the resolution embrace cases which were presented to the departments under the law to which my friend refers and all others, because they all come to Congress, whether they were presented to the departments under the act of July 4, 1864, or not.

Mr. COCKRELL. We ought to have the information, and I will withdraw any objection so that the resolution may pass. I have no objection to the passage of the resolution. I only desired to make it more specific.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ESTATE OF J. J. PULLIAM.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 751) for the relief of the estate of J. J. Pulliam, deceased.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate non-concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives, insist on its disagreement, and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair appoints the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I ask that you leave the Senator from Tennessee off the conference. The bill was reported by the present occupant of the chair [Mr. HOAR], and I move that the present occupant of the chair be made the chairman of the Senate conferees.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had announced the appointment of Mr. THOMPSON, of California, in the place of Mr. BIGGS, excused, as one of the managers of the conference on the part of the House on the bill (H. R. 1761) for the relief of the First National Bank of Portland, Oregon, for money advanced the Oregon Iron Works, the contractor in building the United States revenue-cutter Thomas Corwin.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1761) for the relief of the First National Bank of Portland, Oregon, for money advanced the Oregon Iron Works, the contractor in building the United States revenue-cutter Thomas Corwin.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 8662) to accept and ratify an agreement made with the Shoshone and Bannack Indians for the surrender and relinquishment to the United States of a portion of the Fort Hall reservation, in the Territory of Idaho, for the purposes of a town site, and for the grant of a right of way through said reservation to the Utah and Northern Railway Company, and for other purposes.

CLAIMS OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I enter a motion to reconsider the resolution passed this morning, presented by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], in regard to requiring the Postmaster-General to furnish certain information. I ask that it may be reconsidered, and then I will enter a motion to refer it to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and let that stay on the Calendar.

Mr. HALE. Let the motion to reconsider pass, and then let the matter stand on the table until the Senator from Kansas is present.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, no; let the motion be entered, and then let it pass.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DAWES). The motion to reconsider will be entered.

AMENDMENT TO DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. CALL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. FRYE. On Friday an agreement was made that after discussion during Friday, Saturday, and Monday on the fisheries treaty the vote should be taken on Tuesday. Afterwards, on Friday, the Senate agreed to adjourn over Saturday, and it adjourned on Friday night right in the midst of the speech of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. While it was understood that the consideration of the fisheries treaty should be commenced at 1 o'clock each day, it seems to me just to the Senator from Alabama and proper that I should move now that the Senate go into executive session on the treaty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the fisheries treaty in open executive session.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOAR in the chair). The Chief Clerk will report the treaty by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. Treaty (Executive M) between United States and Great Britain concerning the interpretation of the convention of October 20, 1818, signed at Washington February 15, 1888.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, by the indulgence of the Senate on last Friday evening I was allowed to place in the RECORD some matters which have not been fully read to the Senate, and to which I shall have occasion to refer in the course of the remarks I shall submit this morning in the conclusion of my argument upon the treaty itself.

It is proper that I should reiterate that in the discussions in which I have participated heretofore upon this subject, after I had joined with my colleagues upon the minority of the committee in offering a report which set forth our views of the matters in this negotiation, I have not undertaken a consecutive discussion of what I conceive to be its real value, but I have followed other Senators along from time to time in such discursive movements as they saw proper to make in pursuit of what I regarded as irrelevant and unnecessary debate.

The facts which I put into the RECORD on Friday in continuation of the remarks I was then making are collected from sources that are entirely authentic. They are official sources, and I believe that no question can be made of their strict correctness. I laid before the Senate then a statement of the tonnage of American fishing vessels from 1818 to 1886, for each year, supposing that the presentation of the official records of the tonnage of our fishermen would perhaps show as well as any other fact to which I could advert the real progress of our fishing industry on our Northeastern coast; in the computation of our fisheries, their value, etc., and the tonnage engaged in them, I believe that our Government has never paid any attention to those local fisheries which are stretched around the coast, I will say from Rhode Island to Mexico, through which a vast amount of food is obtained for the support of the people of this country and some of other countries, and from which a great amount of money is earned annually, and which employ more than twice the number of fishermen that are engaged upon the New England coast.

A recurrence to that tonnage table I think will prove of considerable value in the proper investigation of this question. But it will be seen, Mr. President, by any person who may choose to make a critical and philosophical examination of the facts that are presented in these authentic returns, that the fishing industry does not depend and has never depended solely upon the legislation of the United States, nor solely upon the condition of our treaty relations with Great Britain or Canada, but has been controlled in a very large degree by the fluctuations that are incident to the migration of the fish themselves, fluctuations that are not to be accounted for, I believe, upon any well-established theory now, and which seem to be by scientific men who are engaged in those researches referred more particularly to the temperature of the waters in different seasons than to any other fact.

However that may be I think we have enough figures and facts collected here to show some important results. Much the largest tonnage in the fishing business was in the years 1861 to 1865, while the civil war was in progress. That might be considered a remarkable fact, especially as our fishermen were then exposed to the raids of men like Admiral Semmes and others, who were searching the seas for spoils; and moreover, that was at a time when the reciprocity of the treaty of 1854 was in full operation and there was no duty on any kind of fish imported from the Canadian provinces during that entire period. The tonnage ran up very rapidly indeed. In 1861, that is, the close of the year 1861, about the time the hostilities between the two sections of the American Union had become flagrant, the tonnage was 182,106; in 1862 it ran up to 203,459; in 1863 it was 157,579; in 1864 it was 148,244; in 1865 it was 100,436 tons.

Now, I infer—I think it is a legitimate inference also—that this increase in the tonnage of our fishing-ships at that time was due to the fact that there were very largely increased demands for food in the United States, and the prices had gone up in this country, causing capitalists to make larger ventures than they had before that time.

I refer to this more particularly for the purpose of showing that it is not the effect of our tariff legislation and not the effect of our treaty relations with the Canadian provinces that seems to accelerate or depress the fishing industries in this country. We must look deeper than that to reach these causes; and I think it is the demand for food more than anything else which creates the first incentive and the strongest inducement to these investments. Next to that, when a fine year comes for fishing in these waters and larger catches are made, it has the same effect upon the fishing industries that the discovery of a new bonanza has in some remote part of our country to which the men interested in mining rush immediately and make large investments of money and labor for the purpose of extracting ores.

It will not do to philosophize upon this subject as if the whole of the fishing industry was one of those permanent things upon which you can draw with something like the assurance of success and continued prosperity as we can, for instance, upon agriculture and stock-growing, or upon the manufacture of timber or the production of iron and steel, or any other industry where the basis of it is solid and firm and the demand is a continuing one without any serious fluctuations.

In 1857 the duty on fresh fish was 15 per cent.; under the Walker tariff of 1846 it was 20 per cent.; under the treaty of 1854 Canadian fish was free; under the acts of February, 1875, and 1883, fresh fish was free and is still free.

The duties on fish from Canada, 1854, the last year before the reciprocity treaty went into effect, were $178,816,20. In 1867, the first year after the treaty of 1854 had terminated, they were $349,758.21.

Who can account for that enormous fluctuation? Here, just at the beginning, we see a very great depression in the amount of duties collected, when, as I have said, the tariff on fish was 20 per cent., having been reduced from the Walker tariff of 1846 5 per cent.; then passing through the period of free fish covered by the treaty of 1854, when we arrive at 1867, the tariff on the termination of that treaty the very first year produced a revenue upon Canadian fish of $340,758.21.

In 1872–'73 the duties collected ran up to $372,090 on Canadian fish. In 1886–'87, the first year after the treaty of 1871 ceased, the duties on fish from all the Provinces ran down to $307,199.72. Our tonnage had then run down to 70,457 from 159,480 in 1853.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Alabama to the entire lack of safety in making deductions from fishery statistics in our country. In 1866 was the repeal of the bounty law, which, of course, must be taken into consideration. Then later than 1866 was an entire change in the method of measurement of vessels which decreased the tonnage of itself. Then again we have no statistics touching the vessels or the fisheries at all reliable. The United States has always neglected that branch of inquiry, and there never has been an expenditure provided for in an appropriation bill for fishery statistics until at this very session of Congress, when I had in the Senate an appropriation of $10,000 put on to obtain correct statistics as to the fisheries; while Canada, year after year, appropriates $75,000, and it was in that way she was enabled to overmatch us in one thing at Halifax, to overmatch us in arguments derived from statistics. I have investigated that carefully myself, and I became satisfied that arguments derived from these statistics were very uncertain and very strange, to say the least.

Mr. MORGAN. My attention was called to this subject by the frequent iterations of the Senator from Maine in the various discussions he has had of this question in the Senate, very able ones, too. I looked over the statistics he brought forward, on which he relied with great confidence to inform us on the merits and philosophy of our legislation and our treaty making and their effect upon the subject of the fisheries. I participate with the Senator somewhat in his distrust of the absolute accuracy of all these reports. At the same time the Senate and House of Representatives have resorted to the only means that were available to ascertain what are the true facts about this matter; and this table that I put in the RECORD on page 8447 is taken from Senate Committee Report No. 41, first session Thirty-sixth Congress, to 1849, and from House Executive Document 78, second session, Forty-ninth Congress, from 1850. So I suppose that these statements, which are the results of the labors of these committees, are perhaps accurate enough for the drawing of general conclusions about what ought to be and what is our true policy in respect of these very important matters.

But there is one fact undeniable, and that is that the amount of duty that we collect from the Canadians as you say, but as we say out of the people of the United States, from our tariff on fish imported from the British provinces is a very small sum of money. It is also a fact that the comparative amount of tonnage that we have employed in the fisheries through which we brought fish into the United States, of course free of duty, advanced very materially, being much larger during the first three years of the war than it was before or has ever been since.

These prominent facts, of course, are available in debate here and are reliable facts, although they may not be to a vulgar fraction absolutely correct. If the Senator from Maine can present anything in the nature of statements based upon authority more accurate than this, I shall be most happy to accept it and base any further argumentation I may make about this matter upon his own figures.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Maine can not, and it was only a pretty careful investigation of some statements which I made from the statistics themselves that led me to discover their weakness.

Right here the Senator finds a very heavy decline, I found an exceedingly heavy decline, a very sudden one, and I could not account for it. On further investigation I found that a large part of that decline was accounted for by a change in the measurement of vessels, and the Senator will find that to be the case on looking into it.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know how that may be. I am entirely ignorant of the methods of tonnage measurement, but I suppose the careful committees of the House and Senate have taken a matter of that sort into consideration, and I regret if they have not done it effectively in a matter so important, and so delicate, so as to have brought the matters before the American people in a definite and correct form in order to properly estimate the results that flow from it. I know the Senator from Maine will pardon me for allusion, based on clear facts, to the attitude of parties on this subject. In 1860, under Democratic rule, our fishing tonnage had gone up to 153,619 tons. In 1884, under Republican rule, it had gone down to 72,609 tons.

Am I not authorized to infer logically from this that the Republican method which was resorted to in the treaty of 1871 and under the tariff of 1872 and the tariff of 1883 has had the effect of depressing the tonnage and cutting down the fisheries? whereas if you refer to the tables

I have presented you will find that under the Democratic rule from 1830 on down to 1861 there was a constant progressive increase in the tonnage of the American fisheries; and there was during that time, also, a constant progressive reduction of the tariff—not a sudden one, not an abrogation of it entirely, but a constant reduction of the tariff; so that, while under the Walker tariff of 1846, about which Democrats are given a good deal to boasting and with a good deal of justice, the duty on fish was 20 per cent. ad valorem, the next succeeding tariff of 1857 reduced it to 15 per cent. ad valorem.

By the very latest official returns the amount of money we collect in duties from Canadian fish of all kinds is $307,199.22. The Senator from Maine was not satisfied with the investigation made of this subject by the Senator from Massachusetts who now occupies the chair [Mr. HOAR], and thought it must be at least $600,000, but the fact is, as proven from official records, as I have just reported it.

And this sum is alleged to be the true bone of contention over which all this agitation is taking place! I have not been able to believe that at all, and I think I am as nearly able to disprove it as any proposition of the very general character of this can be disproved by facts that are easily in reach and by comments that I will call attention to after awhile from men in the Dominion Parliament, who, I suppose—in fact, I know—are quite as well informed upon this subject as we are, and in the consultation of the interests of their own section and their own people they are perhaps as diligent and dutiful and patriotic as we are.

You should take from this sum of $307,199.22 the fish we do not catch in those waters, namely:

Anchovies, on which the duty collected by us is	$471.65
Salmon, which the treaty has never affected at all	9,438.92
All other varieties, not caught by us in those waters and imported here under duty, pay a duty of	49,722.38
Making, in all	59,632.95

Deduct this sum from the whole amount of duties on Canadian fish of every kind and description, $307,199.22, and we have $247,566.27 as the sum of annual duties over which we are quarreling. This, distributed over our fishing tonnage for 1886, would be a tax of about 3½ cents per ton. If we take from this 40 per cent. of the duty, the protection of which is enjoyed by Canadians who are engaged in these fisheries, the sum would amount to $99,026.48, which the Canadians receive in consequence of their being sharesmen in our fishing vessels. There is left $146,445 annually of what is called protection that goes to American owners of ships and American fishermen. That is all that is left. The balance of it goes to the Canadians. If half of this goes to the fishermen and half to the vessel, the ship-owners get the advantage of the protection of duties to the amount of $73,222, to be spread over 70,437 tons, a little more than 1 cent per ton per annum; and the fishermen divide amongst themselves—I do not know how many there are of them, probably now as many as twelve or fourteen thousand—the protection derived from the other $73,222.

Now, Mr. President, these facts reduce this controversy to a minimum. These facts show that two great nations like the United States and Great Britain are not actually engaged in the effort to remove duties from salt fish in all this imbroglio in which we have been for so many years involved, but we are now engaged in that sort of chaffing with each other which is very well suited to the sensibilities of the British-born and British-blooded people, whether they are found in America or anywhere else, which comes from standing upon the ninth part of a hair whenever our rights are supposed to be brought into question. We are not less guilty of this folly, if it be a folly, than the British people are, for we are bone and flesh with them and inherit their peculiarities; and after all, Mr. President, the controversy in this case is one of a mental or sentimental character. It is a polemical question rather than a practical question; it is something to which the prejudice of both sides of this line addresses itself with keen interest; it is something that can not be overlooked, because it touches upon the question of right, because it impinges upon the sense of honor. However foolish we may appear in the eyes of the sensible people of the world, it is nevertheless true that we are not quarreling about this little modicum of tax upon fish or the little protection that a ship gets of about 1 cent a ton per annum, under our present tariff law, or the distribution that our fishermen get annually, which would not perhaps amount to $3 a fisherman. That is not what these countries are quarreling about. The matter lies deeper than that. It is in the inveterate prejudice growing out of the great rivalry of these two eminent nations, who are moving step by step with irresistible power for the accomplishment of the dominion of this world in the sense of their being the leading and most powerful nations that are and will hereafter be found upon this globe.

These are steps that we silently make in our march of progress towards universal dominion. I do not speak of universal power precisely, but of the dominion of the mental and will power of the Anglo-Saxon over that of any other race in the world. These are silent steps that we are taking, and while we do not recognize perhaps at every time and every step the deep motives connected with dominion that influence us, they are the influences which move us. I put in a protest here to-day that we shall not retard this great progress of ours by stopping on the way to have bickerings and collisions with each other about irrelevant and unnecessary matters, but insist we shall give to reason her full reign until we shall have accomplished for both these great peoples this very splendid, this very eminent destiny.

This country is not disquieted by the existing duty on salt fish. There is no quarrel between the South and the North, or the East and the West, or between the farmers and the fishermen, the consumer and the produces, about this little duty on salt fish. It does not rise to the surface even in the most violent agitations of the tariff controversy. It remains submerged and passed over as something that is not worthy of very much consideration. The Republicans made "fish, fresh, for immediate consumption," free of duty, and the small remnant of duty that they left on salt fish of every description and kind imported from Canada only amounts, as we see here, to $247,566.27 in respect of those kinds of fish where we are in competition with them, all of what are called the ground fish and the mackerel and the like, not the anchovies and sardines and many other varieties of fish that are caught there and imported for the delectation of men who have peculiar appetites. In the recent agitation which has been going on in the House of Representatives—the tariff bill is now before us—nothing was said about salt fish or the duty on fish. Nobody attempts to remove it. On the contrary, we attempt and we do in that bill restore to our fishermen the very essential part of the bounty about which they have been contending for many years.

The Democratic party, by the removal of the duty on salt in the bill that has come over to us, restores to the fishermen that go from the coasts of New England a very large and very valuable part of the bounty that was heretofore granted to them, sometimes in money, sometimes in remission of duties.

Mr. FRYE. Under a long-existing law they have had the right to draw their salt from bond for that purpose.

Mr. MORGAN. Then if we do not restore it to them we confirm it to them. No Democrat, so far as I am aware, has moved to reduce the duty on fish or to abolish it; and I am sure that no Democrat had anything to do with the abolition in the first instance of the duty on fresh fish.

Mr. PLUMB. On that statement will the Senator permit me to suggest that perhaps the fact that no Democrat has opposed the repeal of the duty on fish is because no Democrat uses fish. The Senator said the other day that he could disperse almost the entire Confederacy by taking one codfish among them.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, Mr. President, because the Senator from Kansas comes from a country where the people do not eat anything but beef, he must not understand that nobody eats fish in the South.

Mr. PLUMB. I was simply taking the Senator's own explanation as he made it the other day.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no doubt if the people of Kansas could get their taste cultivated up to a higher degree of civilization they would be very fond of fish. They have got all their tastes from the Indians, who have just been driven out of the country, and they live on beef.

But, sir, it is very true that the duty on fresh fish when the Republicans had the control of this Government, both by legislation and by treaty, was removed. Under the Walker tariff the duty on fish of all descriptions was 20 per cent. ad valorem. After that it was reduced to 15 per cent., and it stood there until the Republicans got absolute hold of the country, and they made free "fish, fresh, for immediate consumption." That includes now nearly the whole mass of fish brought in, and they made it free again in 1883 in the tariff they put through the House and the Senate—a tariff in respect of which they had power enough to revoke the action of both Houses through a committee of conference, and to put the duties on sugar and iron and steel in classifications and at a rate just to suit themselves.

By an absolute and outrageous violation of all parliamentary law and usage they framed that tariff to suit themselves. When they were violating the law of this body and of the other House also, and parliamentary usage at large, in respect to the duties on steel and iron and the like, why did it not occur to some of these Senators who are now so much interested in fish that they would put a little duty back on fresh fish? Why did they not put it where the Democrats had put it in the Walker tariff, the cynosure of every Democratic eye, as the best presentation of Democratic doctrine on tariff taxation that this country has ever yet had? These facts can not be denied.

Mr. DAWES. There might have been a reasonable construction.

Mr. MORGAN. A reasonable construction. That might be just as well; and yet that law has stood on the statute-book since 1871 or 1872, and has been construed by Judge Blodgett, as I am informed, of the United States circuit court, and has been construed by Republican Secretaries of the Treasury who have been in office down to the time when Mr. Manning came in. Mr. Manning took up their construction in the report he made to the House of Representatives and attempted to show how it could be avoided. Mr. Manning was a man of great ability. Could it not have been construed in the act of 1883? Was it not easy enough then for the Senator from Massachusetts to have done it, with his lore and wisdom and great acumen and decades of parliamentary experience?

It would have been so easy and so nice for him, representing these fishing interests as he does with such sincere devotion, to have gotten up and said, "I propose, Mr. President, to amend this bill so that fish, frozen, shall not fall within the category of fish, fresh, for immediate consumption." It never occurred to him. He had to wait until Cleveland got in, and then in raking the world for opportunities against Mr. Cleveland they stumbled upon the fact that it would have been easy enough to have made some different interpretation of this law through some Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. DAWES. It is pretty discouraging to attempt by phraseology to circumvent a settled purpose and pervert a law into a free-trade law. It is a great deal better to try to revolutionize the administrative power.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to say——

Mr. MORGAN. I yield to a remark.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Massachusetts makes the remark that it is rather discouraging to try in a certain event the perversity of a Secretary of the Treasury who insisted upon putting such a construction upon that law in regard to frozen fish that that had to be admitted free of duty. Has the Senator forgotten what the Senator from Alabama (which I suggested to him just now) has just alluded to, that a circuit judge of the United States appointed long, long ago, perfectly free from any Democratic taint or bias, had solemnly decided, after solemn argument, that the construction which the Secretary of the Treasury has put upon this clause of the act in regard to frozen fish is correct, necessary, and obligatory?

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to respond to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. To say that I think the Senator from Delaware would find it difficult upon any other subject to show that "fish for immediate consumption" would cover fish so prepared as to be used six months or a year hence is not going very far, but if the Senator does not find any difficulty in such a construction as that——

Mr. GRAY. But are not the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Delaware as well as the Secretary of the Treasury bound by a judicial construction of the law of the United States?

Mr. DAWES. Nobody is bound by the construction which a circuit judge may have put upon that law if it does not commend itself to the common sense and the convictions of the person who is called upon to administer it; and I put it to the common sense of the Senator from Delaware whether "fish, fresh, for immediate consumption" should cover fish so prepared as to be kept for a year or two years and then consumed?

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Massachusetts had his part, and a very prominent part, too, in making this very law. Until the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] took the paternity of the tariff business, the Senator from Massachusetts was the leader on tariff legislation in the House of Representatives, and he made this law, put it on the statute-book, and his Secretaries of the Treasury have construed it, and judges have construed it, and he says he is not bound by the judgment of a judge of the United States circuit court in putting a construction of this sort that makes fresh fish out of frozen fish—he is not bound to it; why? Because as a representative of a people and a State he has the right to legislate. Why has he not done it? There is the act of 1883. Why was that left in that shape?

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Alabama will allow me to suggest that twice after the act of 1870 was passed putting fish on the free-list the present Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] was chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, and I was serving under him, and he never ventured to recommend a change of it.

Mr. DAWES. I venture to say to my friend from Kentucky that up to the time that I ceased to have anything to do with the tariff act nobody, not even the wise judge of the circuit court who lives somewhere, not even he whose effulgence so dazzles the eye of my distinguished friend from Delaware, had ever pronounced that fresh fish for immediate consumption could be fish so prepared as to be kept years and then consumed.

Mr. MORGAN. It went on the statute-book in 1871 with that language.

Mr. BECK. In July, 1870.

Mr. MORGAN. In July, 1870, the Senator from Kentucky says, with that language in it, and the Government through its Secretary of the Treasury and through its customs laws and officers collected the duty upon it right along, whether it was frozen or not frozen, down to 1873. Then the language of that law was again repeated in the statute, and they still collected the duty; the fishermen all the time controverting about it and the Secretaries deciding against them.

Then it came on down, ten years later, to 1883, with the same language in the statute and the same construction, and now the Senator from Massachusetts attempts to escape the responsibility for his party upon a question of that kind by throwing the onus of the decision upon some Secretary of the Treasury. Our responsibility on this floor is always present with us, because we have the right and the power to change legislation so as to relieve the statutes of the difficulties which Secretaries find in them when they come to construe the language of our enactments.

That will not do. That law was passed with the idea that the people along the New England coast would be benefited by having fish come in free if they were fresh, and that they could conduct packeries, places for the preparation of fish for the interior markets, and if they could get them in that way, they would have a large trade with the West by putting these delightful fish upon the tables of gentlemen in the far West, as far west as the Rocky Mountains, entirely fresh; but they found out that the job was too big for them, that their people would not monopolize in these advantages, that the rapid-transit railways would let in Canadian fish, and so, instead of coming up now and trying to repeal the duty on fish after four months of discussion in the House of Representatives in which no motion was made to change that statute, they come here now, and what do they undertake to do? They undertake to compel the President of the United States by a proclamation of non-intercourse, that would shake this country to its center in spite of all that the best men in it could do, to reinstate a prohibition on the importation of fresh fish caught in Canadian waters by Canadian fishermen.

That is the situation. I suppose I shall be thoroughly abused about making this statement, but I make it in the presence of the Senate, believing it to be a solemn truth.

Mr. Blaine came along the other day across the water in a magnificent steam-ship, the City of New York, I believe it is called, careering along with majestic pride and his white plume floating in the air of the sea, and he passed into a fog on the banks of Newfoundland, and while he was in that fog he had some conception that they were very foggy about the actual condition of the fishermen in this country, some of whom he found fishing for cod. Now, I want to read what he said. This is from his speech at Portland on the 15th day of August, after he had emerged from the fog and had recovered somewhat from his sea-sickness:

> Well, now, if there is anything in this question at all, if there is anything in the world about which the American people are concerned to-day touching this fishery question, it is the interest of the fishing fleet, and that is the very point which the voters of Maine, before whom Mr. Putnam appears as a candidate, are desirous of him to explain. For we believe—by we I mean those opposed to the treaty—that it is complete abandonment of the whole fishing interests of the United States; and I myself, following the example of Senator FRYE, at some future period of this campaign will take occasion to show the grounds of my charge. [Great applause.] I will promise you, if I do, I will not limit it in a small three-line parenthesis in the middle of a paragraph. [Great applause.]
> On Monday of last week as the passengers on the steamer on which I was crossing the Atlantic rose from their breakfast there was suddenly one of the rumors that flow with wonderful swiftness even over the largest of steamers that we were in the midst of a fishing fleet. We had come to the banks of Newfoundland during the night, and as we rushed—those of us who were not seasick—to the deck we were surrounded by some twelve to fifteen sail of fishermen, partly French, partly Canadian, and more largely American.
> The sea was very rough, so much so that at least half the passengers were very seriously disturbed with the most unpleasant sensation known to human nature. [Laughter.] But those of us who could get on deck—and I will honestly confess that I was not one of the swiftest myself—beheld in this rough sea the fishermen in their small boats, their little dories that were not more than 15 feet long, out on those waves that seemed to those on the steamer to be rolling half the height of this great room, and they were taking up their trawls with as little concern as a Maine farmer would mow his hay in July. And there was one universal burst of admiration on that steamer at the daring and the heroism and the splendor of the bravery that would risk life in a contest with such angry elements. [Great applause.] I said to myself then, as I say to you now, that in my judgment the United States would dishonor itself for all time if by any negotiation, or for any consideration, it should surrender one jot or one tittle of the rights of those gallant, generous, and brave men. [Great applause.]

If that occurred, Mr. President, that ex-Senator of the United States and ex-Speaker of the House of Representatives, along with his party in 1871, and 1873, and 1883, had given to the Frenchman, whose little dory was dancing upon the water, and to the Canadian, whose little bark was also by the side of the American fisherman, the same right to come in here with his fish, frozen, free of duty. That injustice was done under a Republican administration. It might have occurred to him that a "jot or tittle" of what had been claimed to have been the ancient right of these people had actually been surrendered by that doughty champion of protection—a man belaboring the world with his cudgel about protection and at the same time slipping a current of free trade under the keels of the fishermen. If he had thought of the facts he was much at sea and sadly befogged while this was going on. The fishermen owe the party that he controls for little else than free fish and liberal praise.

That may be very lovely; it may be very commendable. When the candidate of the Republican party at Indianapolis raised his blue eyes to the rising sun to welcome the coming of this great champion of Republicanism, under whose shadow he becomes a pigmy as if beneath the shadow of one of the great pyramids of Egypt, he must have forgotten that the chieftain of Republicanism was one of the men who had put free fish in the statute when he was in Congress, put it in that treaty of 1871, put it in the act of 1883, ordained free trade in fresh fish, and never attempted to regulate or interpret in any other wise than the Secretaries of the Treasury themselves thought it was right to do these acts of Congress.

There is another set of people engaged in the fisheries up there about which I will read a little from a recent publication by Edgar L. Wakeman. I got it from the Washington Evening Star of a recent date. He is speaking now about the eastern shore of the Grand Manan. That is a bold island that rises 400 or 500 feet towering upright in the mouth of the Bay of Fundy.

The eastern shore of Grand Manan is alone habitable. Here are found a half dozen quaint little hamlets where live perhaps three thousand fishermen and their families. They are almost child-like folk, and the same singular simplicity is characteristic of them that I have noticed as existing in so striking a degree among all the native waterside people of this northeast coast. Their toil is incessant, their piety unquestioning humility and faith, their content is tenderly beautiful. Indeed, there is something in all this remoteness from ordinary human activities and this ceaseless magical influence of the sea, which molds and softens character into kindliness and gentleness, I have never elsewhere found. Repeatedly coming upon it, one can not but wonder why it is not more the study of the sociologist. Were our great penal institutions set upon our coastwise islands, might not this beneficent influence have tendency to soften and reform, at least to a measurable and desirable degree, the savage and apparently unregenerate spirit of desperate criminals? These fishermen take herring, cod, and haddock along their own dangerous shores, and frequently join in perilous quest for cod in their little schooners as far as the Grand Banks with startling daring and intrepidity.

Doubtless Mr. Blaine saw some of these things—

Their wives and daughters, who are splendid types of women in form, strength, and carriage, are every whit the equal of the men in sea-lore and hardihood. It is no uncommon thing for them to serve long and arduous stints at the oars, or the hard watches among the dories; while their fearlessness and positive heroism in the frequent life-saving incidents of the dread and dangerous island shores entitle them to noble place in romance and song. The homes of these gentle people are strung along the eastern shore coves in picturesque cabins and cottages, and are invariably the prettiest and coziest retreats imaginable, and, considering their owners' occupation, their cleanliness and brightness are marvelous. Magnificent government-built roads lead from the nestling coves and homes to the lofty highlands of Grand Manan, and thence to its western and southern extremities.

The picturesque, weird, and sublime are on every hand. The eastern shore, with its near islands, its hundreds of fishers' sail, old boats, and rotting wrecks, a surf which breaks and tumbles ceaselessly, the odd costumes and utensils of the fishermen, the dainty villages and straggling settlements, all contrasting with a mighty background of strangely colored cliffs and verdure-clad heights; the northern shore, with its tremendous headlands above the ever-moaning sea; the western shore, with its succession of massive cliffs, its Indian Beach, where the Quoddy Indians come, Dark Cove, Kidd's Money Cove, and the savage maelstroms of Long's Eddy; and the southern shore, with its outlying Wood's Islands, Broad and Seal Coves, the majestic Southern Cross Promontory, Gannet Rock light-house, and Southwest Head, where thousands upon thousands of gulls breed, circle, and cry, are an endless source of delight, fascination, and joy.

Now, there is the other side of that picture. These appear to be the people with whom we are in a large degree in controversy about our fishery rights; and considering their poverty and their industry and the heroism that they always display in the endeavor to master the difficulties of the sea, I can not for my life get up any very serious feeling of malignity towards them. This gentleman who is writing here is, I think, a mere littérateur. I do not think he has anything to do with politics in describing the condition of the country. Though I have not been up there, it occurs to me that in those inlets and recesses of the sea, where the tides roll in sometimes 30 or 40 feet high and spread over 200,000 acres of country which two hours before was not flooded—that those tides upon all the shores of Newfoundland and Labrador and the Gulf of St. Lawrence and along the Cape Breton Islands and up the Bay of Fundy must be something that are majestic, and must tax the powers and fortitude of those men to the uttermost to deal with them and conduct their vocation of fishing in their midst.

So, on both sides, this is a perilous coast, a perilous business; and while I think of the heroism of our own fishermen, and that it makes almost a characteristic mark of splendor in the American character, I can not disregard the other men with whom we are dealing. I know that they are very poor, that their country is almost barren, and these harvests of the sea are all they have to depend upon for the food of life. I can not feel that I should deal with them in a spirit of harsh and cruel opposition. Let us do them justice. Let us determine in our own councils what justice is, and as we estimate it, and would enjoy it, and would be willing to receive it, let us administer it to those people.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. MORGAN. I will.

Mr. FRYE. It is their own government which is treating them with injustice and cruelty. Those people have no greater anxiety to-day than to be permitted to sell to American and French fishermen their bait which they take on their shores, and to receive money for it. Their government stands between them and the opportunity, and those people to-day would be delighted to come under the ægis of the American flag all along that coast.

Mr. MORGAN. I have not a doubt of that at all. The Senator from Maine has properly presented that idea, and has often done so in a very beautiful way, and I have always accepted it with a degree of compassion and pity for those people. I believe that their government stands in the way. I believe that the politicians in that government are putting those people in an attitude toward our Government that is unjustifiable, that is unfortunate. But the politicians on this side are doing the same thing.

What I was appealing to was in reference to our own fishermen, not the policy of a party or the decrees of a caucus. I was going down to the very bottom of this question and trying to measure its merits by my own conception of what was right and due, and by that means we shall arrive at justice and we shall never get it otherwise.

But here comes along the grand chieftain of the Republican party dancing across the waves in a magnificent steam-ship, and he speaks to these poor Canadians on Grand Manan who are out there, men and women in their dories; he speaks also to American fishermen; he says, "Behold your chieftain, who after all has put these people of Grand Manan, and these Frenchmen, in such a position that they may come into the American markets with fresh fish free of duty and send them frozen to any State of the Union. I shall go home and proclaim ex cathedra that the party that opposes me and undertakes to ratify this treaty is a British party. I will thus denounce them, although I am one of the chief men who have admitted British fish free of duty and held on to it, never tried to revoke it, and never tried to change the interpretation of the Department of the Treasury." Vive la humbug! Never had such a cause such a captain. No man ever played the title-roll of chief humbug of the age with more success than that eminent chieftain of the Republican party, who after passing through a fog on the sea undertook to make some declamation from a stomach that had sickened at the sea about Republican and Democratic policies. I do not wonder he was sick when he saw the Canadian and New England fishermen enjoying Republican free trade in fresh fish, in common, under laws that his grand old party had enacted.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] is greatly lifted up with admiration when he refers to these fishermen. He insists that their cradles of the seas are the nurseries of our Navy. I want to put on record again the strong statements made by the Senator from Massachusetts on that subject, for it is entirely complimentary to the fishermen, and they, I have no doubt, will enjoy it very much. I wish, however, to state some facts bearing a little on the question. As to the breadth that the Senator gives to the conclusions that he draws from the statements he has made there may be some question.

First, he says:

Professor Baird estimates the number of persons employed in our fisheries in 1880 as 131,436. Of these 101,684 were Americans. The value of the fisheries of the sea, the great rivers, and great lakes was over $43,00',000. The fisheries of New England engaged 37,043 men; the South Atlantic States engaged 52,418 men; the Middle States, 14,981 men; the Pacific States and Territories, 16,803.

He then proceeds on page 6 of his pamphlet speech to say:

As we look back upon the war of 1812, there are some things which the people of New England may well wish had been otherwise. But if there were anything of disloyalty there, it all evaporated in words. A few disloyal phrases of a convention at Hartford, a little grumbling of a governor—what are they to the blaze of resplendent glory that rises from the deeds of her seamen? The men who censure the reluctance of the Federalists of that day to resent the provocation we had received from England do not always make sufficient allowance for the equal insult we were receiving from France. The party who opposed the war with England were eager enough to take arms against France. They were filled with a morbid horror of the power of Napoleon. But it was a horror into which no element of cowardice entered. They thought that in overcoming England we would overcome the last barrier against his universal empire, and that in attacking England we ranged ourselves on the side of universal tyranny against the last hope of constitutional liberty.

On page 9 he says, quoting from Admiral David D. Porter:

If we can in a week drill a mongrel crew so that every man knows his various stations on shipboard, how much easier would it be for us to do the same thing with a crew of New England fishermen, hardy and active in their persons and intelligent beyond any set of foreign seamen?

The question of protection to the New England fisheries and their seamen does not admit of argument, and in my zeal on the subject I may have gone out of my way to prove to you that which you know already.

I inclose you some statistics which, if you have not already got them, will give you the status of our fisheries throughout the United States.

If there is anything bearing on this subject you would like me to hunt up, please let me know, and I will endeavor to obtain it.

Then again, on page 10, the Senator from Massachusetts says as follows:

The fishermen are the only portion of a nation that maintain unimpaired their fighting quality during a long peace. Armies become enervated on a peace establishment. But the daily life of the fisherman is a constant discipline in fearlessness, endurance, and activity. Our fishermen are all we have left on the sea as a resource for a sudden occasion.

If anything further were wanting to show the importance of this occupation to national defense and to national wealth, it would be found in British and Canadian testimony. Our free-trade friends talk about the duties on fish. They tell us of the hardship of a tax on so cheap and wholesome a food. Mr. President, we pay $600,000 a year for West Point and Annapolis. Canada exported from the produce of her fisheries in 1887 a value of $6,843,388. Of this we took nearly a million and a half. Every dollar of that was a payment to our great rival, to our only possible enemy, towards the support of a naval school to which Annapolis or Greenwich is quite unimportant.

Again, on page 20, the Senator says:

But the important question is the substance of the treaty itself. If I am right—and if I am wrong the ablest statesmen of America in every generation have been wrong—if I am right this is no mere question of the investment of a few hundred thousand dollars and the employment of a few thousand men; these may be transferred to equal profit elsewhere. It is a question of the strength of the right arm of this nation. It is a question of its power to ward off or to return a blow in any future war. It is a question of that naval strength without which our commerce and our coast cities are alike to be at the mercy of any enemy who may attack them. It enters largely into the question whether as a maritime power we are to be equal, not to Great Britain, but even to Canada. It is a question, not of the price of fish, but of the limits and the efficiency of the American naval school.

Mr. President, I think a majority of American legislators concur with the Senator from Massachusetts. I know I have in years gone by, while looking back to the period of the war of 1812–'15, and the splendid achievements of our Navy during that time. We all feel a just pride in giving credit to the fishermen of the Northeast for a very large, if not a controlling participation in those magnificent naval victories of ours. I have always doubted whether we should be able to get along well without giving positive encouragement to those fishermen, and in what little I have had to say here about matters of the kind I have never permitted myself to inveigh to any extent against either bounties or drawbacks or duties that might be supposed to encourage our fishermen. I confess that I have looked with some degree of painful solicitude at the fact that their natural protectors were in the habit of taking the foundations from beneath their feet and letting them down into the pit of free trade in fresh fish. It rather worried me, Mr. President.

We have seen that the tonnage of our fishing ships was increased during the war. That increase required a considerable increase in expert mariners. There is a very important fact, while we are philosophizing and trying to get reasonable deductions from facts. The fact, we all admit, is a very important one, that our fishing tonnage did increase during the war; the catch increased very largely, stimulated, no doubt, by the demand for that kind of food, or any kind of food. The prices of food increased here and the demand greatly increased. Of course that required that we should have expert mariners and fishermen in larger numbers out on the banks.

These are not waters that can be visited in vessels of small tonnage with safety, except by the most skilled and experienced seamen; and while the war was going on and the Federal Navy had great demands for expert seamen, we find that the fishing fleet continually increased. We know as a matter of fact that its increase must have been supplied largely, if not entirely, from men who were expert sailors, the best mariners of the New England coast. They went into the traffic of fishing and got good pay, and I am very glad they did.

Where did they get these people and what brought them out? Was it from Canada or from that reserve of fishermen along our coast who had retired from the sea when the Republican party put down the tariff on fresh fish? Where did these men come from to supply this increased activity in the fishing fleet during the period of the war?

After the war had drawn off so many fishermen to naval vessels of the United States, where did this large complement of fishermen come from? It came from the coasts of Massachusetts, from that class of men who had been compelled to abandon fishing as a business to take up other and more attractive pursuits and where they could make a living. I know of no cause for their doing so, except that the Republican party in 1871 by treaty, and in 1872 and 1873 and 1883 by law, put fish on the free-list and reduced the importation of fish of all kinds, as the Senator from Massachusetts has stated, from the provinces to the United States, down to a million and a half of dollars' worth per annum. The Canadians catch from eighteen to twenty-five millions and we take a million and a half. I can not think that these recruits, this fishing fleet during the war came from the Canadians entirely. I have to reason this point upon suppositions that seem to be entitled to credit.

The Senator from Massachusetts has greatly overdrawn the picture as to the indispensable defense of our country by the fishermen. I will state some facts which seem to lead to quite a different conclusion.

In 1861 there were 90 vessels in the United States Navy, of which 50 were sailing ships of all kinds, described as "obsolete as the galleys of Themistocles."

Of 40 steamers, one was on the Lakes, and 5 were unserviceable; 9 were laid up in ordinary, and 17 were in foreign service.

During the war the construction of 208 vessels was begun, and the most of these were completed; 418 vessels, of which 313 were steamers, were bought by the Government.

In the beginning of 1861 there were in the naval service 1,457 officers, of whom 322 resigned and entered the Confederate service, and 7,600 men.

During the war 7,600 officers of the Navy were appointed from civil life, and at the close of the war the number of men in the Navy was 51,500.

So we see that from the beginning of the war to its close the number of men in the Navy ran up from 7,600 to 51,500.

The only naval vessels that came into possession of the Confederates in 1861 were the Fulton, an old side-wheeler, laid up at Pensacola, the sunken and half destroyed hulks at Norfolk, of which the Merrimac was made available, six revenue-cutters, three coast-survey vessels, and six or eight light-house tenders, the most of which were sailing vessels, of little value. Several coasting or river steamers belonging to private parties, lying in Southern waters, were taken or bought by the Confederates. They altered and fitted out at New Orleans the Sumter, Enoch Train, Florida, Pamlico, McRae, Webb, Jackson, Mauripas, Pontchartrain, Ivy, General Polk, and some smaller vessels; the Governor and General Quitman, State vessels, and fourteen river steamers were taken and altered for a flotilla of rams for the defense of the Mississippi River.

The Confederates built at New Orleans the Livingston, Bienville, and Carondelet, and two ironclads, the Louisiana and the Mississippi.

By the latter part of 1862 the Confederates had purchased and altered 44 vessels, and had built and completed 24, and had 32 others in course of construction. Vessels were subsequently built at Mobile, Selma, Charleston, Savannah, in the North Carolina Sounds, and in the James River. The Florida (second), Alabama, Georgia, Shenandoah, and Stonewall were bought abroad. The number of enlisted men in the Confederate navy was probably less than 4,000 at any time.

There were "captured and destroyed" by the Federal forces 1,280 blockade-runners, and there were 280 miscellaneous captures. Eight hundred and seventy-five prizes of the Federal Navy were adjudicated in the courts.

Mr. President, there was a wonderful stimulation of enterprise on both sides. The Confederates were without any resources whatsoever for building ships or without any money for obtaining them, and the United States Government brought its Navy up to this large number of ships during four years of war and strife, and put on board of them 51,500 men. These men did not all come from the fishing fleets. Those magnificent attacks upon forts on the Mississippi River, at Fort Morgan, along the North Carolina coast, at Charleston, and along the entire Southern coast—those magnificent battles and sieges conducted by armed ships of war were not conducted even in large part by fishermen. It is all a mistake to suppose that the American people are not capable of furnishing all the talent that is necessary and all the skill and labor that are necessary for the manning of fleets even in the midst of war, for, sir, the achievements of fighting ships on both sides in that civil war prove the fact that the American people are just as capable in naval warfare as any people that ever existed in the world. They improvised ships and got men to put on board of them, not thinking of looking to the fishing fleets for the entire supply. More than that, the fishermen could not have gone largely into the Navy, because their fishing fleets increased almost in the same proportion as did the Navy. They increased 100 per cent. during the war.

What becomes of all this brilliant argument then? How far is it from the fact that the Government of the United States to-day is dependent upon the New England fishermen for instructed mariners as it is upon Annapolis for the training of her seamen, or West Point for the education of her soldiers? But the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has a sentiment to indulge in respect of this matter, and I am very glad he has. I have no use for a man who has no sentiment for his own country or his own people or his own section. A man who can live in the Southern States without referring to our past quarrels and bickerings and strifes, and tell me that he has got just as much affection for the people in Oregon as he has got for the people in Georgia or Mississippi is a man who, I think, is a little too cold-hearted to make a faithful representative of anybody. I do not blame the Senator from Massachusetts in the slightest degree for feeling so affectionately towards his people.

It is, indeed, very pardonable in the Senator from Massachusetts that he should refer with pride and exultation to the part our fishermen took in the war of 1812–1815. Every American rejoices in that peculiar glory of that war.

But may it not be true in the future that the 52,418 fishermen of the South Atlantic States (as he states their numbers) may be worth as much to our Navy as the 37,043 fishermen of New England?

Besides, we have also the 14,981 fishermen of the Middle States to draw upon; and we have in addition to that 16,803 on the Pacific coast to draw upon. So that New England does not furnish one-half of the naval reserve of trained mariners to which we can resort in an emergency.

I will not discuss with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] the challenge he seems to throw down to other States in the following paragraph of his speech on page 7, where he says:

> In her contributions, sacrifices, and achievements in this war, Massachusetts may well challenge comparison with any other American State. She raised 14,000 men in 1814. She paid $2,000,000 for bounties. One of her fishing towns, Marblehead, had more than 800 men in Dartmoor prison when the war ended. She furnished during those three years more men than any other State. The New England States, which opposed the war, sent more men into the field than the Southern States, which brought on the contest.

I did not know before this statement that the Southern States had brought on that war. I am very glad that they get the credit of it. I accept that acknowledgment of the Senator from Massachusetts with profound gratitude. They not only brought it on, it seems, but they whipped in the only fight of any great consequence during that war. I have only to say in reply to that paragraph of the Senator's speech, that General Pakenham had at New Orleans 8,400 men, and General Jackson had 5,600, all Southrons and all raw militia, opposed to many veterans who wore the badges of victory won in the severest battles of Wellington and Napoleon. Pakenham did not get away alive, and his splendid army carried no prisoners to Dartmoor. The survivors escaped to their ships, and the Mississippi Valley was saved from ruthless invasion and the Gulf of Mexico from hostile occupation.

So the little thrust at the Southern States, that the Senator seems utterly incapable of withholding whenever he gets his little dagger in position, has not penetrated the skin, has not made a scratch on it, turns aside from the panoply of our armor, and we just hold up Andrew Jackson and his men to show what they did with Lord Pakenham. That seems to answer the whole question about the fighting that was done in the Southern States. Whether we had more men in the war or fewer than Massachusetts, we had men one of whom could whip two British men, it appears. I do not know but that led us into the belief that we could do this in 1861 when we came to fight Yankees; but we found we could not do that all the time.

Now, Mr. President, I have got through, and I am very glad I have, with all the matters that may be considered as preliminary or irrelevant to the real merits of this fisheries controversy.

I come now to the delimitations of the treaty of 1888. The delimitations of the treaty of 1888 are to be measured on the basis of the contentions of the two countries, if we would ascertain what each has yielded to the other.

Not upon the basis, Mr. President, of what we are willing to admit is the right of opposing countries or what they are willing to admit is our right, for if we had to have a measurement on that basis we should never have any. We tried that under the treaty of 1854, where a most elaborate and precise arrangement was made for the delimitation of the boundaries under the treaty of 1818, but when Mr. Cutts, at the head of our commission of admeasurement, undertook to lay lines down upon the bosom of the earth and on the seas he found himself at once unable to progress for the reason that the diplomatic powers had never settled precisely where this line was to run. The matter had been abandoned, for this reason, under the treaty of 1854. Then came Mr. Seward, and when he suggested a modus vivendi as the predicate of a future treaty also with Great Britain in respect to the boundaries and delimitation he at once referred to the fact that we had attempted it in the treaty of 1854 and that Mr. Cutts had given some valuable information about this matter. He thought it would be well to look at that, and urged upon our minister to Great Britain the necessity of having some agreement between ourselves and the Government of Great Britain for marking out the delimitations.

Where was the necessity for making the delimitations if the ground to be included in the delimitation was understood? If two adjoining proprietors of a tract of land or a lot in the city of Washington know precisely where the dividing lines are they find no occasion for sending for a surveyor to run them and mark them out upon the surface of the earth. So with us, the difficulty under the treaty of 1818, as suggested in the treaty of 1854, and as was afterwards repeated by Mr. Seward in his protocol that he tendered to the British Government, was that an unsettled question was there. That unsettled question was "Where is the boundary of fishing rights between the United States and Canada under the treaty of 1818?"

In the treaty of 1854 we provided for the demarkation of a line before we had agreed as to where the line of renunciation of fishing rights should be fixed.

When we come down to 1871, nothing having been accomplished except to increase strife, contention, and harassment, Mr. Fish took the only view of the question that was possible, and took precisely the same view of it that the British Government did, that the fishing boundaries or the boundaries of the renunciation under the treaty of 1818 were not established, were not agreed upon; they were the subject of diplomatic correspondence and future agreement, if agreement should be possible. That was the situation.

I will read from page 8438 of the RECORD an extract from a book printed by the United States Government, which sets forth all that took place preceding the ratification of the treaty of Washington, setting forth the British contention, in which this question about the boundary of the renunciation of the treaty of 1818 as it was understood by the British Government is stated with perfect clearness:

> The two chief questions are: As to whether the expression "3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions" should be taken to mean a limit of 3 miles from the coast line, or a limit of 3 miles from a line drawn from headland to headland.

That is the first proposition. Now, that being the British contention, having been accepted as the British contention, having been made by Mr. Seward as well as by Mr. Fish the basis of the diplomacy between the two countries, having been put upon the record in distinct form as the British contention, when we come to measure the result of the delimitations presented in this treaty of 1888 and to ascertain whether it is just must we not make the calculation of what we have gained or lost with reference to this conceded British contention, or must we compute it by some vain or idle theory that some Senator may choose to advance, upon which he thinks he can establish that this British contention was either foolish or insincere.

We must take things as we find them, especially when we are negotiating a treaty with a great power. We can not make the other side of the case. All we have to do is to take care of our own side, and if we find that the two governments are sincere in the presentation of their demands upon each other, then we look for some middle ground of concession and conciliation between the two, if we think that reasonable concessions by both parties are wiser and better than continued strife.

In such controversies between such powers a fair settlement is a boon to both.

That is precisely the shape in which this subject was presented to the consideration of Mr. Bayard and Mr. Cleveland in the middle of the year 1885, July 1, when the fisheries treaty of 1871 had been terminated. Then the treaty of 1818 rose like a rock out of the sea in front of the very prow of the ship of state, and we had to back water, or change the course, or come to an anchor and debate about it. Otherwise we should have been a wreck, or if not a wreck, we should have wrecked somebody else. We can not flatter ourselves that there was no danger in this situation to our people, and to the British people.

When we come to measure these delimitations, we want to find out whether a wise or a foolish thing has been done, whether a patriotic thing has been done, looking at it from the American standpoint, or whether it has been a surrender to the British and the Canadians by a Democratic President. On that occasion he did not happen to be representing any action of the Democratic party taken before that time, he was not representing, as these Senators are here, a declaration of a great political party in national convention. The Democratic party had made no declaration about the treaty. The question is, whether a Democratic President, left free to serve the whole American people without respect to partisan bias or committal, has taken a wise view of this subject. He did not take a Democratic view of it, he did not take a Republican view of it, so far as we knew or suspected, until by an act of more recent date the Republican party saw proper to go upon record and condemn this treaty in that low speech, which no great convention ought ever to have uttered, as "a pusillanimous and cowardly surrender."

The minority of the committee undertook to go to the bottom of this question, and while the majority were content to present their conclusions in a very general and loose way about the areas included in the delimitations, we sought for the best information that was possibly available. We had heard it stated in committee time and again by eminent Senators that we had actually surrendered 150,000 square miles of fishing waters under this treaty. Then they dropped down to 100,000 square miles, and finally some of them got down to 50,000 square miles. They were guessing, as men do over questions in forecasts of weather, as to whether it is going to rain next Monday, to-day a week, or whether it is going to be dry. It was mere guessing.

The minority of the committee, as I say, took especial pains to present this question in a true light. No Senator on that side has controverted one single statement that has been made. In all these debates, searching through and through this record for every little speck of dust and straw with which to obstruct the progress of the treaty towards a ratification, they have never called in question the facts stated by the minority of the committee upon this point, which I proceed now to read:

> It is alleged by some that this treaty yields to the British Government 50,000 square miles of exclusive fishing grounds beyond what we yielded in the treaty of 1818.
> Taking the contention of the United States that no headland theory is to be found in the treaty of 1818, and that the exclusive fishing limit is a line 3 miles from the shore, at low water, that enters all harbors, bays, and creeks that are more than 6 miles wide at the entrance, and follows the sinuosities of the coast thereof, this estimate of the area surrendered in this treaty is greatly exaggerated.
>
> This is the narrowest limit to which we have confined our renunciation in the treaty of 1818 of the common right of fishery in our contentions with Great Britain.
>
> The total area as to which we renounced the common right of fishing, according to this construction of that treaty, is 16,424 nautical square miles.
>
> The additional area of renunciation under the delimitations of the proposed treaty now before the Senate is 1,127 square miles, being 6.8 per cent. addition to the former area of exclusion.
>
> The total area of bays, creeks, and harbors not more than 6 miles wide at their mouths is about 6,599 square miles, and is included in the above-mentioned measurement of 16,424 square miles.
> The British claim as the true construction of the agreement in the treaty of 1818, that it fixed the line within which we renounced the common right of fishery at the distance, measured seaward, of 3 miles from the entrance of all bays, harbors, and creeks of His Majesty's dominions. This would add an area of 3,489 square miles to the exclusive fishing grounds claimed by the British Government, while the area in which we have renounced the common right of fishing in those bays, harbors, and creeks under the proposed treaty now before the Senate is 1,127 square miles.
> Thus, under the British contention that Government yields, in this treaty, 3,489 square miles of exclusive fishing waters to the people of the United States as a common fishery, and we yield 1,127 square miles to the British Government as exclusive fishing waters, which we now claim to enjoy with them as a common fishery under our construction of the treaty of 1818, which they refuse to admit.
> They yield more than two-thirds of their claim to us, and we yield less than one-third of our claim to them, for the sake of settling forever a dispute that has lasted for seventy years, and has been in every way a costly and disturbing contention to our people.

Then reference is made in the minority report to the official statement, marked D, of the Coast Survey of the United States, where these figures are all worked out and stated by the Coast Survey officials. I have stated the cold facts about this matter. In view of this statement, how can any man get his own consent to declaim against this treaty as a base, pusillanimous, and cowardly surrender to the British Government of our fishing grounds when they yield two-thirds of the claim that they made to the exclusive right of fishing, as stated by Hamilton Fish, and we yield only one-third of our contention, which follows the sinuosities of the bays back and forth in all bays 6 miles and more wide? How are we justified in declaiming against this settlement of fishing boundaries in this sort of opprobrious and unparliamentary speech, this array of unjust accusation, whose value consists in the adverbs or adjectives with which they may be bolstered up for American observation?

How can we do this when we go back to Edward Everett and quote in the Senate of the United States what he said, and when we go to the table of the Committee on Foreign Relations and find there laid upon that table by a majority vote of that committee other declarations of Edward Everett that we do not dare to bring in and put before the British people? How can we thus censure the President when we find Daniel Webster, in a circular issued to the fishermen of the United States, warning them to be upon their guard respecting intrusions upon grounds claimed in British contentions, when the British Government claimed exactly what Mr. Fish set out subsequently, as I have read? How can we do this when the honorable Senator from New York, formerly a Secretary of State for the United States, himself admitted that the treaty of 1818 was one of doubtful interpretation? How shall we reconcile it to ourselves after the Coast Survey, has officially measured these respective delimitations upon the hydrographic map of Great Britain, to declaim against this in party platforms and otherwise as a cowardly and pusillanimous surrender?

Sir, the heat of partisan politics may excuse for a moment, but it will come back to vex Senators who have indulged in this ferocious sort of speech, so unjustifiable, so inexcusable in respect of this subject. I will let those delimitations stand there, measured by our own Coast Survey, as an irrefutable denial of statements made on that side of the Chamber in respect of this matter. No Senator has ever denied these figures; they can not do it.

Mr. President, I want to say something about what is the Canadian view upon this subject of the delimitations. Those people up in Canada are as careful about their fisheries as we are about a wheat crop, or about the tariff on wool and sugar, or about the protection and care we give to our steel and iron industries of this country. It is pretty much all they have to depend upon. Those vast treasures of wealth so graphically portrayed before the Senate by the Senator from Massachusetts are to those people the most deeply interesting and valuable of all the possessions they have had under the benefaction of God. So they care for them, look after them, watch over them; and I have believed all the time it was nothing but the weakness of those people that ever caused them to consent to divide the rich annual harvest of the fish of those coasts with the people of the United States upon any theory we could name on which they have divided it.

Mr. HOAR. If you will pardon me, Sir Charles Tupper says, and so do several other Canadian parties, that we have never asked them to make any such division.

Mr. MORGAN. This is not the treaty of division. I am speaking about former treaties, the treaties of 1783 and 1818. I wonder we ever got their consent to give up what was so rich, when it was all they had. It was like a man being compelled to permit another man to come into his domicile, take a corner of his habitation, and sit down there and enjoy himself as though he was one of the members of the family. In the Canadian Parliament, Mr. Mitchell, who had been commissioner of fisheries of Canada for many years, and doubtless a very able man, who understands the subject of Canadian fisheries as well I suppose as any man in the world, in speaking of this delimitation says:

I say, if a map based on those contentions was taken from headland to headland, and those exclusive rights of the bays delineated upon it, this house would see what the difference is between the delimitation in that map and the concessions given up to the Americans.

That was April 13, 1888.

If I can understand the meaning of the statements in the great mass of dispatches which I have had to wade through in order to define how we have endeavored to maintain the interests of Canada, I should say that the men who wrote them were bound in honor to have stood by Canada and enforced those rights. If they had done so we would have stood to-day with our headland system maintained and our rights to bays recognized, because all that was wanted was a little firmness some twenty years ago and we would not be in the position of having to beg for reciprocity. About the inshore fisheries, it was never disputed that we had an absolute right to them, and yet my honorable friend comes here with his eloquent tongue and persuades us—he knows he can do anything in this country, for he can do what none of us can do; he can control the first minister, as he saved him in the contest of a year ago—he comes with his eloquent tongue—and persuades us that in this delimitation which the treaty provides for we have obtained a great concession.

That is, Sir Charles Tupper—

Sir, we have abandoned everything, and while we have done that my honorable friend has forgotten one thing. Did he know there were two ends to the shores of America on the Atlantic? Where is the provision in the treaty to give the Canadians the same rights in the Delaware and Chesapeake, in Boston Bay, and Narragansett, and Albemarle, and from the Cape of Florida past the mouth of the Mississippi, that they have captured from us? Do we find that the interpretation which they set upon their shores, bays, and coasts is the same as they ask us to set upon ours? Have they not rights which they claim from headland to headland, and which are enforced even among themselves, and from which we are excluded? Where is our right to enter their bays? It is true it is the separate States own them there, but that does not alter the law or right on the question. Where has my honorable friend provided in the treaty that we should have the use of those bays to the south of where our boundary terminates? Why have we not secured the same privileges in the American bays, straits, and headlands that they demand in ours? There is no such provision in the treaty. Let a Canadian fisherman go down to Delaware and Boston, or the Sound, or go down amongst their oyster bays and attempt to fish and he will soon find himself in prison. Where is the withdrawal of the outrageous American pretension in reference to Bering's Sea, and why was the settlement of that outrageous claim omitted from the treaty?

Here is a man of large experience, a patriotic Canadian. Many of the Senators whom I address at this moment know him personally. They know the elevation of his character, the strength of his will. He is a great man, and speaking upon this question in the Canadian Parliament he understands that they have given up two-thirds of what has been always their contention under the treaty of 1818, and that we yielded one-third of our contention. He knows it and he states it. I shall read what Mr. Foster says, speaking on the same subject, April 13. Mr. Mills, of Bothwell, had the floor, and said:

Nine-tenths of the water area for which she contended has been given up, and nineteen-twentieths on the coast of Newfoundland.

That is what they understood they had given up. Mr. Foster replied:

That is a point on which my honorable friend and myself can not agree.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am perfectly willing to accept the measure of any competent surveyor who will undertake to compare the two lines.

Mr. Foster, on the same day, said:

Now, what will honorable gentlemen opposite do with reference to this treaty? All through the country their papers have denounced this treaty in the strongest terms."

Referring to the Canadian administration papers.

Sir, the headlines that have been printed with reference to this treaty ought to be preserved. "Canada lies a-bleeding," says the Mail.

Mr. MITCHELL. And truly, too.

Mr. FOSTER. "A complete surrender," says the Globe; "Secretary Bayard's victory," says the Mail; "A complete give-away," says the Halifax Chronicle; "Canada betrayed," says the Ottawa Free Press; "So far as the United States are concerned they have got everything they ever contended for," Hon. Peter Mitchell; "The great Tupperian surrender," Halifax Recorder; "A base, beggarly, blundering surrender," Attorney-General Longley. These are some of the statements made by the party opposite outside.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do I understand the honorable gentleman to use my name in connection with this?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. What did Peter Mitchell say?

Mr. FOSTER. "So far as the United States are concerned they have got everything they ever contended for."

Mr. MITCHELL. So I say now.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, sir, in closing I have just this to say in reference to the treaty. Every one knows the length of time that this controversy has existed; everybody who has read the history of this question knows the difficulty which has surrounded it, the irritation which it has provoked. Sir, I believe that the Dominion of Canada, in its large and broad heart, from end to end, will be in favor of this treaty, not because it holds every contention that Canada has made, not because it carries out everything that Canada could wish had been carried out, but because it is, as stated by the President and Secretary of the United States, a fair and honorable arrangement on both sides, in which neither country gets the full of its contention, but in which neither country suffers great injury by the concessions that have been made. Taking into account the future of Canada, her future interests as well as her present interests, taking into account the fact that we are to live beside one great and powerful neighbor, that we form part of another great and powerful empire, that we have conserved our interests to a very large degree, and that there is a prospect for the future of a permanent settlement of this question, I believe that the great heart of Canada, notwithstanding the head lines and the strong assertions, will beat with this one sentiment, and after all this long controversy of year upon year, it is a happy, a fair, a good settlement, one that has been made in the interests of peace and in the interest of the two great countries which ought to live beside each other in amity and good feeling.

There is not a Republican in the United States to-day, when he reads that expression from this man who had been criticising this treaty as a surrender on the part of his own government, who will not regret that his party in Chicago had made a declaration that it is "a cowardly and pusillanimous surrender," and put a barrier between us and Canada, which, if it is carried into execution, must forever forbid those peaceful influences and relations to which this Canadian refers with so much of pathos and feeling. There is not a mean suggestion of a penny in that language. There is not any of that narrow and low reckoning about the dollars and cents concerned in this which that Canadian saw proper to compare with the benefits and blessings of a proper, a free, and a generous intercourse between people of our own blood and kindred.

Party politics may damn this treaty with all the hyperbole, all the adjectives it can use, but it can not extinguish in the American heart the honest and just appreciation of remarks like those which fell from the lips of Mr. Foster in the Canadian Parliament.

In these wide margins of differences thus sincerely expressed on both sides there is ample room for agreement, and there is no use for that harsh and gratuitous declaration made by the Committee on Foreign Relations through its majority report in saying that the time for negotiation on this subject has passed, and that this not a fit subject for negotiation.

Sir, that declaration discredits the whole of American history down to this time. It is a contemptuous sneer at General Grant and his fame, at Hamilton Fish and the Republican party as it was in 1871, when not only they saw that the same questions were fit subjects of negotiation and that then was a time for negotiation, but they brought on the negotiation which would put these questions at rest. They failed to meet them in a bold way and upon principle as we were compelled to meet them in later days. Now the issue is forced into those narrow straits where one of three things, it seems, must be done. We must abandon our rights, or negotiate for them, or fight for them. Palliatives like the treaties of 1854 and 1871 are no longer available for the purchase of peace and quietude on this subject.

Mr. HOAR. Can the Senator from Alabama refer, without inconvenience, to the declaration of the committee of which he speaks that the time of negotiation was passed? On what page is that?

Mr. MORGAN. I expect I had better do that, because on two occasions for want of time I have passed it over without reading it. It is on pages 23 to 25, I believe

Mr. EVARTS. I have given the Senator the pages.

Mr. MORGAN. I read on page 24:

Justly influenced, doubtless, by this message and by the state of affairs shown in the documents accompanying it, and by the evidence taken by and the report of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations on the same subject made on the 19th of January, 1887 (Report No. 1683, Forty-ninth Congress, second session), Congress came to the conclusion that the period of negotiation and unavailing remonstrance had passed, and with almost absolute unanimity and without any party division enacted the act of March 3, 1887, hereinbefore mentioned, by which the duty was imposed upon the President of withdrawing from British North American vessels, etc., those liberties and advantages which by the pre-existing laws they were enjoying in the harbors and ports of the United States, whenever and as often as it should appear to him that similar rights and liberties were denied the United States fishing vessels, etc., in the ports, etc., of British North America, or whenever it should appear to him that American fishing vessels should have been subjected to outrageous or unjust treatment in the exercise of the rights secured to them by the treaty of 1818.

All that remained unprovided for according to the sense of self-respect and of just policy on the part of the United States was to obtain indemnity from the British Government for the injuries that had thus far been committed.

Either this committee took upon itself to declare that the period of negotiation and unavailing remonstrance had passed, or to make Congress responsible for that. They say Congress did determine it. Nothing is plainer in the history of the American nation than that that is not true. Congress came to no such determination. Here sat the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], who called the question up, and in the remarks I made favoring the bill I said expressly that it did not dispense with negotiation. On the contrary, it was then as much the understanding in Congress as the situation could be explained, that the very object of the act of 1887 was to inform the British Government that we were in earnest about our negotiations, and if we could not reach a solution of this question by negotiation we should have to resort to something else.

The committee can not put a gloss on this matter that will satisfy the world or that will do violence to the records of Congress. They assume the ground upon their own responsibility, not in that clause only, but in others of this same report, that the time for negotiation has passed, and they rebuke the President for having humiliated this Government to the extent they think he has done by engaging in any negotiation at all.

There is no doubt that this committee came to the conclusion, and they have enforced it with as much of assertion or asseveration as they thought was necessary to make it entirely conspicuous, that one of the chief faults in this whole business was that Mr. Cleveland should have undertaken any negotiation. The position has been assumed that it was his duty to commence with retaliation and not with negotiation—to begin with retaliation and wind up with negotiation, instead of beginning with negotiation and winding up with retaliation, if we could not come to a common and fair understanding.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator another question, if anybody on this side of the Chamber has used the word "retaliation" descriptive of any policy that he advocated?

Mr. MORGAN. I am really unable to say. I did not think that that sort of a dodge was in the case; I did not suppose that the word "retaliation" would be left out in order to deceive somebody, if that is what you mean. Non-intercourse, as you call it—it is nothing but retaliation after all. Perhaps the astute gentlemen on that side who are using all these things in reference to partisan and political purposes instead of the Government's advantage have omitted ex industria the use of the word "retaliation."

Very likely that is the case, but if you do not mean retaliation, what do you mean? The American people will have just the same result visited upon them whether this is done by proclamation of non-intercourse or by any other form. I understand it to be retaliation if we claim certain rights and privileges by comity or otherwise at the British or Canadian ports which they refuse to us, and we turn around and deny their fishing vessels those privileges and their commercial vessels the right to come into this country for purposes of traffic.

The first prominent point which touches the mind in looking over this treaty delimitation is the fact that the 10-mile admeasurement is applied to bays entering from the sea instead of a 6-mile admeasurement. That seems to strike some minds as being entirely novel and without any sort of justification or excuse.

We know very well from the statements of the Senator from Maine, which are perfectly true, and the statements of the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which I happen to be a member, which are also true, and from the great abundance of evidence set forth in the report of the committee, which lies before me, that the privileges of the inshore fisheries of every kind are almost valueless.

That has been asseverated and sworn to from time to time by witnesses and others in such form that I had lost all conception of the idea that there could be any great value attached to the inshore fisheries. I had supposed that the further we got from the main seas into the depths of those long bays the less value would attach to the inshore fisheries there. I stood upon the allegations which have been made here time and again, to which the United States Senate is certainly committed as broadly as it could be to any proposition at all, that the inshore fisheries were not of any value. When it came to the question of inshore fishing for squid, capelin, and other small bait, the Senator from Maine said it would be valuable to go in there and fish for them, but it would be cruel to the people to do it; that we ought not to do it, and that our fishermen prefer to employ those poor people to go and catch the fish and sell to us, for which we paid $100,000 or something like that a year, rather than go in there and take their living out of their mouths and to do it ourselves.

I have a pleasing opinion of the American fishermen and their generosity, in consequence of the remarks made by the Senator from Maine. I was led to believe that the question in respect of mackerel fishing concerned only those ports of the seas around the shores of that country where we could venture with our purse-seines that cost a thousand dollars a piece or more, and into waters that must be 20 or 30 fathoms deep.

The fisherman who ventures to let his nets down to take a shoal of mackerel or herring with a purse-seine in those coasts, whose bottoms are of stone honey-combed by the rush of waters over it, near the shore is almost certain to lose his seine, and that is worth a thousand dollars to him, half the profit, to say the least of it, of a whole voyage. So after all these statements had been made, and after the committee had investigated it, and after looking through the evidence carefully, which is here before me now and which proves what I say, I came to the conclusion that the inshore fisheries were not matters of much consequence to the people of the United States because of these changed conditions, and that the farther we went into the bays the less they were worth. That I believe to be the truth.

I will ask the learned Senators who put a question of that sort to me about a 10-mile limit, why was it that when we came to establish the boundary line between Mexico and the United States we went 10 miles from the coast into the Gulf of Mexico? Who can account for that? What business had the United States and Mexico 10 miles at sea fixing a boundary line between these two great Republics if it turns out by some rule of international law or by some arrangement of any kind that the jurisdictional fringe which surrounds these coasts is limited to a single marine league?

Why was it that Judge Kent looked out beyond our shores and claimed headlands from promontory to promontory as marking the civil jurisdiction of the United States? Why did Thomas Jefferson go still further out into the ocean and claim that that wonderful current, the Gulf Stream, should mark the outer boundary of the country that lay within the jurisdiction of the United States this side of it? What mean all these departures on our part in theory, and once at least in practice? When we came to fix the jurisdictional limits within which we might board a foreign ship approaching one of our ports 12 miles from shore what were we doing exercising jurisdiction over a foreign ship 12 miles from our own coast, and what kind of jurisdiction did we exercise? I can not stop to read the statute. I should like to have time to do it. Perhaps I may incorporate it in my remarks. Senators all know what it is.

We have the right to send our revenue-cutters with their masters and other officers out to sea 12 miles from our coast to board a ship destined to one of our ports, take possession of her, examine her cargo and manifest, compare them together, go into her captain's and officers' quarters and ward-rooms, and examine all that they possess, their log and everything concerning the vessel, and take absolute control of her, and bring her into port, and turn her over to a custom-house officer. A ship is thus made a prisoner 12 miles from the shore, merely because she is advancing in her voyage to one of our ports. Why do we do that? Because of that barbarity of maritime power and jurisdiction connected with the exercise of the customs authorities, which was discussed between the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] and, I believe, the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] or the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS]; that barbarity which belongs to the customs regulations of all countries, the necessity of which is obvious when we come to consider how important it is that every country should be enabled to prevent smuggling upon her coasts.

The same idea runs through these Canadian regulations, the customs laws which they have applied to our fishermen going in there under the treaty of 1888—the same barbarism that we practice here precisely. It is found in our statutes, and operating against Canadians and all others. Only our statutes in many particulars are more severe than theirs. That is the truth, and let us respect it in considering this question.

When we go to the other side of the continent and discuss the question of the right of the fishermen of British Columbia in our Alaskan waters and upon our Alaskan coast, and in the Behring's Sea, we shall have a new puzzle to get along with.

We have come by purchase from the Russian Government to the control of one-half of what might be termed an unclosed sea. This brings us in contact with a question, perhaps you might call it a headland question, affecting the richest fisheries of this world—fisheries that are four or five times as extensive as those on the Northeastern coast, and far more abundantly stocked with food fishes. We shall come in practical contact with these questions in a very brief time, if we are not already in contact with them, and we shall find that they will come upon us in possibly a very unexpected way.

In view of what we acquired in the purchase of Alaska, and in view of what are the necessities of the situation upon that broken and rugged coast, I am not willing to admit that a 3-mile fringe of jurisdiction, including the right of exclusive fishery within the line, and excluding the right outside of it, is the boundary of our rights upon a question of this kind. I can not do it without surrendering in advance those advantages which belong to us by nature as well as by compact with Russia, in favor of our fisheries upon the Alaskan coast and in the Behring's Sea and Straits. The American statesman who makes a surrender of these questions now in dealing with this treaty with Great Britain will find himself confronted with a difficulty the magnitude of which he does not now probably comprehend, which it seems to me will crush him as corn is crushed between the upper and nether millstone. The statesmanship that we are observing in this partisan higgling about the treaty of 1888 is of a character to betray us in respect to some of the most important rights that we possess on the Northwestern coast. It will affect the food-supply to the poorer classes of this country for generation after generation.

For the sake of a supposed temporary advantage with a few men who have some sort of prejudice against Great Britain, we have got so into the shambles of party power and party influence in this country; for such considerations, it seems, we yield up the contemplation of these grand and broad subjects, in which all the people of our country of this generation and of succeeding generations are interested, and we humbly submit our necks to the yoke and accept the party burden without any demur.

Mr. President, I am not willing to do this. I would rather see the Democratic party sunk out of sight in this campaign than to have that party commit itself to a policy which is unwise, unjust, ungenerous, and which would be on our part an act of sheer debasement. I would rather wait until the old ship should rise again above the waters, as she has often done, than to see her decks desecrated by a crew who would keep her afloat at the expense of the industrial people of this country and to the sacrifice of their food.

If the Democratic party is worth anything, it is because it stands by the rights of the common poor people of this land who have not the power and the influence to help themselves. It stands on truth and justice, and it stands fearlessly. When it wants to dodge, and dicker, and crawl, and creep into power for the purpose of getting a set of men into office or keeping them there, I do not care anything more about it. I am not the child of that party. It did not create me; it did not build me. What little God has given to me I claim from His hand direct as an honest American.

If that party should ever choose to surrender its principles for the sake of temporary expediency and to secure its hold on power, I shall float off and get away from the wreck. But, sir, there is not one line of such history in all the record of that great party. It has never attempted to negotiate nor to defeat a treaty with a foreign power in the seclusion of a party caucus.

There is another reason for this 10-mile rule to which I should like to advert. It is only my own conjecture, I can not tell whether it was the reason that operated or not, but inside these bays are living the people described by the gentleman from whose writings I submitted a literal extract in the earlier part of my speech to-day. In those quiet little hamlets there are a God-fearing people. They are a people who observe the Sabbath. They seem to be a religiously inclined people, modest and not aggressive, kindly and generous. They have settled down on the margins of those deep bays, far removed from the sea. They gather their little store of fish and lay it up for winter, and that is all they have; it is all they can get. They can not even raise Irish potatoes. Very few vegetables can be grown in that country. Fish is about all those people have to live upon. If I were providing laws for them, I should be clearly in favor of shutting out from contact with them the men who come from distant countries, whether from the United States or from France or from Portugal or elsewhere, unless they came in by special license or under some such provision, and when they got there submitted themselves to the laws of the land so that they could not take advantage of those people and do like they did in the Fortune Bay troubles. On that occasion our vessels went in there with twenty-one sail of a Sunday, spread their nets, and included all the fish in the bay to take the bread of life from those people for a year to come. They were held on shore by the laws, to which they rendered obedience, that no Newfoundlander should be found fishing in any form whatsoever on the Sabbath day.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRYE. I dislike very much indeed to interrupt the Senator from Alabama, but on Friday an agreement was made that the debate should close to-day at 6 o'clock, and that the last two hours should be reserved for the friends of the treaty. The Senator from Alabama has occupied all the time up to the present. If the friends of the treaty claim the last two hours it seems to me that those who are opposed to it should be allowed some time.

Mr. MORGAN. That is fair, Mr. President. I wish to remark again that in my speaking upon this question as often as I have, I sometimes feel almost guilty of having transgressed the patience of the Senate on this matter; but I have not heretofore attempted to give an analysis of the treaty and my reasons for supporting it, and so I have been betrayed into rather a prolix investigation of it, much more, I am satisfied, than I need to have done. I will now yield the floor and let any gentleman on the other side take it who desires to do so, and then later on if no Senator desires to speak, I may resume it for the purpose of merely completing the remarks I have in part submitted to the Senate on the items contained in the treaty.

Mr. FRYE. If the Senator prefers to go on now and will yield a portion of the last two hours to the other side, that will be satisfactory.

Mr. MORGAN. Some Senators, I think, on this side will desire to speak in the last two hours.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate recommit the treaty to the Committee on Foreign Relations with the instructions proposed by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON]?

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I have stated at great length and with a good deal of care the opinion which I entertain and that which is entertained by the fishermen of Massachusetts, whom I in part represent, in regard to the effect of the proposed treaty upon their interests. I have also stated with equal care and at considerable length my opinion of the relation of this proposition to the interest and dignity of the country at large.

Nothing that has been said by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] or by any Senator on the other side of the Chamber has changed my convictions or has made it seem to be necessary to add to or modify the argument with which I endeavored as well as I could to defend them. I take the floor at this time only to call attention to three or four catch-words, or cries, or utterances which we have heard repeated many times in this debate, chiefly by the honorable Senator from Alabama, by which the friends of the treaty undertake to fasten upon its opponents positions or views which they not only never have uttered or believed, but which they have constantly, so far as they could, repudiated.

One of them is that there is any proposition on this side of the Chamber or anywhere, as far as we know, of what may be called retaliation. Another is that anybody has said that the time for negotiation had passed in any such sense as that which the Senator from Alabama put on it, or, indeed, that anybody has said that at all. Another of them is, it has been asserted not only in this Chamber, but elsewhere, that the grievances which have so stirred the hearts of that class of our fellow-citizens in whose breast an indignity to the American flag or to an American citizen pursuing his lawful occupation on the high seas or in foreign ports excites indignation at all, are so far provided for in the present treaty that they can not occur again hereafter if it is adopted.

I asked the Senator from Alabama if he had heard anybody on this side of the Chamber speak of retaliation, or propose retaliation, or propose anything which could be justly and fairly described as retaliation, as the policy which was proposed to be adopted? The Senator from Alabama replied that that was a dodge; that he did know that that dodge was proposed, and he did not know but that somebody over here might be trying to cheat somebody.

I do not call attention to this language on account of its want of civility. Indeed, I do not think the Senator from Alabama is conscious of the full meaning and significance of the language which he uses in the heat of debate, which he applies to his political opponents and to those who differ from him. I have been inclined, as I have heard that Senator speak hour after hour and day after day and week after week, to come to the conclusion that he is asleep during the great part of his own speeches; that they are the utterances of a man who is having a quiet slumber, and perhaps pleasant and delightful dreams, himself prompted by something very different from the clear intellect and kindly soul which belong to that honorable Senator while he is awake.

Now, just think of this proposition. I wonder if the Senator thought whom he was hitting when he described the repudiation of the phrase "retaliation." He spoke of it as a dodge, and as an attempt to cheat when it was applied to the proposed use of the legislation enacted by Congress. The Senator, if he had been serious and meant what he said, would have been attacking an eminent and honored Democratic statesman who has now gone to his grave. It is Mr. Daniel Manning, the recent Secretary of the Treasury, who in speaking of this subject most emphatically repudiated the notion that the use of this legislation in which we all united, Administration and all, should have been spoken of at all as a matter of retaliation. Here is what Mr. Manning said:

> A violation of comity may be looked upon as an unfriendly act, but not a cause for a just war. England may judge for herself of the nature and extent of the comity and courtesy she will show to us. In the present case we do not propose retaliation; we simply respond. We too suspend comity and hospitality.

And I am told on the highest authority that this sentence of Mr. Manning is but an adoption by him of a sentence uttered a week or two before that time in debate by the honorable Senator from New York, who has taken so considerable a share in the present debate on this side of the Chamber. What we propose I think the American people have sense enough to see and understand, without an exception, under whatever veil of cloud or fog it is sought to conceal it. The fishermen of the New England coast are somewhat used to steering their course through a fog, and they have been accustomed to fogs in the pursuit of their vocation almost, though not perhaps quite, as dense as the fog which is sought to be thrown over this subject by the honorable Senator from Alabama. What we propose to say to Great Britain and Canada is exactly this: As has been stated before in this debate, every nation is the proper and fitting judge of the degree of comity and commercial hospitality which it shall show to the citizens and vessels of other countries in its own ports and within its own jurisdiction.

With that exercise of the discretion of Great Britain or of her dependency, Canada, we do not desire and we have no pretension to interfere; but all we have to say to her is that the degree of measure with which comity and hospitality shall be measured out shall be equal in the ports of both nations, and we are willing, as somebody must initiate the rule, in the first place to concede to her that opportunity and prerogative. If you say that because of the peculiar character of the vocation of the fisherman it is not fitting that the fisherman shall not go into one of your ports with a catch of fish which he proposes to sell in the United States and transship it there, very well. No Canadian vessel, then, shall come into a port of the United States with a catch of fish which it proposes to sell in the United States and transship it there.
